MEMOIR

OF

THE REV. ROBERT HALL, A.M.

BY

OLINTHUS GREGORY, LL.D., F.R.A.S.,

PROFESSOR OF MATHEMATICS IN THE ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY.

[We are aware that some who may become patrons of the Christian Library may hereafter possess the following Memoir in connexion with the collected works of Mr Hall; but as we suppose there are many who desire to have the life of that eminent man whose purposes it may not suit to become purchasers of his writings, we have concluded to devote the first number of our work to its separate republication. We desire to guard against the impression that we intend to publish portions of works which it would be desirable to possess entire. Such is not our intention The circumstances in the present case are peculiar, and such as will not probably again occur in the course of our labours.

The following Memoir forms a part of the sixth volume of the English edition of Mr Hall's works. The statement of this fact will explain some expressions in which allusion is made to preceding volumes.

It was expected that the biography of Mr H. would have been written by Sir James Mackintosh, his early fellow student and friend; but his sudden and lamented death caused the task to devolve on Dr Gregory, who has executed it with ability and candour.—Ed. Ch. Lib.]

Robert Hall, whose works are collected in the volumes now published, was born at Arnsby, a village about eight miles from Leicester, on the 2d of May 1764. His father was descended from a respectable family of yeomanry in Northumberland, whence he removed to Arnsby in 1753, on being chosen the pastor of a Baptist congregation in that place. He was not a man of learning, but a man of correct judgment and solid piety, an eloquent and successful preacher of the gospel, and one of the first among the modern Baptists in our villages who aimed to bring them down from the heights of ultra-Calvinism to those views of religious truth which are sound, devotional and practical. He was the author of several useful publications, of which one, the "Help to Zion's Travellers," has gone through several editions, and is still much and beneficially read, on account of its tendency to remove various often urged objections against some momentous points of evangelical truth. He was often appointed to draw up the "Circular Letters" from the ministers and messengers of the Northampton Association. One of these letters, published in 1776, presents, in small compass, so able a defence of the doctrine of the Trinity, that it might be advantageously republished for more general circulation. This excellent man died in March 1791. His character has been beautifully sketched by his son, who, in one sentence, while portraying his father, with equal accuracy depicted himself:—"He appeared to the "greatest advantage upon subjects where the faculties of most men fail them; for the natural element of his mind was greatness."

The wife of this valuable individual was a woman of sterling sense and distinguished piety. She died in December 1776.

Robert was the youngest of fourteen children, six of whom survived their parents. Four of these were daughters, of whom three are still living; the other son, John, settled as a farmer at Arnsby, and died in 1806.

Robert, while an infant, was so delicate and feeble, that it was scarcely expected he would reach maturity. Until he was two years of age he could neither walk nor talk. He was carried about in the arms of a nurse, who was kept for him alone, and who was directed to take him close after the plough in the field, and at other times to the sheep-pen, from a persuasion, very prevalent in the midland counties, that the exhalations from newly ploughed land, and from sheep in the fold, are salubrious and strengthening. Adjacent to his father's dwelling-house was a burial ground; and the nurse, a woman of integrity and intelligence, judging from his actions that he was desirous to learn the meaning of the inscriptions on the grave-stones, and of the various figures carved upon them, managed, by the aid of those inscriptions, to teach him the letters of the alphabet, then to group them into syllables and words, and thus, at length, to read and speak. No sooner was his tongue loosed by this unusual but efficient process, than his advance became constantly marked. Having acquired the ability to speak, his constitutional ardour at once appeared. He was incessantly asking questions, and became a great and a rapid talker. One day, when he was about three years old, on his expressing disapprobation of some person who spoke quickly, his mother reminded him that he spoke very fast; "No," said he, "I only keep at it."

Like many others who were born in villages, he received his first regular instructions (after he left his nurse's arms) at a dame's school. Dame Scotton had the honour of being his first professional instructor. From her he was transferred to a Mrs Lyley, in the same village. While under their care he evinced an extraordinary thirst for knowledge, and became a collector of books. In the summer season, after the school-hours were over, he would put his richly prized library, among which was an Entick's Dictionary, into his pinafore, steal into the graveyard, (which, from an early and fixed association, he regarded as his study, lie down upon the grass, spread his books around him, and there remain until the deepening shades of evening compelled him to retire into the house.

At about six years of age he was placed, as a day-scholar, under the charge of a Mr Simmons, of Wigston, a village about four miles from Arnsby. At first, he walked to school in the mornings and home again in the evenings. But the severe pain in his back, from which he suffered so much through life, had even then begun to distress him; so that he was often obliged to lie down upon the road, and sometimes his brother John and his other school-fellows carried him, in turn, he repaying them during their labour by relating some amusing story, or detailing some of the interesting results of his reading. On his father's ascertaining his inability to walk so far daily, he took lodgings for him and his brother at the house of a friend in the village: after this arrangement was made they went to Wigston on the Monday mornings, and returned to Arnsby on the Saturday afternoons.

The course of instruction at Mr Simmons's school was not very extensive; and Robert was not likely to restrict himself, as a student, to its limits. On starting from home on the Monday, it was his practice to take with him two or three books from his father's library, that he might read them in the intervals between the school hours. The books he selected were not those of mere amusement, but such as required deep and serious thought. The works of Jonathan Edwards, for example, were among his favourites; and it is an ascertained fact, that before he was nine years of age, he had perused and reperused, with intense interest, the treatises of that profound and extraordinary thinker, on the "Affections," and on the "Will." About the same time he read, with a like interest, "Butler's Analogy." He used to ascribe his early predilection for this class of studies, in great measure, to his intimate association, in mere childhood, with a tailor, one of his father's congregation, a very shrewd, well-informed man, and an acute metaphysician. Before he was ten years old, he had written many essays, principally on religious subjects; and often invited his brother and sisters to hear him preach. About this time, too, in one of those anticipatory distributions of a father's property, which I apprehend, are not unusual with boys, he proposed that his brother should have the cows, sheep and pigs, on their father's death, and leave him "all the books." These juvenile "dividers of the inheritance" seem to have overlooked their sisters; unless, indeed, they assigned them the furniture. The incident, however, is mentioned simply to show what it was that Robert even then most prized.

He remained at Mr Simmons's school until he was eleven years of age, when this conscientious master informed the father that he was quite unable to keep pace with his pupil, declaring that he had been often obliged to sit up all night to prepare the lessons for the morning; a practice he could no longer continue, and must therefore relinquish his favourite scholar.

The proofs of extraordinary talent and of devotional feeling, which Robert had now for some time exhibited, not only gratified his excellent parents, but seemed to mark the expediency and propriety of devoting him to the sacred office; but the delicate health of the son, and the narrow means of the father, occasioned some perplexity. Mr Hall, therefore, took his son to Kettering, in order that he might avail himself of the advice of an influential and valued friend residing there, Mr Beeby Wallis. Their interview soon led to the choice of a suitable boarding school; but the pallid and sickly appearance of the boy exciting Mr Wallis's sympathy, he prevailed upon his father to leave him at his house for a few weeks, in the hope that change of air would improve his health. This gentleman was so greatly astonished at the precocity of talent of his youthful visitor, that he several times requested him to deliver a short address to a select auditory invited for the purpose. The juvenile orator often afterwards adverted to the injury done him by the incongruous elevation to which he was thus raised. "Mr Wallis," said he, "was one whom every body loved. He belonged to a family in which probity, candour and benevolence, constituted the general likeness; but conceive, sir, if you can, the egregious impropriety of setting a boy of eleven to preach to a company of grave gentlemen, full half of whom wore wigs. I never call the circumstance to mind but with grief at the vanity it inspired; nor, when I think of such mistakes of good men, am I inclined to question the correctness of Baxter's language, strong as it is, where he says, 'Nor should men turn preachers as the river Nilus breeds frogs (saith Herodotus), when one half moveth before the other is made, and while it is yet but plain mud!'"*

Robert's health appearing much improved from his short residence at Kettering, he was placed by his father as a boarder, at the school of the Rev John Ryland, in the neighbouring town of Northampton. Mr Ryland was a very extraordinary man, whose excellencies and eccentricities were strangely balanced. In him were blended the ardour and vehemence of Whitefield, with the intrepidity of Luther. His pulpit oratory was of the boldest character, and singularly impressive, when he did not overstep the proprieties of the ministerial function. In his school he was both loved and feared; his prevailing kindness and benevolence exciting affection, while his stern determination to do what was right, as well as to require what he thought right, too often kept alive among his pupils a sentiment of apprehension and alarm. So far as I can learn, from several who had been under his care, he taught Greek better than Latin, and the rudiments of mathematical science with more success than those of grammar and the languages. His pupils never forgot his manner of explaining the doctrine and application of ratios and proportions; and they who had ever formed a part of his "living orrery," by which he incorporated the elements of the solar system among the amusements of the play-ground, obtained a knowledge of that class of facts which they seldom, if ever, lost.

Our youthful student remained under Mr Ryland's care but little more than a year and a half; during which, however, according to his father's testimony, "he made great progress in Latin and Greek;" while, in his own judgment, the principle of emulation was called into full activity, the habit of composition was brought into useful exercise, the leading principles of abstract science were collected, and a thirst for knowledge of every kind acquired. It should also be mentioned here, that it was during the time Robert was Mr Ryland's pupil, that he heard a sermon preached at Northampton, by Mr Robins, of Daventry, whose religious instruction, conveyed "in language of the most classic purity," at once "impressive and delightful," excited his early relish for chaste and elegant composition.

From the time he quitted Northampton, until he entered the "Bristol Education Society," or academy, for the instruction of young men preparing for the ministerial office among the Baptists, he studied divinity and some collateral subjects, principally under the guidance of his father, with occasional hints from his acute metaphysical friend, still residing in the same village. Having, in this interval, given satisfactory proofs of his piety, and of a strong predilection for the pastoral office, he was placed at the Bristol Institution, upon Dr Ward's foundation, in October 1778, being then in his fifteenth year. He remained there until the autumn of 1781, when the president of the institution reported to the general meeting of subscribers and friends, that "two pupils, Messrs Stennett and Hall, had been continued upon Dr Ward's exhibition, but were now preparing to set out for Scotland, according to the Doctor's will."

The Bristol Academy, when Mr Hall first joined it, was under the superintendence of the Rev. Hugh Evans, who was shortly afterwards succeeded by his son, Dr Caleb Evans, both as president of the institution, and as pastor of the Baptist church in Broadmead. The Rev. James Newton was the classical tutor. Under these able men he pursued his studies with great ardour and perseverance. He became an early riser; and it was remarked in consequence, that he was often ready to attend the tutor for the morning lessons, before some of his fellow-students had commenced their preparation.

His sentiments at this time respecting his theological tutor, and the importance of his studies in general, may be gathered from the subjoined extracts from two letters to his father, both written before July 1780.

"Dr Evans is a most amiable person in every respect: as a man, generous and open-hearted; as a Christian, lively and spiritual; as a preacher, pathetic and fervent; and as a tutor, gentle, meek and condescending. I can truly say that he has, on all occasions, behaved to me with the tenderness and affection of a parent, whom I am bound by the most endearing ties to hold in everlasting honour and esteem.

"Through the goodness of God, of whom in all things I desire to be continually mindful, my pursuits of knowledge afford me increasing pleasure, and lay open fresh sources of improvement and entertainment. That branch of wisdom in which, above all others, I wish and crave your assistance, is divinity, of all others the most interesting and important. It is the height of my ambition, that in some happy period of my life, my lot may be cast near you, when I may have the unspeakable pleasure of consulting, on different subjects, you, whose judgment I esteem not less than an oracle.

"We, poor, short-sighted creatures, are ready to apprehend that we know all things, before we know any thing; whereas it is a great part of knowledge to know that we know nothing. Could we behold the vast depths of unfathomed science, or glance into the dark recesses of hidden knowledge, we should be ready to tremble at the precipice, and cry out—'Who is sufficient for these things?'"

The system of instruction at Bristol, comprehended not merely the learned languages and the rudiments of science, but a specific course of preparation for the ministerial office, including the habit of public speaking. Essays and theses on appropriate topics, were written and delivered, under the direction of the tutors: religious exercises were carefully attended to; and the students were appointed, in turn, to speak or preach upon subjects selected by the president. Among the books first put into Mr Hall's hands to prepare him for these exercises, was Gibbons's Rhetoric, which he read with the utmost avidity, and often mentioned in after life, as rekindling the emotion excited by Mr Robins's preaching, improving his sensibility to the utility as well as beauty of fine writing, and creating an intense solicitude to acquire an elegant as well as a perspicuous style. He was, therefore, more active in this department of academical labour than many of his compeers. Usually, however, after his written compositions had answered the purpose for which they were prepared, he made no effort to preserve them; but either carelessly threw them aside, or distributed them among his associates, if they expressed any desire to possess them. Some of these early productions, therefore, have escaped the corrosions of time. The only one which I have been able to obtain is an essay on "Ambition," in which there is more of the tumultuary flourish of the orator, than he would ever have approved after he reached his twentieth year. Nor was it correct in sentiment. The sole species of excellence recommended to be pursued was superiority of intellect; all moral qualities, as well as actions directed to the promotion of human welfare, being entirely overlooked.

* Saint's Rest, Preface to part II., original edition.

Indeed, there is reason to apprehend that at this period of his life, Mr Hall, notwithstanding the correctness and excellence of his general principles, and the regularity of his devotional habits, had set too high an estimate on merely intellectual attainments, and valued himself, not more perhaps than was natural to youth, yet too much, on the extent of his mental possessions. No wonder, then, that he should experience salutary mortification. And thus it happened. He was appointed, agreeably to the arrangement already mentioned, to deliver an address in the vestry of Broadmead chapel, on 1 Tim. iv. 10. "Therefore, we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men; specially of those that believe." After proceeding, for a short time, much to the gratification of his auditory, he suddenly paused, covered his face with his hands, exclaimed, "Oh! I have lost all my ideas," and sat down, his hands still hiding his face. The failure, however, painful as it was to his tutors, and humiliating to himself, was such as rather augmented than diminished their persuasion of what he could accomplish, if once he acquired self-possession. He was, therefore, appointed to speak again, on the same subject, at the same place, the ensuing week. This second attempt was accompanied by a second failure, still more painful to witness, and still more grievous to bear. He hastened from the vestry, and on retiring to his room, exclaimed, "If this does not humble me, the devil must have me!" Such were the early efforts of him whose humility afterwards became as conspicuous as his talents, and who, for nearly half a century, excited universal attention and admiration by the splendour of his pulpit eloquence.

Our student spent the first summer vacation after his entering the Bristol institution, under the paternal roof at Arnsby; and, in the course of that residence at home, accompanied his father to some public religious service at Clipstone, a village in Northamptonshire. Mr Hall, senior, and Mr Beddome of Bourton, well known by his Hymns, and his truly valuable Sermons, were both engaged to preach. But, the latter, being much struck with the appearance, and some of the remarks, of the son of his friend, was exceedingly anxious that he should preach in the evening, and proposed to relinquish his own engagement, rather than be disappointed. To this injudicious proposal, after resisting every importunity for some time, he at length yielded; and entered the pulpit to address an auditory of ministers, many of whom he had been accustomed from his infancy to regard with the utmost reverence. He selected for his text, I John i. 5, "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all;" and, it is affirmed, treated this mysterious and awful subject with such metaphysical acumen, and drew from it such an impressive application, as excited the deepest interest.

On the arrival of the summer vacation, in 1780, he again visited Arnsby; and during the period he then remained at home, his father became fully satisfied that his piety was genuine, as well as that his qualifications for the office of a preacher were of a high order. He therefore expressed to many of his friends his desire that he should be "set apart to the sacred work." Solicitous not to be led aside from a correct judgment by the partiality of a father, he resolved that the church over which he was pastor, should judge of his son's fitness, and recognize their conviction by a solemn act. The members of the church, after cautious and deliberate inquiry, ratified the decision of the anxious parent, and earnestly and unanimously requested "that Robert Hall, Jr. might be set apart to public employ."

"Accordingly," as the following extract from 'the Church-book' testifies, on the 13th of August 1780, "he was examined by his father before the church, respecting his inclination, motives and end, in reference to the ministry, and was likewise desired to make a declaration of his religious sentiments. All which being done to the entire satisfaction of the church, they therefore set him apart by lifting up their right hands, and by solemn prayer.

"His father then delivered a discourse to him from 2 Tim. ii. 1. Thou, therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. Being thus sent forth, he preached in the afternoon from 2 Thess. i. 7, 8. The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from Heaven, with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.—May the Lord bless him, and grant him great success!"

It is worthy of observation that, on this solemn occasion, as well as when he preached at Clipstone, Mr Hall selected texts of the class most calculated to elicit those peculiar powers for which he was through life distinguished.

In little more than a year after Mr Hall had been thus publicly designated a preacher of the gospel, having pursued his studies at Bristol with great assiduity and corresponding success, he was, as already hinted, appointed to King's College, Aberdeen, on Dr Ward's foundation. In his journey thither he was accompanied by Mr Joseph Stennett, the son of the late Rev. Dr Stennett, and another student, Mr John Pownall, still living. The two former of these had letters to the venerable Dr Erskine of Edinburgh; and he again supplied them with introductions to two eminent individuals at Aberdeen. This appears from a letter sent by the doctor, 2d Nov. 1781, to Mr Ryland, of Northampton; from which, as it exhibits his view of the state of things at Aberdeen, at that period, I present a brief extract.

"I had the pleasure of your letter by Messrs Stennett and Hall last week. They appear to me pleasant young men, and I should have been happy to have had further opportunities of showing my regard to the children of so worthy parents, than their short stay here allowed. Though there are many excellent teachers at Aberdeen, and both they and the ministers are remarkable for purity of morals, I have some fears, from different accounts, that the general strain of preaching there is less evangelical than in several pulpits in Glasgow or Edinburgh. Principal Campbell and Dr Beattie are, in my opinion, able and worthy men; and my difference with the first, as to the American war and the Popish Bill, has not impaired our mutual esteem. I wrote letters to introduce the young gentlemen to both."

Mr Hall, for many years afterwards, used often to speak of the affectionate attentions of Dr Erskine, on this occasion; and of his own feelings when, on taking leave, the venerable man of God exhorted him to self-vigilance, kissed him, laid his hand upon his head, blessing him, and commending him to the watchful care of the great Head of the Church.

At the time when he went to Aberdeen, the reputation of the two colleges, King's and Marischal College, was almost equally balanced. At the latter, Principal Campbell and Dr Beattie, professor of moral philosophy, had attained a high and merited celebrity, both on account of their lectures and their writings; while at King's College the divinity lectures of Dr Gerard were much and greatly esteemed; and some of the other professors were men of eminence. Many, therefore, especially of the divinity students, attended the appropriate lectures at the two colleges*.

Mr Hall, in a letter addressed to his deservedly prized friend, the late Dr Ryland, towards the end of this first session at college, speaks thus of his studies and of two of the professors:—

"We entered the Greek class under Mr Leslie, who, though a man of no apparent brightness of parts, is, notwithstanding, well fitted for his office, being a good grammarian, and attentive to the interests of his pupils. We have been employed in the class in going over, more accurately, the principles of the Greek language, and reading select passages in Xenophon and Homer: and I have privately read through Xenophon's Anabasis, and Memorabilia of Socrates, several books of Homer, and some of the Greek Testament; and am now reading Longini de Sublimitate liber, which I hope to finish next week."

* At King's College, during Mr Hall's studies there, Mr John Leslie was professor of Greek; Mr Roderick Macleod professor of Philosophy, including Mathematics; Mr W. Ogilvie professor of Humanity; Mr James Dunbar professor of Moral Philosophy; and Dr Alexander Gerard professor of Divinity. Though some of these were highly distinguished men, Dr Gerard was most known to the world of English literature. Among his works are, "An Essay on Genius," "An Essay on Taste," two volumes of valuable Sermons, and his "Lectures on the Pastoral Care," published in 1799, by his son, Dr Gilbert Gerard.

In the same letter he mentions his reading with Professor Ogilvie, whose versions of the Latin poets he characterizes as "extremely elegant." He laments the want of religious advantages in this seat of learning, and deplores the profanity and profligacy of many of the students; one of whom, he assures his friend, affirmed that he knew no use even in the word "God," except to give point to an oath! To make up for this sad deficiency, he adds, "we have found some agreeable acquaintances in the New Town, and among them the sister of Mr Cruden, the author of the Concordance."

The same letter contains evidence that he did not confine his attention solely to classical and mathematical studies. After expressing his admiration of the devotional as well as rational spirit, that "lives and breathes in every page of Edwards," he adds:—

"My thoughts are at present too much immersed in literary exercises to admit of long or close application of thought to any thing else. I have, however, been thinking a little on the distinction of natural and moral ability and have in my mind an objection upon which I should be glad to have your thoughts. It is, briefly, this: If, according to Edwards, the will always follows the last dictate of the understanding, and if it be determined, directed and biassed by the view of the understanding, what room, then, is left for any notion of moral ability as distinct from natural? Or how can there, in this case, be any depravity of the will, without supposing a prior defect in the understanding? Since the will, if it be wrong in its bias, is first led to that bias by the understanding; and where then the possibility of a moral inability consisting with a natural ability! This I hope to have some conversation with you upon, when I have the happiness of seeing you. I have with me Edwards on the Will, and have lately perused it often; and the more I read it the more I admire."

The lamented death of Sir James Mackintosh has left a blank which none can adequately fill, with regard to Mr Hall's character, habits, and the development of his intellectual powers at this period. On application, however, to an esteemed friend, Professor Paul, he has kindly communicated a few particulars, which I shall give in his own language.

"What I now transmit is drawn from the college records, from the recollection of Dr Jack, principal of King's College, and formerly for three years a class-fellow of Mr Hall, and from my own knowledge; for I, also, was a cotemporary of Mr Hall, having commenced my first year's studies when he commenced his fourth. It appears from the album that Mr Hall entered college in the beginning of November 1781. His first year was spent principally under the tuition of Mr Professor Leslie, in the acquisition of the Greek language; his second, third and fourth years under that of Mr Professor Macleod, when he studied mathematics, natural philosophy, and moral philosophy. He took his degree in arts (i. e. A. M. degree) on the 30th of March 1785. Principal Jack says that he attended the professor of humanity, Mr Ogilvie, during the four years he was at college, both for Latin and natural history; but, as there is no record of the students of of the humanity and natural history classes, this fact depends wholly on the principal's recollection. I learn from the same source that Sir James Mackintosh and Mr Hall, while at college, read a great deal of Greek in private, and that their reputation was high among their fellow-students for their attainments in that language. Principal Jack also bears testimony to Mr Hall's great success in his mathematical and philosophical studies, and affirms that he was the first scholar of his class, in the various branches of education taught at college. During one of the sessions the principal was member of a select literary society, consisting of only eight or ten students, of which society Sir James and Mr Hall were the distinguished ornaments. None of Mr Hall's college exercises are now to be found in this place; but my impressions correspond with those of the principal, that his acquirements were of the first order; and as Sir James had left college before I entered, having received his A. M. degree 30th March 1784, there was no one at college in my time who could be at all put in competition with Mr Hall. But, it was not as a scholar alone that Mr Hall's reputation was great at college. He was considered by all the students as a model of correct and regular deportment, of religious and moral habits, of friendly and benevolent affections."

To this concise summary I subjoin the few particulars which I gathered from Sir James Mackintosh himself.

When these two eminent men first became acquainted, Sir James was in his eighteenth year, Mr Hall about a year older. Sir James described Mr Hall as attracting notice by a most ingenuous and intelligent countenance, by the liveliness of his manner, and by such indications of mental activity as could not be misinterpreted. His appearance was that of health, yet not of robust health; and he often suffered from paroxysms of pain, during which he would roll about on the carpet, in the utmost agony; but no sooner had the pain subsided than he would resume his part in conversation with as much cheerfulness and vivacity as before he had been thus interrupted. Sir James said he became attached to Mr Hall, "because he could not help it." There wanted many of the supposed constituents of friendship. Their tastes, at the commencement of their intercourse, were widely different; and upon most of the important topics of inquiry, there was no congeniality of sentiment: yet notwithstanding this, the substratum of their minds seemed of the same cast, and upon this, Sir James thought, the edifice of their mutual regard first rested. Yet he, ere long, became fascinated by his brilliancy and acumen, in love with his cordiality and ardour, and "awe-struck" (I think that was the term employed) by the transparency of his conduct and the purity of his principles. They read together; they sat together at lecture, if possible; they walked together. In their joint studies they read much of Xenophon and Herodotus, and more of Plato; and so well was all this known, exciting admiration in some, in others envy, that it was not unusual, as they went along, for their class-fellows to point at them and say, "there go Plato and Herodotus." But the arena in which they met most frequently was that of morals and metaphysics; furnishing topics of incessant disputation. After having sharpened their weapons by reading, they often repaired to the spacious sands upon the sea shore, and still more frequently to the picturesque scenery on the banks of the Don, above the old town, to discuss with eagerness the various subjects to which their attention had been directed. There was scarcely an important position in Berkeley's Minute Philosopher, in Butler's Analogy, or in Edwards on the Will, over which they had not thus debated with the utmost intensity. Night after night, nay, month after month, for two sessions, they met only to study or to dispute; yet no unkindly feeling ensued. The process seemed rather, like blows in that of welding iron, to knit them closer together. Sir James said, that his companion as well as himself often contended for victory, yet never, so far as he could then judge, did either make a voluntary sacrifice of truth, or stoop to draw to and fro the serra λογομαχιας, as is too often the case with ordinary controvertists. From these discussions, and from subsequent meditation upon them, Sir James learnt more as to principles, (such, at least, he assured me, was his deliberate conviction) than from all the books he ever read. On the other hand, Mr Hall through life reiterated his persuasion, that his friend possessed an intellect more analagous to that of Bacon, than any person of modern times; and that if he had devoted his powerful understanding to metaphysics, instead of law and politics, he would have thrown an unusual light upon that intricate but valuable region of inquiry. Such was the cordial, reciprocal testimony of these two distinguished men. And, in many respects—latterly, I hope and believe, in all the most essential—it might be truly said of both, "as face answereth to face in a glass, so does the heart of a man to his friend."

It will be seen from the first of the series of letters inserted in the fifth volume, that, shortly after Mr Hall's return to Aberdeen in November 1783, he received an invitation from the church at Broadmead, to associate himself with Dr Caleb Evans, as the assistant pastor; an invitation which he accepted with much doubt and diffidence. After some correspondence it was arranged that Mr Hall should reside at Bristol, in the interval (of nearly six months) between the college sessions of 1784 and 1785, and then return to Aberdeen to complete his course. In this important session, from the beginning of November 1784 to May 1785, he seems to have devoted himself most sedulously to his studies; especially the Greek language, with moral and intellectual philosophy, and those other departments of inquiry which are most intimately related to theology. During this session, too, he attended Dr Campbell's lectures at Marischal college, and frequently profited by the doctor's expository discourses, delivered once each fortnight; while he generally attended public worship at the church where Mr Abercromby and Mr Peters, both regarded as holding correct sentiments, were the alternate preachers. He had now lost his chosen companion, the sharpener of his faculties by animated yet friendly debate; and he sought for no substitute in society, but resolved to turn the deprivation into a benefit, by a more arduous application to his literary pursuits, and by cultivating habits of meditation. "I now," said he, in a letter to his father, "find retirement prodigiously sweet, and here I am entirely uninterrupted and left to my own thoughts." In this disposition he commenced and concluded the session.

By the time Mr Hall had thus completed his academical course, his mental powers, originally strong, had attained an extraordinary vigour; and, with the exception of the Hebrew language, of which he then knew nothing, he had become rich in literary, intellectual, and biblical acquisition. On resuming his labours at Broadmead, in conjunction with Dr Evans, his preaching excited an unusual attention, the place of worship was often crowded to excess, and many of the most distinguished men in Bristol, including several clergymen, were among his occasional auditors.

This popularity not only continued, but increased, until he removed to another sphere of action. The brilliancy and force of his eloquence were universally acknowledged, while, in private life, his instructive and fascinating conversation drew equal admiration. Yet it ought not to be concealed (for I simply announce his own deliberate conviction, frequently expressed in after life) that at this time he was very inadequately qualified for the duties of a minister of the gospel. He had, it is true, firmly embraced and cordially relied upon those fundamental truths which are comprehended in the declaration,—"He that cometh unto God must believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him: and he often expatiated, with much originality and beauty, upon the divine attributes, and constantly exhorted men to adhere closely to the path of duty; yet, not often from the higher, namely, the evangelical motives, to pure, and benevolent, and holy conduct. His knowledge of Christianity, as a system of restoration and reconciliation, was comparatively defective and obscure; and he felt but little alive to those peculiarities of the new dispensation, upon which, in maturer life, he loved to dwell. In his preaching he dealt too much in generalities, or enlarged upon topics which, though in a certain sense noble and inspiring, and thus calculated to elevate the mind, did not immediately flow from the great scheme of redemption, which it was his especial office to disclose. The extent of God's matchless love and mercy—the depth of the mystery of his designs—the inexhaustible treasury of his blessings and graces—the wonderful benefits flowing from the incarnation, humiliation, and sacrifice of the Son of God—the delightful privileges of the saints—were themes to which he recurred far less frequently than in later days; and he persuaded himself that this was not very wrong, because his colleague, Dr Evans, who had "the care of the church," adverted so incessantly to the doctrines of our Lord's divinity and atonement, of spiritual influence and regeneration, as to leave room for him to explore other regions of instruction and interest.

It is possible that Mr Hall, from his habit of self-depreciation, may have a little overcharged this picture: yet the notes of several of his sermons, preached from 1785 to 1789, taken down by one of the congregation, and which are now in my possession, confirm, to a considerable extent, the existence of the serious defect which he subsequently so much deplored.

Considering his early age, twenty-one, it was manifestly unfavourable to the correct development of his character as a preacher, that in August 1785, only three months after his quitting Aberdeen, he was appointed classical tutor in the Bristol Academy, on the resignation of Mr Newton. That additional appointment he held for more than five years, and discharged its duties with marked zeal and activity, and with commensurate success. At this period of his life he was celebrated as a satirist, and would overwhelm such of his associates as tempted him to the use of those formidable weapons, with wit and raillery, not always playful. Aware, however, that this propensity was calculated to render him unamiable, and to give permanent pain to others, (a result which the generosity of his disposition made him anxious to avoid), he endeavoured to impose a restraint upon himself, by writing the essay on the "Character of Cleander," in which he exposes, with just severity, that species of sarcasm to which he believed himself most prone; and thus, by its publication, gave to others the opportunity, when he slid into this practice, of reproving him in his own language.

It seems to have been remarkably, and doubtless mercifully, overruled, that, during this period of Mr Hall's history, though his more judicious and wise friends were often grieved by the free and daring speculations which he advanced in private, he never promulgated direct and positive error from the pulpit. And thus they who were filled with apprehension on account of sallies in conversation, would listen with delight to his public addresses. This will be evinced by a few extracts from the journals of two of his constant friends.

Mr Fuller writes. "1784, May 7. Heard Mr Robert Hall, Jun., from 'He that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow.' Felt very solemn in hearing some parts.—The Lord keep that young man!"

Again, "1785, June 14. Taken up with the company of Mr Robert Hall, Jun.; feel much pain for him. The Lord, in mercy to him and his churches in this country, keep him in the path of truth and righteousness."

In like manner, Dr Ryland. "June 8, 1785. Robert Hall, Jun., preached wonderfully from Rom. viii. 18, 'For I reckon that the sufferings of the present time are not worthy to be compared to the glory that shall be revealed in us.' I admire many things in this young man exceedingly, though there are others that make me fear for him. O that the Lord may keep him humble, and make him prudent!"

Again, "June 15. Rode to Clipston to attend the ministers' meeting. R. Hall, Jun., preached a glorious sermon, on the immutability of God, from James i. 17, 'The father of lights, with whom is no variableness, nor shadow of turning.'"

Again, "1786, June 13. Sent off a letter to Robert Hall, Jun., which I wrote chiefly in answer to one of his some months ago, wherein he replied to mine concerning some disagreeable reports from Birmingham: added some new hints respecting another matter lately reported. O that God may keep that young man in the way of truth and holiness."

It hence appears that Dr Ryland, who was nearly twelve years older than Mr Hall, and had known him from his childhood, did not rest satisfied with silent lamentations. This excellent man, fearing that his young friend was about to precipitate himself into a very dangerous course, sought by kind but strong expostulation to rescue him from the peril; and thus addressed him.

"MY VERY DEAR FRIEND,

"The fullest consciousness that I have a right to call you so, as really feeling an earnest and tender concern for your welfare, and the recollection that you apparently allowed it when I last saw you, encourages me to write to you; though I may as well tell you at once that I am going to write to you in the same strain of complaint and censure which I have been constrained to use before. And indeed my fears and grief were never excited to such a degree concerning you as they now are. I still hope, however, you have much love to God; and I trust so much conviction of my sincere friendship, that you will not say of me as one said of Micaiah, 'I hate him, for he is always saying evil of me.' Indeed, the things that grieve me I shall industriously conceal from every body as long as I can; but I fear they will spread fast enough: for if you openly utter all your mind, there are not many who will mourn in secret over the report.

"It gave me extreme uneasiness to hear, this week, of the general disgust you had given to your former friends at Birmingham, on your last visit. Verily I wish that neither you, nor I, nor others, may fight for the truth with infernal weapons. I would wish to feel in my inmost soul the tenderest pity for the most erroneous men in the world, and to show all proper respect to men of science, and men who are regular in their outward conduct. Nor should I at all approve of violent or harsh language, or like to speak my opinion of the state of individuals. But at the same time I cannot but think, that the lusts of the mind may as effectually ruin a man as 'the lusts of the flesh.' And I must get a good way towards Socinianism myself before I have any strong hope that a Socinian, living and dying such, will see the kingdom of God. When the merciful Jesus declared, 'He that believeth shall be saved,' &c. I cannot believe that he meant simply, that he shall be saved who believes that Jesus was not an impostor, and who believes the Doctrine of the Resurrection. But these two articles are, I believe, the whole of Dr Priestley's Christianity, and if once I were to think this Christianity enough to carry a man to heaven, I should not, I fear, be very strenuous in my endeavours to convince men of the danger of self-righteousness, and the necessity of a reliance on the Atonement. Oh! my dear friend, can I conceive that your mind was deeply impressed with a sense of the divine purity and the justice of God's law, when you could utter so vain and vile a speech as this?"

The Doctor then cites the language imputed to Mr Hall. It implied that if he were the Judge of all, he could not condemn Dr Priestley. After animadverting strongly upon the phrase which he understood was actually employed, he proceeds thus:

"It is, I am sure, not malevolence, but sincere love that makes me jealous of you. May the Lord keep you! I wish you would look over afresh the Epistle to the Galatians, and examine whether your charity is as chaste as Paul's. I allude to a proverb you have doubtless heard—'Charity is an angel, while she rejoiceth in the truth, a harlot when she rejoiceth in iniquity;'—embracing those whom she should rather pity and weep over.

"Study to enter into the very spirit of Paul's discourse, 1 Cor. i. 18—31, or Gal. ii. 15—21; and if this is consistent with supposing it would be unfair for God to punish any man for rejecting the Gospel, who understood chemistry and philosophy, why, then retain your favourable opinion of the safety of Socinians.

"Receive this as a proof of the affection with which I am
"Your faithful friend,
"J. Ryland."

Many high-spirited young men, we can readily imagine, would have treated such a letter as this with contempt; while others would have replied to it in a lofty tone of surprise and indignation. But Dr Ryland's young friend, notwithstanding the errors into which his impetuosity had hurried him, had too much generosity to regard as insulting what he knew was dictated by affection; and therefore, anxious to show that he could bear reproof, and be thankful for it, he promptly replied:

"My dear Friend,

"I have just received your letter, and think it of so much importance as to deserve an immediate answer. Accordingly, without the least delay, I have set myself to reply to it. I am exceedingly obliged to you for your friendly expostulation, because I know it is the effusion of a pious and benevolent heart that wishes me well. With respect to the conversation at Birmingham, to which you allude, I shall conceal nothing."

He then, at the same time that he denies the precise language that was imputed to him, states what he did really say: and aims to justify the sentiment which he had maintained: disclaiming, however, any approximation to Socinian doctrine.

"You seem to suspect that I am far gone in Socinianism; but, in this, my dear friend, give me leave to say, you are utterly mistaken. Since I first began to reflect, I do not recollect a time when I was less inclined to Socinianism than at present. I can truly say, it would remove from me all my salvation and all my desire."

Again, reverting to the expression employed, he adds:—"Allowing it to be improper or too strong, I can only say, it does not belong to all to speak equally temperately; that the crime of expression can only be judged from the feelings, and that I am certain I did not utter it with any lightness of heart, but with deep feelings of earnestness and sincerity. Your charge of imprudence I cordially admit; and now see, with more clearness than I formerly did, that the imprudent should never come into company with the malicious.

"I had more to say; but have no room. I sincerely thank you for your letter, and shall always be extremely grateful for your correspondence, your good wishes, and your prayers.

"Believe me, as ever, affectionately yours,
"R. Hall, junior."

These letters would not have been inserted after the lapse of fifty years, but for the salutary lesson which they supply. If christian friendship always manifested itself in such fidelity as is here evinced, and uniformly experienced so kind and ingenuous a reception, what a different aspect, in a few years, would the Christian world assume!

When Mr Hall was about twenty-three years of age, he had an opportunity of hearing Mr Robinson, his predecessor at Cambridge, preach; and was so fascinated with his manner, as to resolve to imitate it. But, after a few trials, he relinquished the attempt. The circumstance being afterwards alluded to, he observed, "Why, sir, I was too proud to remain an imitator. After my second trial, as I was walking home, I heard one of the congregation say to another, 'Really, Mr Hall did remind us of Mr Robinson!' That, sir, was a knock-down-blow to my vanity; and I at once resolved that if ever I did acquire reputation, it should be my own reputation, belong to my own character, and not be that of a likeness. Besides, sir[*], if I had not been a foolish young man, I should have seen how ridiculous it was to imitate such a preacher as Mr Robinson. He had a musical voice, and was master of all its intonations; he had wonderful self-possession, and could say what he pleased, when he pleased, and how he pleased; while my voice and manner were naturally bad; and far from having self-command, I never entered the pulpit, without omitting to say something that I wished to say, and saying something that I wished unsaid: and, beside all this, I ought to have known that, for me to speak slow was ruin." "Why so?" "I wonder that you, a student of philosophy, should ask such a question. You know, sir, that force, or momentum, is conjointly as the body and velocity; therefore, as my voice is feeble, what is wanted in body must be made up in velocity, or there will not be, cannot be, any impression."

This remark, though thrown off hastily, in unreserved conversation, presents the theory of one important cause of the success of his rapid eloquence.

Shortly after this, Mr Hall was, for the first time, in Mr Robinson's society: I believe in London. Mr Robinson was affluent in flatteries for those who worshipped him, while Mr Hall neither courted flattery, nor scattered its incense upon others. In speaking of the Socinian controversy, the elder indulged in sarcasm upon "juvenile defenders of the faith," and made various efforts "to set the young man down," which tempted Mr Hall to reply that "if he ever rode into the field of public controversy, he should not borrow Dr Abbadie's boots." This enigmatical retort[†] Mr Robinson understood, and probably felt more than Mr Hall had anticipated; for he had about that time quitted the field, put off "the boots," and passed to the verge of Socinianism. In the course of some discussions that followed, Mr Hall, as most of those who were present thought, completely exposed the dangerous sophistry by which Mr Robinson endeavoured to explain away some very momentous truths. Mr Robinson, perceiving that the stream of opinion fell in with the arguments of his young opponent, and vexed at being thus foiled, lost his usual placidity and courtesy, and suddenly changed the topic of conversation, saying, "the company may be much better employed than by listening to a raw school-boy, whose head is crammed with Scotch metaphysics." Nothing but a consciousness that the "raw school-boy" had defeated him, would have thus thrown him off his guard.

In 1788, Mr Hall, weary of the solitude to which he was often subjected, as a mere lodger, and anticipating marriage in the course of a few months (an anticipation, however, which was not realized), hired a house; his sister Mary, afterwards Mrs James, kindly consenting to superintend his domestic concerns. From a letter which he then wrote to his father, I extract a few passages.

"We have a great deal of talk here about the slave-trade; as I understand from your letter, you have had too. A petition has been sent from hence to parliament for the abolishing it; and a committee is formed to co-operate with that in London, in any measures that may be taken to promote their purpose. At Bristol much opposition is made by the merchants and their dependants, who are many, perhaps most of them engaged in it. Our petition was signed by eight hundred, or upwards; which, considering that no application has been made to any, we think a great number. Many things have been written in the papers on both sides: some pieces I have written myself, under the signature Britannicus[‡], which I purpose to get printed in a few pamphlets, and shall send one of them to you. The injustice and inhumanity of the trade are glaring, and upon this ground I mainly proceed: upon the policy of abolishing it I treat lightly, because I am dubious about it; nor can it be of great consequence to the question in hand; for, if it be proved cruel and unjust, it is impious to defend it." . . . . .

"I am afraid the abolition will not take place speedily, if at all. The trading and mercantile interest will make great outcry; the scheme will be thought chimerical, and after producing a few warm speeches, will, I fear, die away."

[*] Mr Hall very frequently repeated the word, Sir, in his conversation; especially if he became animated.

[†] The allusion was to the defence of the divinity of our Lord, published in French, by Dr Abbadie, in his "Vindication of the Truth of the Christian Religion;" a work from which Mr Robinson was thought to have borrowed many of the arguments in his "Plea for the Divinity," &c. without acknowledgement.

[‡] These I have not been able to procure.

* * * * *

"My own temper, I know needs some correction, and it will be my daily endeavour to mend it: it wants gentleness. Mr M——— has done me much good by convincing me, from his own example, to what perfection a temper naturally keen and lofty may be carried."

* * * * *

"So far, I am happy that my duty and my gratification lie in the same direction; so that every step I take towards improvement may be a step towards real pleasure. One inconvenience, indeed, I labour under with respect to my temper, by being connected with my sister; and that is, she never tries it."

A serious trial of another kind, now, however, awaited Mr Hall—a painful misunderstanding between him and his friend and colleague Dr Evans. It continued not only to disturb the minds of both, but, as might be expected, to create partisans among their respective friends, and indeed to endanger the peace of the church at Broadmead, for more than two years. I have read various written papers, and some pamphlets, which relate to this painful affair; and cannot but conclude that, like many others, it originated in such trifling misconceptions, as, in more felicitous circumstances, neither party would have suffered to disturb his thoughts for an hour. A few hasty expressions, retorted by others both hasty and strong, tempted the doctor and his friends to accuse Mr Hall of ingratitude, and a want of deference to his superior in age and station; he, in his turn, repelled the accusation, in language too natural to a young man glowing with a lofty spirit of independence; and thus, new charges and fresh recriminations arose. The interposition of friends availed but little; for their unhallowed passions became ignited too. After many months spent in this unseemly strife, a meeting between the belligerent parties was held, in the presence of two friends of each, at the Mansion House, the Mayor of Bristol being one of the persons chosen by Dr Evans. No beneficial effects resulted from this meeting; the individuals, who hoped by their interposition to ensure the restoration of amity, having long before ceased to be impartial judges in the affair. The parties on both sides, who were convened on this occasion, published their respective statements; from which it appears that one of them thought Mr Hall justifiable, and censured Dr Evans; while the other approved of the doctor's conduct, and condemned that of Mr Hall.

It will not, then, be expected, that I should draw from the obscurity which time has cast over them, more particulars relating to this unhappy collision. Nor, indeed, should I have adverted to it, had it not operated strongly in preparing Mr Hall for his removal from Bristol. Whatever regret it might occasion him, on subsequent meditation, it excited no self-reproach, nor left any malevolent feeling. On the decease of Dr Evans, which took place in 1791, his former colleague prepared an inscription for his monument; and he wrote the following letter to his brother-in-law, Mr Isaac James, in reply to that which announced the doctor's death.

"Cambridge, Aug. 12, 1791.

"DEAR BROTHER,

"The contents of your letter received this day have affected me more than almost any thing of thekind I ever met with in my life. It is in all points of view a most solemn event; but, from obvious circumstances, to me it cannot fail of being peculiarly so. It is truly affecting to recollect the friendship that so long subsisted betwixt us, and that it should end so unhappily in a breach that admits of no repair, no remedy!! Yet, though I feel most pungently upon this occasion, I am happy to be able to join with you in declaring that my conscience is not loaded with guilt. Abating too much of an unhappy violence, I have the mens conscia recti. Were the circumstances to occur again, a breach would, as before, be inevitable. But though, in justice to myself, I say thus much, there is no one more disposed to lament the deceased than myself, or who has a truer sensibility of the real virtues of his character. I have written to Mr Higgs, and therefore I need say the less to you upon these melancholy topics. The chief purpose, indeed, of my troubling you at present, is to request you will be so kind as to give me the earliest and most particular account of every thing that passes at his funeral; the persons present, the sermon, the impression of the event, deep no doubt and awful, the whole state of things at Bristol, their future prospects and intentions, every thing relating to these matters that you know. The situation of the family and the church, though I doubt not I am the object of their joint abhorrence, I most sincerely compassionate. May God guide and comfort them. I think you and all my friends ought now to bury all that is past, and renew a connexion with the church, if their temper will permit you. My friends will most oblige me by carrying it respectfully to the doctor's family and memory. 'Anger may glance into the bosom of a wise man, but it rests only in the bosom of fools;' and our best improvement of the death of this useful servant of God, will be to imitate his excellencies and forget his errors. Pray write as soon as possible. I shall be extremely impatient till I hear. I am, dear brother,

"Your affectionate brother,
"To Mr Isaac James." "R. HALL."

Before this time it was generally apprehended that Mr Hall's sentiments had, on some momentous points, deviated considerably from the accredited standards of even moderate orthodoxy; and he had given much pain to some of his baptist friends on account of his views with regard to re-baptizing. Some correspondence took place between him and the Broadmead Church, on these subjects: and, as well that the sentiments he then really held may be known, as that the extent of his declension into positive error, may be judged of from his own language, I shall here insert the frank exposition of his opinions, which he addressed to the church when he was on the eve of dissolving his connexion with it.

"Thursday, Dec. 9, 1790.

"MY DEAR BRETHREN,

"Every token of your respect and attachment sensibly affects me; and, as you have requested me to explain myself on those sentiments to which I alluded as reasons of separation, I think it a duty I owe to myself and to you to give you all the satisfaction in my power.

"1st. In the first place, I am a firm believer in the proper divinity of Jesus Christ; in the merits of Christ as the sole ground of acceptance in the sight of God, without admitting works to have any share in the great business of justification; and in the necessity of divine influence to regenerate and sanctify the mind of every man, in order to his becoming a real Christian. Thus far in the affirmative.

"2dly. In the second place, I am not a Calvanist, in the strict and proper sense of that term. I do not maintain the federal headship of Adam, as it is called, or the imputation of his sin to his posterity; and this doctrine I have always considered, and do still consider, as the foundation of that system. I believe we have received from our first parents, together with various outward ills, a corrupt and irregular bias of mind; but, at the same time, it is my firm opinion, that we are liable to condemnation only for our own actions, and that guilt is a personal and individual thing. I believe in the doctrine of the Divine Decrees, and of course in the predestination of all events, of which the number of the finally saved is one. But this appears to me a different thing from the doctrine of absolute election and reprobation, as it has ever been explained by Calvinists, which does not meet my approbation. Without going into a large field of metaphysical discussion, this is all I think it requisite to say respecting my orthodoxy; but there are two other points which have occasioned a good deal of conversation, and from some quarters a good deal of censure; upon which I shall therefore beg leave to explain myself in a few words.

"3dly. I am, and have been for a long time, a materialist, though I have never drawn your attention to this subject in my preaching: because I have always considered it myself, and wished you to consider it, as a mere metaphysical speculation. My opinion, however, upon this head is, that the nature of man is simple and uniform; that the thinking powers and faculties are the result of a certain organization of matter; and that after death he ceases to be conscious until the resurrection."

"Much has been said upon my opinions respecting Baptism, and I am happy to have this opportunity of explaining my sentiments on that subject in particular, as it affects not only the propriety of my former relation to this church, but of any future connexion I may form with any other Christian society. On this point much mistake, much representation, I hope not voluntarily, has taken place; and on this account I trust you will excuse my dwelling upon it a little more particularly than its importance in other respects might seem to justify. It has been held out to the world by some, that I am not a Baptist. I am, both in respect to the subject and to the mode of this institution, a Baptist. To apply this ordinance to infants appears to me a perversion of the intention of the sacred institution; and the primitive, the regular, and proper mode of administration, I take to be immersion. Still it appears to me that sprinkling, though an innovation, does not deprive Baptism of its essential validity, so as to put the person that has been sprinkled in adult age upon a footing with the unbaptized. The whole of my sentiments amounts to this,—I would not myself baptize in any other manner than by immersion, because I look upon immersion as the ancient mode, that it best represents the meaning of the original term employed, and the substantial import of this institution; and because I should think it right to guard against the spirit of innovation, which in positive rites is always dangerous and progressive: but I should not think myself authorized to rebaptize any one who has been sprinkled in adult age. I shall only remark, in addition to what I have already said upon this point, that if it be a sufficient objection to my union with a Baptist congregation; then, as all Christendom is composed of Baptists or Pædobaptists, it amounts to my exclusion, as a minister, from every Christian society throughout the whole earth: an interdict equally absurd and inhuman, founded upon a conduct merely negative in chimerical situations seldom or never likely to occur.

"I have thus, in compliance with your wishes, and with all the perspicuity in my power, in a few words explained to you my religious opinions, with a more particular view to the subjects on which I may be supposed most to err: and this avowal I have made, partly as a testimony of the respect I bear you, and partly to vindicate my character from any suspicion of ambiguity or reserve; but not at all with the remotest wish to win popularity or to court your suffrages; for at present it is as little in my power to accept any invitation to continue, as it may be in your inclination to give it, as I hold myself engaged in honour as a probationer for six months to a respectable society at Cambridge. May peace and prosperity attend you. I am, your friend and brother,

"With the greatest respect,
"R. HALL."

The vexations and perplexities in which Mr Hall has been for some time involved, doubtless facilitated his removal to another sphere of action. And he who duly meditates upon the way in which the great Head of the Church renders the movements of his providence subservient to his merciful purposes in redemption, will, I am persuaded, trace the superintending hand on this occassion.

Mr Robinson, the pastor of the church at Cambridge, with which Mr Hall was now about to be connected, was a man of extensive powers, of some genius, and of considerable industry and research. Fascinating as a preacher, delightful as a companion, perseveringly skilful in the insinuation of his sentiments, his influence could not but be great. From the profession of orthodox opinions, he had passed by a rather rapid transition, not to Socinianism, but far beyound, to the very borders of infidelity; such, at least, was the substance of his declaration to Dr Priestley, whom he thanked for preserving him from that awful gulf. Vain speculation was substituted for knowledge, faith and experience; confession, and prayer, but seldom made a part of the public worship which he conducted, his effusions before sermon consisting almost altogether of ascriptions of praise; and the congregation became so transformed and deteriorated, in consequence, that, among the more intelligent classes, with only two or three exceptions, "he was esteemed the best Christian who was most skilled in disputation," not he who evinced most of "the spirit of Christ." The majority of the poorer members, however, escaped the contagion, and were ready to co-operate with the late Mr Foster, who was then the senior deacon, and another of the deacons, who equally deplored the evils which had fallen upon them. Cordially attached to those doctrines which they regarded as fundamental, and therefore as constituting the basis of church union, they were preparing to call upon the whole body to consider the expediency of requesting Mr Robinson to resign, when his sudden death at Birmingham, just after he had been preaching in Dr Priestley's pulpit, rendered such a measure unnecessary. On the news of this event reaching Cambridge, Mr Foster, who was then on his death-bed, made it his last request to some of the most influential men in the church, that they would never consent to the appointment of a Socinian as Mr Robinson's successor.

From this account of the state of the church at Mr Robinson's decease, it will appear how difficult it was to select a successor who would be approved by all; how difficult, also, for that successor to walk steadily in the path of duty.

Mr Hall, who by this time had attained a high reputation as a preacher, was invited, in June or July 1790, to preach at Cambridge for one month; after which the invitation was renewed for a longer term. In July the following year, he was invited to take the pastoral charge: the letter, announcing his acceptance of the important trust, is already before the public.

In these transactions and their consequences still unfolding, the wisdom and mercy of God are strikingly manifested. There was at that time no man of eminence among the Baptists, besides Mr Hall, who could for a moment have been thought of by the church at Cambridge as a fit successor to Mr Robinson; nor was there any Baptist church and congregation with which he could become connected, with the same prospect of being useful and happy, according to the views he then entertained. Had Mr Hall's religious principles and feelings been such in 1790 and 1791, as they became a few years afterwards, not even his talents would have made them palateable; and a connexion, had it been formed, would soon have been dissolved: on the other hand, had the church been decidedly and entirely socinianized, he could not conscientiously have become its pastor. The providential correlation soon began to show itself. Their looseness of sentiments on many points, which even then he thought momentous, led him to enforce them frequently with the utmost energy; while his known freedom of opinion on other points, which they also had been led to canvass freely, preserved him from the odium of orthodoxy. Thinking themselves liberal, and unshackled, they could not but congratulate one another that their new pastor, a man of splendid talents, was almost as liberal and unshackled as they were. Then again, their want of devotional seriousness, by the force of contrast, heightened his estimate of the value of true piety; and this produced an augmented earnestness and fidelity, which they first learnt to tolerate, and afterwards to admire. Thus, by the operation of an incessant action and re-action, continued for years, each party exerted a salutary influence on the other; and at length both church and pastor became so distinguished for piety, harmony and affection, that they, who had known and lamented their former state, were compelled to exclaim, "This hath God wrought."

The death of Mr Hall's father, which occurred in March 1791, had indeed tended greatly to bring his mind to the state of serious thought with which he entered upon the pastoral office. Meditating with the deepest veneration upon the unusual excellencies of a parent now for ever lost to him, he was led to investigate, with renewed earnestness, the truth as well as value of those high and sacred principles, from which his eminent piety and admirable consistency, so evidently flowed. He called to mind, too, several occasions on which his father, partly by the force of reason, partly by that of tender expostulation, had exhorted him to abandon the vague and dangerous speculations to which he was prone. Some important changes in Mr Hall's sentiments resulted from an inquiry conducted under such solemn impressions; and among these may be mentioned his renunciation of materialism, which he often declared he "buried in his father's grave."

Attentive to the voice of heavenly admonition, thus addressing him from various quarters, he entered upon his new duties with earnest desires that he might be able "to commend himself to every man's conscience in the sight of God." Feeling that to him was consigned the charge of transforming, with God's assistance, a cold and sterile soil into a fruitful field, he determined not to satisfy himself with half measures, but proceeded to expose error, and defend what he regarded as essential truth. The first sermon, therefore, which he delivered at Cambridge, after he had assumed the office of pastor, was on the doctrine of the atonement, and its practical tendencies. Immediately after the conclusion of the service, one of the congregation, who had followed poor Mr Robinson through all his changes of sentiment, went into the vestry, and said, "Mr Hall, this preaching won't do for us: it will only suit a congregation of old women." "Do you mean my sermon, sir, or the doctrine?" "Your doctrine." "Why is it that the doctrine is fit only for old women?" "Because it may suit the musings of people tottering upon the brink of the grave, and who are eagerly seeking comfort." "Thank you, sir, for your concession. The doctrine will not suit people of any age, unless it be true; and if it be true, it is not fitted for old women alone, but is equally important at every age."

This individual, and three or four other men of influence, with about twenty from the poorer classes, shortly afterwards withdrew from the congregation, and met together on the Sunday evenings at a private house. The then Rev. William Frend, fellow and tutor of Jesus College, an avowed Socinian, became their religious instructor. This separate assembly, however, did not continue many months; for the person at whose house they met, was, ere long, taken up and tried for sedition, and convicted; and the proceedings against Mr Frend, on account of his pamphlet entitled, "Peace and Union," which for so long a time kept the University of Cambridge in a state of great agitation, and which ended in his expulsion from it, drew away his attention from the little band of seceders.

Mr Hall's ministerial labours, at this interesting period of his life, were blessed with the happiest results, when the benefit seemed likely to be for a while suspended by the intrusion of violent political discussion. The impression made throughout Europe by the French revolution of 1789, was such, that not merely here and there an individual indulged in political speculation, but almost every man threw himself into the vortex of controversy. The clergy of every order and station, the laity of every rank and class, yielded alike to the impulsion; and he who did not declare his decided and cordial adhesion to one or other of the contending parties, might expect the censure of both for his want of spirit or of principle. Cambridge, hitherto characterized as the whig university, was, at this epoch, split into the most violent party divisions, and the public was deluged with sermons from the pulpit, and pamphlets from the press, in which the respective advocates of "things as they are," and of "things as they should be," defended their opposite views with the utmost zeal, and too often with the most unbecoming rancour.

At such a season Mr Hall, then under thirty years of age, was not likely to maintain an entire silence. When a man's quiescence was sufficient to render his principles equivocal, he was certainly not one who would make a secret of his opinions. He thought that political ethics had almost ceased to be referable to any principle of pure ethics. He hesitated not to avow that the grand object of all good government must be to promote the happiness of the governed, to assist every individual in its attainment and security. He regarded a government chiefly anxious about the emoluments of office, or aiming to consolidate its own power at home, and to aid the efforts of despots abroad, while it neglected the comfort and welfare of individuals in middle or lower life, whose burdens it augmented by a mistaken course, as a government that should be constitutionally opposed by every lawful means.

He gave to such subjects, also, more than political considerations. He looked upon those European governments which were founded on oppression, and trampled on the natural rights of man, as operating most fatally in the extinction of light and virtue. He regarded the conditions of those who tyrannize, and of those who are the objects of tyranny, as each productive of a numerous and distinct class of vices; and thought that the consequent darkness, ignorance and criminality of the general mass under despotic governments, in great measure, if not entirely, incapacitated them for the pure and elevated enjoyments of heaven. It was hence a permanent conviction of his mind, "that he who is instrumental in perpetuating a corrupt and wicked government, is also instrumental in unfitting his fellow-men for the felicity of the celestial mansions." Could it then be matter of surprise that, believing and feeling all this, he should exult when "the empire of darkness and of despotism had been smitten with a stroke which sounded through the universe;" or, when other ministers of the gospel were signalizing themselves by opposing this view of things, that he should, for a short interval, be drawn aside from pursuits more congenial with his prevailing tastes, and, in some important respects, I think, more compatible with his holy calling, and at once endeavour to prove that "Christianity is consistent with a love of freedom," and that true Christianity will prevail most where genuine freedom is most diffused and best understood?

Cordial, however, as was Mr. Hall's attachment to a cause in which he conceived man's best interests to be closely interwoven, and strong as was his hatred of despotic measures, or what he regarded as such, either at home or abroad, I do not think that even their joint operation would have overcome his repugnance to writing, had it not been for skilful abettors, who first worked upon his feelings, and then extorted from him the promise of preparing a work for the public. Such, if I have not been misinformed, was the origin of his first political pamphlet; and such, I know, from his own declaration, often repeated, was the origin of the eloquent and powerful "Apology for the Freedom of the Press." The evening after the event occurred, to which he alludes in the "Apology," he attended a periodical meeting of a book society, constituted principally of members of his own congregation, and of Mr Simeon's, and usually denominated Alderman Ind's Club, that distinguished ornament of Mr Simeon's congregation being the treasurer. Every person present expressed himself in terms of the strongest indignation at the insult offered to Mr Musgrave; every one thought it highly desirable that some man of talent at Cambridge should advocate the principles maintained by the friends of liberty, especially of those who avowed evangelical sentiments, and the necessity for their united activity, in the present state of the country and of Europe. Mr Hall spoke as decidedly as any of them with regard to the urgent necessities of the case; when they all, having brought him precisely into the position at which they were aiming, exclaimed, that it was he to whom alone they could look in this exigency. "Alderman Ind, you know, sir, (said he) was an excellent man; pure as a seraph, and gentle as a lamb. I thought that if he felt roused, if he could join with the rest in urging me, I might bring all hesitation to a truce; and so, in an evil hour, I yielded to their entreaties. I went home to my lodgings and began to write immediately; sat up all night; and, wonderful for me, kept up the intellectual ferment for almost a month; and then the thing was done. I revised it a little as it went through the press; but I have ever since regretted that I wrote so hastily and superficially upon some subjects brought forward, which required touching with a master-hand, and exploring to their very foundations. So far as I understand the purely political principles which are advanced in that pamphlet, they are, I believe, correct: at all events, they are mine still. But, I repeat it, I yielded in an evil hour; especially if I had any wish to obtain permanent reputation as a political writer. Perhaps, however, the pamphlet had its use in those perilous times." Such was Mr Hall's account of this publication. How far it indicates the spirit of self-depreciation, in which, almost through life, he characterized his own productions, they who are best acquainted with the "Apology" will be most competent to decide; unless, indeed, their prepossessions and prejudices should disqualify them for deciding aright.

But, whatever might be Mr Hall's opinion of this work, it does not seem to have been regarded by the public as of little value. Three editions were called for, I believe, within less than six months; and then, the author not sanctioning a republication, various editions were printed and circulated surreptitiously. Its more splendid and impressive passages were repeatedly quoted in the periodicals of the day, and many of its arguments were cited as perfectly conclusive. It was also widely circulated in America; and is there still regarded as having been powerfully influential in diffusing those liberal political principles, which, of late, have acquired so marked an ascendancy in Britain.

Mr Hall, however, experienced such inconveniences from his political celebrity, as induced him to recede, not from his principles, or from the avowal of them in private, but from the farther advocacy of them in public. It forced upon him the society of men whose conduct and character he could not approve; it tended to draw him, much more than he could conscientiously justify, from retirement and study; and thus, ere long, he became of opinion, to adopt his own words, "that the Christian ministry is in danger of losing something of its energy and sanctity, by embarking on the stormy element of political debate." His elegant eulogium on Dr Priestly, in his first pamphlet, and the warm terms of admiration in which he used to speak of him in private, tempted many to fancy and to say that he, also, was a Socinian in heart; and although his preaching became more and more distinguished by the introduction and energetic application of evangelical truth, he still found himself often so equivocally placed, as to render his denial of Socinianism quite imperative. On one of these occasions, Mr Hall having, in his usual terms, panegyrized Dr Priestly, a gentleman who held the doctor's theological opinions, tapping Mr Hall upon the shoulder with an indelicate freedom from which he recoiled, said, "Ah! sir, we shall have you among us soon, I see." Mr Hall, startled and offended by the rude tone of exultation in which this was uttered, hastily replied, "Me amongst you, sir! me amongst you! Why if that were ever the case, I should deserve to be tied to the tail of the great red dragon, and whipped round the nethermost regions to all eternity!"

Notwithstanding the reasons Mr Hall thus had for some degree of reserve, yet in this, as in every period of his life, he displayed a remarkable relish for social intercourse. He did not court the society of literary men; indeed, he rather shrunk from it, because he felt the risk of having his thoughts too much engrossed by mere matters of language or of science: he had acquired enough of both to value them greatly; yet he desired to regard them principally as subservient to the higher purposes of his profession. Besides this, the philosophy of mind, in which he took extreme interest, was then but little cultivated at Cambridge. Happily, however, the leading individuals in his congregation were very intelligent and well-informed, able to appreciate his talents justly, and skilful in bringing his conversational powers into full action. With one or other of these he usually spent his evenings, selecting most frequently those who possessed the enjoyments of domestic life, and often stealing in earlier than he was expected, that he might for an hour, share in the gambols and gaiety of the children.

He was, but only for a short time, an imitator of Dr Johnson. Some years afterwards, when reminded of this, he replied—"Yes, sir, I aped Johnson, and I preached Johnson; and I am afraid with little more of evangelical sentiment than is to be found in his Essays: but it was youthful folly, and it was very great folly. I might as well have attempted to dance a hornpipe in the cumbrous costume of Gog and Magog. My puny thoughts could not sustain the load of the words in which I tried to clothe them."

There needed not, in truth, the principle of imitation, to produce great similiarity in some important respects between these two extraordinary men. They manifested the physical difference between a melancholic and a cheerful temperament; in consequence of which, the one was slow and measured in utterance, the other rapid and urgent. But, in conversation, both evinced a ready comprehension of the whole subject, a quick and decisive accuracy in answering, and a perfect self-dependence. They both disliked a protracted debate, and would sometimes terminate a discussion, when it was growing tiresome, by a strong and pointed observation which it was difficult to encounter. Both were alike in exhibiting a rather more than ordinary degree of faith in things of a preternatural or mysterious description. In both, too, there were the similarities of acute intellect united with splendid imagination; and of a natural majesty of mental and moral genius which commanded veneration. But, in the correction of his faults, and the improvement of his virtues, Mr Hall possessed, in his superior piety, an immense advantage over Dr Johnson.

In argument he was impetuous, and sometimes overbearing; but if he lost his temper he was deeply humbled, and would often acknowledge himself to blame. On one of these occasions, when a discussion had become warm, and he had evinced unusual agitation, he suddenly closed the debate, quitted his seat, and retiring to a remote part of the room, was overheard by a lady who was just entering, to ejaculate with deep feeling, "Lamb of God! Lamb of God! calm my perturbed spirit!"

Mr Hall's personal habits, not only at the time of which I am now speaking, but in a certain degree through life, though not precisely those of an absent man, were those of one whose mental occupations kept his thoughts at a distance from various matters of ordinary observance, and made him regardless of a thousand things which most persons never forget. Thus on his return from an evening visit, if not watched, he would take a wrong hat or great coat;—if not sought after by some of the congregation, he would mistake the proper evening of a week-day service, having in such cases been so absorbed in study, as to lose a day in his reckoning;—for the same reason, he often mistook the day or the hour of an appointment;—when on any of his journeys to London he engaged to take up the letters of his friends, it was not unusual, after his return, to find them all in his portmanteau, or in his great-coat pocket. These, or similar instances of forgetfulness, occurred daily; but, exciting the attention of his affectionate and watchful friends, they seldom exposed him to serious inconvenience.

None of these peculiarities sprung from an affectation of singularity; they simply marked an inattention to things of minor importance. Nor was there united with them a regardlessness of the proprieties of society, a disdain of such civilities and attentions as were usual in the classes with whom he most associated. He had never aimed to acquire a facility in the manners and habits of genteel life; but he had a native ease and grace, which was obviously distinguishable from any acquired habit. It was a grace that could neither be bought nor borrowed; on all proper occasions heightened by the dignity which naturally comported with his character and office; and uniformly blended with that genuine simplicity which often accompanies intellectual greatness, and is always, if I mistake not, an attribute of moral greatness.

Several particulars in the preceding account of Mr Hall's first years at Cambridge, will be illustrated by the following brief sketch, which I have received from a gentleman who had the most favourable opportunities, as well as the requisite taste and discrimination, for correctly estimating his character.

"I had but a slight acquaintance with Robert Hall from 1790 to 1793: from thence to the end of 1796 I knew him intimately. At that period his creed was imperfect, wanting the personality of the Holy Spirit, and wavering between the terrors of Calvin and the plausibilities of Baxter. His infirmities, which were increasing, he concealed with dexterity, opposed with vigour, and sustained with uncommon patience. In his ministerial situation he was far from easy; and he was vehemently severe upon Robinson for leaving his church a wilderness, and bequeathing his successor a bed of thorns.

"His religious conversation in company was not frequent, and for the most part doctrinal; but, in private, his experimental communications were in beauty, elevation, and compass, beyond all I ever heard. The memory of a man of seventy-three will not afford particulars; and the general impression can neither be obliterated nor expressed.

"In his manners he was a close imitator of Dr Johnson; fond of tea-table talk, and of the society of cultivated females, who had the taste to lend him an ear, and the ability requisite to make attention a favour. He has confessed to me the taking of thirty cups of tea in an afternoon, and told me his method was to visit four families and drink seven or eight cups at each.

"He knew, as well as any man, what bad men were, and what good men should be; yet he was often wrong in his judgment of individuals. From this deficiency in the knowledge of mankind, he sometimes trusted his false, and abused his true friends: when he perceived his error he changed his conduct, but, I suspect, very seldom confessed his mistake.

"He did not, then, read much; but was probably more hindered by pain than by indolence. A page, indeed, was to him more serviceable than a volume to many. Hints from reading or discourse, passing through his great mind, expanded into treatises and systems, until the adopted was lost in the begotten; so much so, that the whole appeared original. I am persuaded, however, that when I knew him he had not, by many degrees, attained his meridian. I should regret my incapacity to do him justice, and give you assistance, were I not persuaded that only the bud was exhibited to me, while the bloom and the fruit were reserved for those more deserving to be happy."

I had the privilege of becoming first known to Mr Hall in January 1797. During that year we dined daily at the same table: the next year we met almost every morning to read together: and for some years afterwards scarcely a week passed in which I was not three or four times in his society. When I first became acquainted with him I was young, and ignorant of nearly every thing but the most rudimental knowledge of language and science; of which I possessed just enough to employ as instruments of inquiry. I was eager to acquire information; but ran some risk of turning my mind to that which was useless, or merely showy, instead of directing its best energy to that which was truly valuable. In such circumstances to be allowed the friendship, and enjoy the advice and assistance of such a man, was among my richest blessings. Scarcely a thought worth preserving, scarcely a principle of action worth reducing to practice, scarcely a source of true enjoyment, but I derived from him, or I was led to receive, or to appreciate more correctly through his agency. If then, for some pages, my name should occur more often in immediate association with that of my beloved and revered friend, than may seem consistent with ordinary rules, may I be freed from the charge of egotism? especially, if I assure the reader, that while nothing affords me more pleasure, nothing awakens more gratitude to the Father of Mercies, than the retrospect of the intellectual and higher than intellectual delights which were then mine, few things more humble me than the conviction that though I enjoyed them so long, I suffered them to pass away without commensurate improvement.

Mr Hall kindly admitted me to the privacy of his study, in addition to the advantage of frequent intercourse with him in the society of his friends. Desirous to assist others in forming their estimate of this extraordinary individual, I shall not merely speak of his character, habits and pursuits, but occasionally introduce some of his conversational remarks; confining myself, however, to such as from their brevity always occur to my thoughts in the ipsissima verba originally employed. If I do not succeed in depicting the man, which, indeed, I feel conscious is far beyond my powers, I may at least attempt to describe him as he then appeared to me.

When I first saw Mr Hall I was struck with his well-proportioned athletic figure, the unassuming dignity of his deportment, the winning frankness which marked all that he uttered, and the peculiarities of the most speaking countenance I ever contemplated, animated by eyes radiating with the brilliancy imparted to them by benevolence, wit and intellectual energy. When he spoke, except in the most ordinary chit-chat, to which, however, he seldom descended, he seemed not merely to communicate his words, but himself: and I then first learnt the difference between one who feels while he is speaking, and whose communicative features tell you that he does, and one who after he has spoken long, and with apparent earnestness, still does not feel. I then learnt, also, that, though talents may convey their results to others, and activity may carry on others in its stream; yet there is something distinct in the structure of a great mind which never can be so transferred to another as to become its native characteristic. Mr Hall had a buoyancy and playfulness when among his select friends, which were remarkably captivating. Among strangers there was a reserve for a short time, but it was soon shaken off, especially if he found that they were pious or intelligent. The presence of a man who gave himself airs of condescension, usually induced him to remain silent or to retire. He could enjoy the society of men of moderate information; and it was interesting to observe, how by a few apt questions he would ascertain in what direction their pursuits lay, and then so draw them out as to give them the pleasure of feeling that they were contributing to his stock of that knowledge which they could not but think useful. He was eminently alive to the emotions of pity, an affection always calculated to inspire attachment, but which in a man of abstract habits is, I fear, very unusual. He was generous by nature, as well as upon principle, and in seasons of affliction would remarkably identify himself with those who most needed sympathy. He rather avoided than sought expressions of thankfulness; and sometimes when he became oppressed by them, would hastily say, "Thank you, thank you; you have said more than enough: remember, God has sent into the world a more powerful, a more noble sentiment, than even gratitude."

For some years he made it a rule to pay a pastoral visit to every member of his church, once each quarter. He did the same, also, with regard to such of his ordinary hearers as he thought willing to receive him as a minister of religion. These were not calls, but visits, and usually paid on evenings, that he might meet the whole assembled family. Among the lower classes, to make them quite at their ease, he would sit down with them at supper; and, that this might involve them in no extra expense, he took care that they should all know that he preferred a bason of milk[*].

He persuaded the poorer members of his church to form little meetings, for reading, religious conversation, and prayer, going "from house to house." These were held once a fortnight, I think, in the summer time; once a week during the winter. He made it a point of official duty to attend them frequently; and regarded them, with the weekly meetings in the vestry, as the best thermometer for ascertaining the religious state of his people.

Proceeding thus, it was not surprising that he conciliated the affections of his friends, and secured the veneration of the pious; that he extended around him a growing conviction of his excellency, and carried on many in the stream of his mental and moral power.

In him all was at the utmost remove from gloom or moroseness. Even the raillery in which he indulged, showed his good nature, and was exceedingly playful; and, notwithstanding the avowed and lamented impetuosity in argument to which he was prone, nothing, so far as I ever saw, but conceit, engrafted upon stupidity, provoked his impatience, and called forth a severity which he scarcely knew how to restrain[†]. With regard to disposition, the predominant features were kindness and cheerfulness. He never deliberately gave pain to any one, except in those few extreme cases where there appeared a moral necessity of "rebuking sharply," for the good of the offender. His kindness to children, to servants, to the indigent, nay, to animals, was uniformly manifest. And such was his prevailing cheerfulness that he seemed to move and breathe in an atmosphere of hilarity, which, indeed, his countenance always indicated, except when the pain in his back affected his spirits, and caused his imagination to dwell upon the evils of Cambridgeshire scenery.

This was, in his case, far from a hypothetical grievance. It seriously diminished his happiness at Cambridge, and, at length, was the main cause of his quitting it. In one of my early interviews with him, before I had been a month at that place, he said to me, "What do you think of Cambridge, sir?" "It is a very interesting place." "Yes, the place where Bacon, and Barrow, and Newton studied, and where Jeremy Taylor was born, cannot but be interesting. But that is not what I mean; what do you say to the scenery, sir?" "Some of the public buildings are very striking, and the college walks very pleasing; but—" and there I hesitated: he immediately added—"but there is nothing else to be said. What do you think of the surrounding country, sir? Does not it strike you as very insipid?" "No, not precisely so." "Aye, aye: I had forgotten; you come from a flat country; yet you must love hills; there are no hills here." I replied, "Yes there are; there are Madingley hill, and the Castle hill, and Gogmagog hill." This amused him exceedingly,—and he said, "Why, as to Madingley, there is something in that; it reminds you of the Cottons, and the Cottonian Library; but that is not because Madingley is a high hill, but because Sir Robert Cotton was a great man; and even he was not born there. Then, as to your second example, do you know that the Castle hill is the place of the public executions? that is no very pleasant association, sir; and as to your last example, Gogmagog hill is five miles off, and many who go there are puzzled to say whether it is natural or artificial. 'Tis a dismally flat country, sir; dismally flat[*]. Ely is twelve miles distant, but the road from Cambridge thither scarcely deviates twelve inches from the same level; and that's not very interesting. Before I came to Cambridge, I had read in the prize poems, and in some other works of fancy, of 'the banks of the Cam,' of 'the sweetly flowing stream,' and so on; but when I arrived here, I was sadly disappointed. When I first saw the river as I passed over King's College Bridge, I could not help exclaiming, Why, the stream is standing still to see people drown themselves! and that, I am sorry to say, is a permanent feeling with me." I questioned the correctness of this impression, but he immediately rejoined, "Shocking place for the spirits, sir; I wish you may not find it so; it must be the very focus of suicides. Were you ever at Bristol, sir? there is scenery, scenery worth looking upon, and worth thinking of: and so there is even at Aberdeen, with all its surrounding barrenness. The trees on the banks of the Don are as fine as those on the banks of the Cam; and the river is alive, sir; it falls over precipices, and foams and dashes, so as to invigorate and inspire those who witness it. The Don is a river, sir, and the Severn is a river; but not even a poet would so designate the Cam, unless by an obvious figure he termed it the sleeping river."

The semi-playful and rapid manner in which he uttered things of this kind, did not always conceal the deep feeling of incurable and growing dislike with which he was struggling.

When I first became known to Mr Hall, he had recently determined to revise and extend his knowledge in every department, "to re-arrange the whole furniture of his mind, and the economy of his habits," and to become a thorough student. He proposed devoting six hours a day to reading; but these unless his friends sought after him, were often extended to eight or nine. He thought himself especially defective in a tasteful and critical acquaintance with the Greek poets; and said he should "once more begin at the beginning." He set to work, therefore, upon the best treatises on the Greek metres then extant. He next read the Iliad and Odyssey twice over, critically; proceeded with equal care through nearly all the tragedies of Sophocles and Euripides; and thence extended his classical reading in all directions. To the Latin and Greek poets, orators, historians and philosophers, he devoted a part of every day, for three or four years. He studied them as a scholar, but he studied them also as a moralist and a philosopher; so that while he appreciated their peculiarities and beauties with his wonted taste, and carefully improved his style of writing and his tone of thinking, by the best models which they present, he suffered them not to deteriorate the accuracy of his judgment in comparing their value with that of the moderns. Perhaps, however, this assertion should be a little qualified: for not only at the period of which I am now speaking, but, in great measure, through life, while he spoke of the Greek and Latin poetry, in accordance with the sentiments and feelings of every competent classical scholar, he, with very few exceptions, unduly depreciated the poetry of the present times.

[*] The poorer widows of his flock were not forgotten in these periodical visits. To them, he said, he repaired for religious instruction, and was seldom disappointed. On such occasions he selected his ever favourite repast of tea. It was his practice to carry tea and sugar with him, taking especial care that there should be more than could possibly be needed, and asking permission to leave the remainder behind him.

[†] The following is an instance of his checking inordinate vanity. A preacher of this character having delivered a sermon in Mr Hall's hearing, pressed him, with a disgusting union of self-complacency and indelicacy, to state what he thought of the sermon. Mr Hall remained silent for some time, hoping that his silence would be rightly interpreted; but this only caused the question to be pressed with greater earnestness. Mr Hall at length said, "There was one very fine passage, sir." "I am rejoiced to hear you say so. Pray, sir, which was it?" "Why, sir, it was the passage from the pulpit into the vestry."

[*] On Mr Hall's visit to Cambridge, one of his friends took him out for a morning's ride, and showed him the improvements as to cultivation, by means of new enclosures, &c. "True," said he, "but still there is that odious flatness, that insipid sameness of scenery all around." Then, with a tone of great seriousness, he added, "I always say of my Cambridge friends, when I witness their contentedness in such a country, 'herein is the faith and patience of the saints!' My faith and patience could not sustain me under it, with the unvarying kindness of my friends in addition."

On another morning ride, his companion said, "Look at these fields, with the crops of corn so smooth and so abundant; are not they pleasant? And do they not excite the idea of plenty?" He rejoined with his usual promptness, "Oh! yes: and so does a large meal-tub, filled to the brim. But I was not thinking of plenty, but of beauty."

Much as he delighted in classical literature, he was by no means inclined, nor could he have reconciled it with his notions of duty, to circumscribe his reading within its limits. The early Christian fathers, the fathers of the Reformation, the theological writers, both puritan and episcopalian, of the seventeenth century, the most valuable authors on all similar topics down to the present time, including the most esteemed French preachers, were all perused with his characteristic avidity: what was most valuable in them became fixed in his unusually retentive memory; and numerous marginal and other references in the most valuable of his books, prove at once the minuteness and closeness of his attention, and his desire to direct his memory to the substances of thought, and not unnecessarily to load it with mere apparatus.

Like many other men of letters, Mr Hall, at this period, found the advantage of passing from one subjet to another at short intervals, generally of about two hours: thus casting off the mental fatigue that one subject had occasioned by directing his attention to another, and thereby preserving the intellect in a state of elastic energy from the beginning to the end of the time devoted daily to study.

Not long after he had entered upon this steady course of reading, he commenced the study of Hebrew, under Mr Lyons, who then taught that language in the university. He soon became a thorough proficient in it; and, finding it greatly to increase his knowledge of the Old Testament, as well as of its relation to the New, and considerably to improve and enlarge the power of Scripture interpretation, he, from thence to the close of life, suffered scarcely a day to pass without reading a portion of the Old Testament in the original. This practice flowed naturally from one of his principles of action, namely, to go to the fountain-head for information, rather than to derive it from the streams; and from the continued application of that principle, it was found that his habit of reading originals often impaired the accuracy of his quotation of passages from our authorized version, having, in fact, become more familiar with the Hebrew and Greek texts than with any translation. This, which was often conjectured by some of his hearers at Cambridge, was amply confirmed by the subsequent observation of his intimate and much esteemed friend Mr Ryley, at Leicester.

It would be useless to record, even briefly, Mr Hall's opinions of the numerous authors, ancient and modern, which he read at this period with such close attention, since they accord generally with those of all men of correct taste and sound judgment. Yet, perhaps, I may state, with regard to his chief uninspired favourite among the Greek writers, that to none of the ornaments of pagan antiquity did he refer in such terms of fervid eulogy as to Plato. Not Cudworth himself could appreciate him more highly. He often expressed his astonishment at the neglect into which he apprehended the writings of Plato were sinking; and said, that an entire disregard of them would be an irrefragable proof of a shallow age. Milton, he remarked, gave the noblest proofs, in his prose writings, of a knowledge and love of Plato; and he expressed a surprise, almost bordering upon contempt, in reference to those who classed this wonderful man with the schoolmen. It was his frequent remark, that even when Plato wrote upon the most abstract subjects, whether moral, metaphysical, or mathematical, his style was as clear as the purest stream, and that his diction was deeply imbued with the poetic spirit. On ocasions when he ran no risk of the charge of pedantry, he would by appropriate quotations, confirm these views. He delighted to expatiate upon this philosophers's notions of vice and virtue, of idleness and industry; and often adduced the platonic definition, as "that which qualifies men to be good citizens, and renders them fit to govern or to obey." On one occasion he pointed to a passage, in the first Republic, I think, from which it appeared that Plato perceived the advantages resulting from the subdivision of labour, and suggested the natural progress of such subdivision in proportion to the advance of civilization.

In speaking of this philosopher, Mr Hall illustrated his view of the evil of studying a Greek author, with the aid of a Latin version, by a reference to Serranus's magnificent edition of his works, in the Latin version, of which he said he had often detected errors. He also mentioned a ridiculous blunder of one of the English translators, who had, it seems, availed himself of a Latin version, in which, as was customary two or three hundred years ago, the omission of an m or an n was indicated by a bar placed over the preceding letter. Disregarding this superposed bar the translator had read hirudo instead of hirundo, and thus, upon Plato's authority, declared the horse-leech instead of the swallow to be the harbinger of the spring!

I have dwelt rather longer upon these topics than would be at all necessary, were it not to correct the notion which some persons have entertained, that Mr Hall was indolent, and that though when stimulated to the effort, he would exert himself as a profound thinker, yet he was not a man of research, or, in the ordinary acceptation, a good scholar.

When Mr Hall proposed that we should devote an hour every morning to reading together, he asked me to assist him in his mathematical studies; adding, that as a matter of mutual advantage, it might be well that, on alternate mornings, I should be his mathematical tutor, and he my instructor in metaphysics. To this proposal I gladly assented; and it has long been my persuasion that the scheme flowed in great measure from his desire to call my attention to general literature, and especially to the science of mind.

At that period, though he was strong and active, he often suffered extremely from the pain, to which I have before adverted, and which was his sad companion through life. On entering his room to commence our reading, I could at once tell whether or not his night had been refreshing; for if it had, I found him at the table, the books to be studied ready, and a vacant chair set for me. If his night had been restless, and the pain still continued, I found him lying on the sofa, or more frequently, upon three chairs, on which he could obtain an easier position. At such seasons, scarcely ever did a complaint issue from his lips; but inviting me to take the sofa, our reading commenced. They, however, who knew Mr Hall, can conjecture how often, if he became interested, he would raise himself from the chairs, uttter a few animated expressions, and then resume the favourite reclining posture. Sometimes, when he was suffering more than usual, he proposed a walk in the fields, where, with the appropriate book, as our companion, we could pursue the subject. If he was the preceptor, as was commonly the case in these peripatetic lectures he soon lost the sense of pain, and nearly as soon escaped from our author, whoever he might be, and expatiated at large upon some train of inquiry or explication, which our course of reading had suggested. As his thoughts enkindled, both his steps and his words became quicker, until, ere long, it was difficult to say, whether the body or the mind were brought most upon the stretch in keeping up with him. This peculiarity I have noticed in a few other men of vigorous intellect and lively imagination.

Mr Hall's avowed object in recurring at all to his mathematical studies was, the acquisition of so much geometry, trigonometry, and conic-sections, as would enable him thoroughly to comprehend the entire scope of the reasoning in Maclaurin's "Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries." For this indeed, his college studies had in great measure prepared him; and there would have been but little to learn, could he have been satisfied to proceed as students often do. But it was not in his nature to advance, unless he ascertained the firmness of the ground at every step. He reasoned philosophically, for instance, upon the nature of ratios and proportions; so that we had to clear our way through tho recondite lectures of Barrow relative to those points, before we could advance to trigonometry. His logical habits, also, made him very reluctant to pass over any geometrical proposition, in which he could not trace the analysis as well as the synthesis. In this manner, and with such views, wo went through the proposed course. Of what utility all this was ultimately to Mr Hall, I cannot precisely say; but I can testify that it was of permanent advantage to his mathematical preceptor, who had not previously formed the habit of tracing apparent results to their foundations; but who, from that period, pursued science with a new interest, kept his eye more steadily upon ultimate principles, and learnt to value such researches quite as much for their intellectual discipline as for their practical benefit*.

In reference to the philosophy of mind, after we had gone slightly over Locke's Essay, his Conduct of the Understanding, and Watts' Ontology, which I had read before, we studied Berkeley, Wollaston, Hartley, Andrew Baxter, Reid, some portions of Bacon's Essays, and of his Treatise on the Advancement of Learning; or rather, I should say, I had the advantage of learning what was most or least valuable in each and all of these, from this admirable living commentator. We were about to proceed to Search's (Abraham Tucker's) "Light of Nature," when some circumstances, which I cannot recall to mind, rendered it inconvenient for us thus to meet, and brought these delightful readings and commentaries to a close. We did not then go through any of Dugald Stewart's works, Mr Hall regarding him as an elegant expositor of Reid, but greatly inferior in originality. From Bacon's Essays he used to read passages aloud, with the warmest expressions of commendation.

I must not omit to specify, as a peculiarity in the structure of Mr Hall's mind, that although in every important case he detected and placed in the utmost prominence, an essential defect in the reasoning, a too rapid generalization, or any other unwarrantable deduction, that occurred in Berkeley, or Watts, or Hartley, he was very slow to perceive, very reluctant to admit, any such in the writings of Andrew Baxter. The reader who is conversant with such speculations, will recollect, that in the second volume of Baxter's book on "the Soul," he affirms that our dreams are prompted by separate immaterial beings, and defends his theory with much ingenuity. As we advanced in Baxter's arguments, Mr Hall exclaimed, "this is very beautiful, sir; yet, I apprehend there must be some flaw in the reasoning." I suggested one or two objections; he showed immediately that they could not apply. On our next meeting, he accosted me with, "Well, sir, have you detected any fallacy in Baxter's Theory? "Yes, I think I have." This, however, was soon disposed of, and then another, and another. I at length referred to Dugald Stewart's Theory, after examining which, he said, "I do not think this is tenable; but I suppose it must be admitted that Baxter does not quite make out his case. Yet he was a man of great acumen—why did the Scotch philosophers run him down so!"

Still farther to illustrate Mr Hall's character, his turn of thought and expression, I will now bring together a few such incidents and short remarks, occurring between 1796 and 1803, as present themselves most vividly to my mind.

It will already have appeared that benevolence was a prevailing characteristic. When he had aided a poor man to the full extent of his own pecuniary means, he would sometimes apply to one of his affluent friends. "Poor ——— is in great distress: some of his family are ill, and he cannot supply the proper necessaries. Lend me five shillings for the poor fellow: I will pay you again in a fortnight, unless in the mean time you find that the case deserves your help, and then the donation shall become yours."

His disapprobation of avarice bore a natural relation to his own benevolence. Being informed that a rich man in the neighbourhood, who was by no means celebrated for his liberality, had attended to a tale of distress without relieving it, he said—"Yes, yes: he would listen, but without inclining his head. He may lend a distant ear to the murmurings from the vale beneath, but he remains like a mountain covered with perpetual snow."

On another occasion, a person talking to him of one whom they both knew, and who was very penurious, said—"Poor wretch! you might put his soul into a nut-shell." "Yes, sir, (Mr Hall replied) and even then it would creep out at a maggot hole."

His love of sincerity in words and actions was constantly apparent. Once, while he was spending an evening at the house of a friend, a lady who was there on a visit, retired, that her little girl, of four years old, might go to bed. She returned in about half an hour, and said to a lady near her—"She is gone to sleep. I put on my night-cap, and lay down by her, and she soon dropped off." Mr Hall, who overheard this, said—"Excuse me, Madam: do you wish your child to grow up a liar?" "Oh dear no, sir; I should be shocked at such a thing." "Then bear with me while I say, you must never act a lie before her: children are very quick observers, and soon learn that that which assumes to be what it is not, is a lie, whether acted or spoken." This was uttered with a kindness which precluded offence, yet with a seriousness that could not be forgotten.

His dislike to compliments was thus expressed:—"In compliments two and two do not make four; and twenty and twenty fall very far short of forty. Deal not, then, in that deceitful arithmetic."

It was said in Mr Hall's hearing that "compliments were pleasing truths, and flatteries pleasing untruths." He remarked—"Neither of them are pleasing to a man of reflection, for the falsehoods in this case so nearly assume the semblance of truth that one is perplexed to tell which is actually given; and no man is pleased with perplexity."

"You remember Mr ———, sir." "Yes, very well." "Were you aware of his fondness for brandy-and-water?" "No." "It was a sad habit; but it grew out of his love of story-telling; and that, also is a bad habit, a very bad habit, for a minister of the gospel. As he grew old, his animal spirits flagged, and his stories became defective in vivacity: he, therefore, took to brandy-and-water; weak enough, it is true, at first, but soon nearly 'half-and-half.' Ere long he indulged the habit in a morning; and when he came to Cambridge he would call upon me, and, before he had been with me five minutes, ask for a little brandy-and-water, which was, of course, to give him artificial spirits to render him agreeable in his visits to others. I felt great difficulty; for he, you know, sir, was much older than I was; yet, being persuaded that the ruin of his character, if not of his peace, was inevitable, unless something was done, I resolved upon one strong effort for his rescue. So the next time that he called, and, as usual, said—'Friend Hall, I will thank you for a glass of brandy-and-water,' I replied—'Call things by their right names, and you shall have as much as you please.' 'Why, don't I employ the right name? I ask for a glass of brandy-and-water.' 'That is the current, but not the appropriate name; ask for a glass of liquid fire and distilled damnation, and you shall have a gallon.' Poor man! he turned pale, and for a moment seemed struggling with anger. But, knowing that I did not mean to insult him, he stretched out his hand, and said—'Brother Hall, I thank you from the bottom of my heart.' From that time he ceased to take brandy-and-water."

In one of my early interviews with Mr Hall, I used the word felicity three or four times in rather quick succession. He asked—"Why do you say felicity, sir? Happiness is a better word, more musical and genuine English, coming from the Saxon." "Not more musical I think, sir." "Yes, more musical, and so are words derived from the Saxon generally. Listen, sir: 'My heart is smitten, and withered like grass;'—there's plaintive music. Listen again, sir: 'Under the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice;'—there's cheerful music." "Yes, but rejoice is French." "True, but all the rest is Saxon, and rejoice is almost out of tune with the other words. Listen again: 'Thou hast delivered my eyes from tears, my soul from death, and my feet from falling:' all Saxon, sir, except delivered. I could think of the word tear, sir, till I wept. Then again, for another noble specimen, and almost all good old Saxon-English: 'Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.'"

Shortly after this I was reading the original edition of Doddridge's Pneumatology, and asked Mr Hall to lend me Kippis's edition, in which the reference to other authorities, on the various topics discussed, are greatly increased. He told me that he did not possess Kippis's edition, in a tone which then surprised me a little, as it showed that he did not highly estimate Kippis's authority. I therefore asked, "Was not Dr Kippis a clever man?" "He might be a very clever man, by nature, for aught I know, but he laid so many books upon his head that his brains could not move." This was to me, who, at that period, devoted much more time to reading than to thinking, an admirable lesson.

On being asked whether he was an Arminian or a Calvinist, he said—"Neither, sir, but I believe I recede farther from Arminianism than from Calvinism. If a man profess himself a decided Arminian, I infer from it that he is not a good logician; but, sir, it does not interfere with his personal piety: look at good Mr Benson, for example. I regard the question more as metaphysical than religious."

* Shortly after my removal to Woolwich, I invited my late valued friend, Dr Hutton, to dine with Mr Hall, at my house. Mr Hall, for the purpose of drawing the Doctor into conversation, asked him a few questions suggested by some of Barrow's Disquisitions in reference to mathematical measure, and its application to force, momentum, &c. They essentially involved the metaphysics of the subjects of inquiry. He also expatiated upon the imaginative, as well as the rational process, involved in the genesis of curves by motion, as taught by Barrow and Newton. The next day Dr Hutton said to me, "What an extraordinary man that friend of yours is! Why, he was born to be a mathematician. If you could persuade him to give himself up to the sciences, as Priestley did, he would teach us all something."

A lady who had been speaking of the Supreme Being with great familiarity, but in religious phraseology, having retired, he said—"I wish I knew how to cure that good lady of her bad habit. I have tried, but as yet, in vain. It is a great mistake to affect this kind of familiarity with the King of kings, and speak of him as though he were a next-door neighbour, from the pretence of love. Mr Boyle's well known habit was infinitely to be commended. And one of our old divines, I forget which, well remarks, that—'Nothing but ignorance can be guilty of this boldness; that there is no divinity but in a humble fear, no philosophy but shows itself in silent admiration.'"

When two or three gentlemen were discussing the question, whether a man of no religion can be a successful minister of the gospel, surprise was expressed that Mr Hall remained silent—"Sir, (said he, in reply), I would not deny that a sermon from a bad man may sometimes do good; but the general question does not admit of an argument. Is it at all probable, that one who is a willing servant of Satan, (and that, you know, sir, is the hypothesis you assume), will fight against him with all his might, and if not, what success can be rationally expected*?"

Mr Hall did not permit his sedulous cultivation of the mind to draw him aside from the cultivation of the heart. The evidences were, indeed, very strong, that his preparation for ministerial duty was devotional as well as intellectual. Thus, his public services, by a striking gradation, for months and years, evinced an obvious growth, in mental power, in literary acquisition, and in the seriousness, affection and ardour of a man of piety. His usefulness and his popularity increased; the church and congregation became considerably augmented; and in 1798 it was found necessary to enlarge the place of worship to accommodate about two hundred more persons.

Early in the year 1799, a severe fever, which brought him, in his own apprehension, and that of his friends, to the brink of the grave, gave him an opportunity of experiencing the support yielded by the doctrines of the cross "in the near views of death and judgment." He "never before felt his mind so calm and happy." The impression was not only salutary, but abiding; and it again prompted him to the investigation of one or two points, with regard to which he had long felt himself floating in uncertainty. Although he had for some years steadily and earnestly enforced the necessity of divine influence in the transformation of character, and in perseverance in the course of consistent, holy obedience, yet he spoke of it as "the influence of the spirit of God," and never in express terms, as "the influence of the Holy Spirit." The reason was, that though he fully believed the necessity of spiritual agency in commencing and continuing the spiritual life, he doubted the doctrine of the distinct personality of the Holy Spirit. But about this time he was struck with the fact that, whenever in private prayer he was in the most deeply devotional frame, "most overwhelmed with the sense that he was nothing, and God was all in all," he always felt himself inclined to adopt a trinitarian doxology. This circumstance, occurring frequently, and more frequently meditated upon in a tone of honest and anxious inquiry, issued at length in a persuasion that the Holy Spirit is really and truly God, and not an emanation. It was not, however, until 1800, that he publicly included the personality of the Holy Spirit in his statements of the doctrine of spiritual influence.

In attempting to give some idea of the general character and style of Mr Hall's public services, while I had the privilege of hearing him at Cambridge, I feel that I shall neither adequately describe what his preaching really was, nor even do justice to my own conceptions of it.

His manner of reading the Scriptures at the beginning of the service, was not generally interesting; nor did the portion read always bear an obvious reference to the text or subject afterwards brought forward. But when passages of Scripture were quoted in the sermon, they were so delivered as to give to their true meaning the most intelligible prominence and force.

His prayers were remarkable for their simplicity and their devotional feeling. No person could listen to them without being persuaded that he who uttered them was really engaged in prayer, was holding communion with his God and Father in Christ Jesus. His tones and his countenance throughout these exercises were those of one most deeply imbued with a sense of his unworthiness, and throwing himself at the feet of the Great Eternal, conscious that he could present no claim for a single blessing, but the blood of atonement, yet animated by the cheering hope that the voice of that blood would prevail. The structure of these prayers never indicated any preconceived plan. They were the genuine effusions of a truly devotional spirit, animated by a vivid recollection of what in his own state, in that of the congregation, of the town and vicinity, needed most ardently to be laid before the Father of Mercies. Thus, they were remarkably comprehensive, and furnished a far greater variety on the successive occasions of public worship, than those of any other minister whom I have ever known. The portions which were devoted to intercession operated most happily in drawing the affections of his people towards himself; since they showed how completely his Christian sympathy had prepared him to make their respective cases his own.

The commencement of his sermons did not excite much expectation in strangers, except they were such as recollected how the mental agitation, produced by diffidence, characterized the fisrt sentences of some of the orators of antiquity. He began with hesitation, and often in a very low and feeble tone, coughing frequently, as though he were oppressed by asthmatic obstructions. As he proceeded, his manner became easy, graceful, and at length highly impassioned; his voice also acquired more flexibility, body and sweetness, and in all his happier and more successful efforts, swelled into a stream of the most touching and impressive melody. The farther he advanced, the more spontaneous, natural, and free from labour, seemed the progression of thought. He announced the results of the most extensive reading, of the most patient investigation, or of the profoundest thinking, with such unassuming simplicity, yet set them in such a position of obvious and lucid reality, that the auditors wondered how things so simple and manifest should have escaped them. Throughout his sermons he kept his subject thoroughly in view, and so incessantly brought forward new arguments, or new illustrations, to confirm or to explain it, that with him amplification was almost invariably accumulative in its tendency. One thought was succeeded by another, and that by another and another, each more weighty than the preceding, each more calculated to deepen and render permanent the ultimate impression. He could at pleasure adopt the unadorned, the ornamental, or the energetic; and indeed combine them in every diversity of modulation.

In his higher flights, what he said of Burke might, with the slightest deduction, be applied to himself, "that his imperial fancy laid all nature under tribute, and collected riches from every scene of the creation, and every walk of art;" and at the same time, that could be affirmed of Mr Hall which could not be affirmed of Mr Burke, that he never fatigued and oppressed by gaudy and superfluous imagery. Whenever the subject obviously justified it, he would yield the reins to an eloquence more diffusive and magnificent than the ordinary course of pulpit instruction seemed to require; yet so exquisite was his perception of beauty, and so sound his judgment, that not the coldest taste, provided it were real taste, could ever wish an image omitted which Mr Hall had introduced. His inexhaustible variety augmented the general effect. The same images, the same illustrations, scarcely ever recurred. So ample were his stores, that repetition of every kind was usually avoided; while in his illustrations he would connect and contrast what was disjointed and opposed, or distinctly unfold what was abstracted or obscure, in such terms as were generally intelligible, not only to the well-informed, but to the meanest capacity. As he advanced to his practical applications, all his mental powers were shown in the most palpable but finely balanced exercise. His mind would, if I may so speak, collect itself and come forth with a luminous activity, proving, as he advanced, how vast, and, in some important senses, how next to irresistible, those powers were. In such seasons his preaching communicated universal animation: his congregation would seem to partake of his spirit, to think and feel as he did, to be fully influenced by the presence of the objects which he had placed before them, fully actuated by the motives which he had enforced with such energy and pathos.

All was doubtless heightened by his singular rapidity of utterance,—by the rhythmical structure of his sentences, calculated at once for the transmission of the most momentous truths, for the powers of his voice, and for the convenience of breathing freely at measured intervals,—and, more than all, by the unequivocal earnestness and sincerity which pervaded the whole, and by the eloquence of his most speaking countenance and penetrating eye. In his sublimer strains, not only was every faculty of the soul enkindled and in entire operation, but his very features seemed fully to sympathize with the spirit, and to give out, nay, to throw out, thought and sentiment, and feeling.

* A few more miscellaneous gleanings from Mr Hall's remarks in conversation are inserted in Appendix, note A.

From the commencement of his discourse an almost breathless silence prevailed, deeply impressive and solemnizing from its singular intenseness. Not a sound was heard but that of the preacher's voice—scarcely an eye but was fixed upon him—not a countenance that he did not watch, and read and interpret, as he surveyed them again and again with his rapid, ever-excursive glance. As he advanced and increased in animation, five or six of the auditors would be seen to rise and lean forward over the front of their pews, still keeping their eyes upon him. Some new or striking sentiment or expression would, in a few minutes cause others to rise in like manner: shortly afterwards still more, and so on, until, long before the close of the sermon, it often happened that a considerable portion of the congregation were seen standing,—every eye directed to the preacher, yet now and then for a moment glancing from one to another, thus transmitting and reciprocating thought and feeling:—Mr Hall himself, though manifestly absorbed in his subject, conscious of the whole, receiving new animation from what he thus witnessed, reflecting it back upon those who were already alive to the inspiration, until all that were susceptible of thought and emotion seemed wound up to the utmost limit of elevation on earth,—when he would close, and they reluctantly and slowly resume their seats*.

Scenes like this I have witnessed repeatedly, so productive of intense and hallowed feeling, that, after an interval of more than thirty years, they present themselves to my mind with a more vivid influence than many of the transactions of the last month.

And surely the delightful retrospection may be safely indulged, when it is considered that these sublime exertions were made for the promotion of man's best interests—to warn the impenitent—to show to the sinner the fatal error of his way—to invite the self-condemned to the only, the all-effectual remedy—to console and encourage the faithful—to distribute the bread of life among those who must otherwise perish—to "build up the church in her most holy faith;" when it is known, also, that, while men of taste and intellect were both gratified and instructed, the uncultivated rustic heard, and understood, and received the Word of Life, and went on his way rejoicing.

Numerous and diversified as were the feelings excited by this extraordinary preacher, none were more prevailing than surprise that one so richly endowed should seem so utterly unconscious of it, and gratidude that the Great Head of the church should have called such a man to his service, and placed him in so important a station as Cambridge, when his intellectual powers were in their full maturity and vigour.

I must not, I perceive, allow myself to sketch the difference between his sermons and his expositions, or between his preaching at Cambridge and in the neighbouring villages: nor must I dwell upon the weekly evening services, when he met a few of his people, chiefly of the poorer classes, in the vestry of his place of worship, and, in a strain of the most chaste and simple eloquence, comforted and instructed them in the "things pertaining to the kingdom of God"*. The diversity of his powers, the sincerity of his character, the warmth of his love to God and man, were in all alike apparent: and no one that was not the victim of prejudice, or the slave of sin, could have seen him engaged in the service of God, without being ready to testify, "this man must have read much, thought much, and prayed much," to be thus admirably furnished for his great work.

It would be highly instructive and gratifying to know by what process so finished a preacher, so exquisite and tasteful a writer, as Mr Hall, prepared his respective compositions for the pulpit and the press. But the reluctance with which he spoke either of himself or of his occupations, deprives us of much of this desirable information. At the time when our intercourse was most frequent and unrestrained, I have often been with him while he was preparing for the pulpit, and have occasionly ventured to ask him a few questions; his answers, always frank and elucidatory, however concise, enabled me, by means, also, of frequent reference to his notes on different sermons which I heard delivered, to form tolerably satisfactory conjectures as to the course pursued. He then stated, as he since has to different friends, that he never proceeded even to think of adopting a specific text, as fitted for a sermon, until the matter it presented stood out in the form of a particular, distinct, and precise topic; he could then take it up and lay it down as he pleased. Of his extraordinary power of abstraction I have already spoken. By its means he could, at pleasure, insulate, nay in a manner enclose himself, from every thing around him; and thus pursue his mental operations. It was usual with him to have five or six subjects under simultaneous training; to either of which he could direct his attention as inclination or necessity required. The grand divisions of thought, the heads of a sermon, for example, he would trace out with the most prominent lines of demarcation; and these for some years supplied all the hints that he needed in the pulpit, except on extraordinary occasions. To these grand divisions he referred, and upon them suspended all the subordinate trains of thought.

The latter, again, appear to have been of two classes altogether distinct; outline trains of thought, and trains into which much of the detail was interwoven. In the outline train, the whole plan was carried out and completed as to the argument: in that of detail, the illustrations, images, and subordinate proofs, were selected and classified; and in those instances where the force of an argument, or the probable success of a general application, would mainly depend upon the language, even that was selected and appropriated, sometimes to the precise collocation of the words. Of some sermons, no portions whatever were wrought out thus minutely; the language employed in preaching being that which spontaneously occurred at the time: of others, this minute attention was paid to the verbal structure of nearly half: of a few, the entire train of preparation, almost from the beginning to the end, extended to the very sentences. Yet the marked peculiarity consisted in this, that the process, even when thus directed to minutiæ in his more elaborate efforts, did not require the use of the pen; at least at the time to which these remarks principally apply†. For, Mr Hall had a singular faculty for continuous mental composition, apart from the aid which writing supplies. Words were so disciplined to his use, that the more he thought on any subject, the more closely were the topics of thought associated with appropriate terms and phrases; and it was manifest that he had carefully disciplined his mind to this as an independent exercise, probably to avoid the pain and fatigue which always attended the process of writing. Whenever he pleased he could thus pursue the consecution to a great extent, in sentences, many of them perfectly formed and elaborately finished, as he went along, and easily called up again by memory, as occasion required; not, however, in their separate character, as elements of language, but because of their being fully worked into the substance of thought. It hence happened that the excellence which other persons often attain as to style, from the use of the pen, in written, visible composition (employing the eye upon words, instead of fixing the memory upon substantial mental product, and, it may be, diminishing the intellectual power by substituting for one of its faculties a mechanical result), he more successfully and uniformly attained by a purely meditative process. And I am persuaded that if he could have instantly impressed his trains of thought upon paper, with the incorporated words, and with the living spirit in which they were conceived, hundreds if not thousands of passages would have been preserved, as chaste and polished in diction, as elastic and energetic in tone, as can be selected from any part of his works. What, however, could not thus be accomplished by the pen, has been achieved, as to immediate impression, in the pulpit; and hence his celebrity, unequalled, in modern times, as a sacred orator.

* Striking evidences of the most stimulating immediate impression often occurred. I specify only two examples.

In 1812, Mr Hall, who then resided at Leicester, paid one of his periodical visits to Bristol, and, as usual, often preached at Broadmead. He delivered a most solemn and impressive sermon on the text "dead in trespasses and sins;" of which the concluding appeals were remarkably sublime and awful. The moment he had delivered the last sentence, Dr Ryland, then the pastor of the church, hastened part of the way up the pulpit stairs, and while the tears trickled down his venerable face, exclaimed, with a vehemence which astonished both the preacher and the congregation,—"Let all that are alive in Jerusalem pray for the dead that they may live!"

In 1814, Mr Hall, while preaching among his old friends at Cambridge, just before he commenced the application of his sermon, uttered a short, but very fervent ejaculatory prayer, during which the whole congregation arose from their seats. Mr Hall seemed surprized for a moment, and but for a moment, and remained in prayer for about five minutes. He then resumed his sermon, and continued preaching for more than twenty minutes, in such a strain of magnificent and overwhelming eloquence, as the extraordinary incident might be expected to produce from powers and feelings like his, the whole congregation standing until the close of the sermon.

* The topics of these evening lectures were often biographical. The lives and characters of Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Elijah, Hannah, Samuel, Ruth, Daniel, &c. were briefly delineated, and made the basis of some useful practical reflections. Whenever the subject would fairly allow it, these reflections had an appropriate bearing upon the duties, the trials and perplexities, of persons in humble life. The sermon on "John fulfilled his course," inserted in the present volume, is very analogous in its character to the discourses to which I here refer; but its commencement is more elaborate.

† Mr Hall, doubtless, varied his manner of preparation in different periods. For three or four years after his settlement at Leicester, he wrote down nearly a third of the sermon, and left all the rest to flow from the outline plan while he was preaching. But for some years afterwards he seldom allowed his notes to exceed two pages, and is thought to have indulged himself more than at any other period of his life in entirely extemporaneous eloquence. At that time his sermons were especially distinguished by simplicity and pathos.

In preparing for the press the process was in many respects essentially different. There was, from the outset, a struggle to overcome the reluctance to write, arising from the anticipation of increased pain, which he knew must be endured so long as he was engaged in the mechanical act; and at every return to the labour he had a new reluctance to surmount.—There was, moreover, the constant effort to restrain a mind naturally active, ardent, and rapid in all its movements, to a slow progression; nay, a farther effort, and, to a mind so constituted, a very irksome one, to bring the thoughts back from the ultimate issue to which they were incessantly hastening, and cause them to pass and repass, again and again, by a comparatively sluggish course, the successive links in a long chain. Nor was this all. He had formed for himself, as a writer, an ideal standard of excellence, which could not be reached*: his perception of beauty in composition was so delicate and refined, that in regard to his own productions, it engendered perhaps a fastidious taste; and, deep and prevailing as was his humility, he was not insensible to the value of a high reputation, and therefore cautiously guarded against the risk of diminishing his usefulness among certain classes of readers, by consigning any production to the world that had not been thoroughly subjected to the labor limæ. Hence the extreme slowness with which he composed for the press; writing, improving, rejecting the improvement; seeking another, rejecting it; recasting whole sentences and pages; often recurring precisely to the original phraseology; and still oftener repenting, when it was too late, that he had not done so. All this he lamented as a serious defect, declaring that it gave, in his own view, to his written compositions, an air of stiffness and formality, which deprived him of all complacency in them. And I cannot but think that, notwithstanding the exquisite harmony and beauty which characterize every thing that he has published, they were, even in point of felicity of diction, and the majestic current and force of language, inferior to the "winged words" that escaped from his lips, when "his soul was enlarged" in the discharge of ministerial duty.

May we not suggest a probable reason for this, by observing that when Mr Hall stood forth as the minister of the sanctuary, he placed the fire upon the altar in the humble confidence that it would be kept alive by the communication of grace and spirit from on high; but that, when he came before the public as an author, he sometimes extinguished his own flame, pure and ethereal as it notwithstanding was, in his efforts to ornament the vase in which he held it up to view†.

But I must not dwell longer on these topics.

In the beginning of the year 1799, Mr Hall had the happiness of renewing personal intercourse with his early friend. Mr (afterwards Sir James) Mackintosh, being about to deliver a course of lectures on the Law of Nature and Nations, in Lincoln's Inn Hall, deemed it expedient, for the completion of some of the extensive researches which that important undertaking required, to reside for a few months at Cambridge, that he might consult the more valuable of the college libraries, as well as the public library belonging to the University generally. Another distinguished individual, the late Dr Samuel Parr, spent several weeks at Cambridge at the same time, for the purpose of visiting some of his old friends, of associating with Mr Mackintosh, and of becoming personally acquainted with Mr Hall, whose character he had long known and highly valued. Mr Hall, pleased to refresh his spirits in the society of his beloved fellow-student, and by no means unwilling to glean something from the stores of so profound a scholar as Dr Parr, often spent his evenings with these two eminent men, and a few members of the University, who were invited to their select parties, and with whom, from that time, he cultivated an intimacy.

This circumstance led to the formation of Mr Hall's most inveterate habit,—that of smoking. Previously to this period he had always censured the practice in the strongest terms; but, on associating with Dr Parr, his aversion to what he used to denominate an "odious custom," soon passed away. The Doctor was always enveloped in a dense cloud of smoke, from sun-rise until midnight; and no person could remain in his company long without great inconvenience, unless he learnt to smoke in self-defence. Mr Hall, therefore, made the attempt, and quickly overcame every obstacle. I well recollect entering his apartment just as he had acquired this happy art; and, seeing him sit at ease, the smoke rising above his head in lurid, spiral volumes, he inhaling and apparently enjoying its fragrance, I could not suppress my astonishment. "O sir, (said he) I am only qualifying myself for the society of a Doctor of Divinity; and this, holding up the pipe, is my test of admission."

Mr Hall's Cambridge friends were divided in their feelings and wishes with regard to this new practice. The majority approved it, from a belief that the narcotic influence of tobacco would mitigate the pain which he had so long endured. Others, apprehending that his habit of converting every thing into a source of enjoyment would transform him into an unremitting smoker, and that injury to his health would ensue, ventured to expostulate with him. I belonged to the latter class, and put into his hands Dr Adam Clarke's pamphlet on "The Use and Abuse of Tobacco," with a request that he would read it. In a few days he returned it, and at once, as if to preclude discussion, said, "Thank you, sir, for Adam Clarke's pamphlet. I can't refute his arguments, and I can't give up smoking."

We now approach the time when Mr Hall acquired a signal extension of celebrity. Many who had hailed the French Revolution of 1789 as an event productive of extensive benefit, were compelled to admit, after a few years, that the great leaders in that Revolution, and still more their followers, committed grievous blunders, and grosser crimes, from the want of higher than political principles to control their actions. Yet, in the false security which some felt, and others insidiously aimed to inspire, it was suspected by but few, that much of our periodical literature had, under the plea of encouraging free discussion, become irreligious in its tendency, and that various unprincipled demagogues in London and the large manufacturing towns, not only held up to admiration the conduct of the detestable actors in "the reign of terror," but were constantly exerting themselves to disseminate democracy and atheism conjointly. Such, however, was the fact. From 1795 to 1799, debating rooms were opened in various parts of the metropolis, in which the most barefaced infidelity was taught, and to which the lower classes were invited, often on Sunday evenings, by a variety of specious allurements. Mr Hall was no sooner aware of the existence of these sources of evil, and of the mischief they produced, than he began to use the voice of warning, in his private intercourse among his people, and to impress upon such of the young as he feared had received a sceptical bias, that of all fanaticism the fanaticism of infidelity then prevalent was at once the most preposterous and the most destructive.

Mr Hall's persuasion of the continuance and growth of this infidel spirit, induced him to preach and publish his celebrated sermon on "Modern Infidelity;" which was not, therefore, as many affirmed, a hasty production, written under excited feelings and false alarms, but the deliberate result of a confirmed belief, that the most strenuous efforts were required to repel mischief so awfully and insidiously diffused.

Before the publication of this sermon, its author had fully "counted the cost" as to the obloquy which it would bring upon him from various quarters; but he did not at all anticipate its extraordinary success, and the corresponding extension of his reputation. As repeated editions were called for, he yielded his assent with great hesitation, from a fear that the copies would remain unsold; and he was the last to see, what every one else perceived, that it had carried his celebrity as a profound thinker and eloquent writer far beyond the limits of the denomination to which he was so bright an ornament.

* "I am tormented with the desire of writing better than I can."

† That Mr Hall did not always require much time for the production of elegant and spirited writing, interspersed with passages of remarkable beauty, and of the most elaborate polish, is plain from his two earliest publications, both composed currente calamo, and each yielding as powerful and finished specimens of style and thought as can be drawn from his works.

Immediately after this sermon issued from the press, the consistency and integrity of the author were vehemently attacked in several letters which appeared in the "Cambridge Intelligencer," then a popular and widely circulated newspaper. Its editor, Mr Flower, had received in an ill spirit Mr Hall's advice that he would repress the violent tone of his political disquisitions, and had, from other causes which need not now be developed, become much disposed to misinterpret his motives and depreciate his character. He, therefore, managed to keep alive the controversy for some months, occasionally aiding, by his own remarks, those of his correspondents who opposed Mr Hall, and as often casting illiberal insinuations upon the individual who had stepped forward in defence of the sermon and its author. A few months after this discussion subsided, Mr Flower, who had been summoned before the house of lords, and imprisoned in Newgate for a libel on Bishop Watson, published an exculpatory pamphlet; in which, with a view to draw the attention of the public as speedily as possible from his own unmanly and disingenuous conduct, while at the bar of the house, he soon passed from his personal defence to a virulent attack upon Mr Hall, his former pastor.

Shortly afterwards, another controvertist, a Mr Anthony Robinson, unwilling that Mr Flower and his coadjutors should gather all the laurels in so noble a conflict, hastened into the field; and, it must be admitted, left them far behind. He published, in a pamphlet of more than sixty pages, "An Examination" of Mr Hall's Sermon. He did not bring against the preacher the positive charge of apostacy, having discrimination enough to see that it was one thing to refer the atrocities of the reign of terror to the political principles of the perpetrators, and quite another to ascribe them to their avowed and unblushing atheism. But the crimes that he imputed to Mr Hall, were, that he was "an imitator of Mr Burke," that he was "fierce and even savage in expression," that his "charges against atheism are unfounded," and that he taught that it was excusable, if not meritorious, to punish men for errors in religious opinions!" For himself, he maintained, that "all men are essentially alike in moral conduct;" that the sum of all the morality of religionists is, "do good unto the household of faith, and to them only; kill, plunder, calumniate the heretics;" that all public religions are opposed to all private morality;" that "atheism (on the contrary) tends but little to alter our moral sentiments;" and that "all religions except the belief that rewards are to be conferred upon the beneficent, and for that service exclusively, are not merely as bad, but infinitely worse than any kind or degree of scepticism;" because "atheism leaves every human present motive in full force, whilst every religion or mode of faith different from what is above expressed, changes the name and the nature of morality, saps the foundation of all benevolence, and introduces malice, hostility and murder, under the pretext of love to God." This being a fair specimen of the shameless impiety with which the press then teemed, we need not wonder at the applauses bestowed upon Mr Hall for advancing with such singular talent and ability to stem the torrent.

With the exception of a few letters from private friends, who disapproved of his denominating the Roman Catholic clergy "the Christian priesthood," every communication he received was highly gratifying, especially as it did justice to his motives. The most distinguished members of the University were loud in his praises: numerous passages in the sermon which were profound in reasoning, or touching and beautiful in expression, were read and eulogized in every college and almost every company; and the whole composition was recommended in the charges and sermons of the dignified and other clergy in terms of the warmest praise. The "Monthly Review" (then the leading critical journal) the "British Critic," (at that time under the able superintendence of Dr Nares, and other reviews, gave to the sermon the highest commendation. Kett in his "Elements of General Knowledge," William Belsham in his "History of Great Britain," Dr Parr in the notes to his celebrated "Spital Sermon," and many others, were profuse in their expressions of panegyric. From that time Mr Hall's reputation was placed upon an eminence, which it will probably retain as long as purity and elevation of style, deeply philosophical views of the springs and motives of action, and correct theological sentiments, are duly appreciated in the world[*].

Of the letters received by Mr Hall on this occasion, the following from the pen of his friend Mackintosh, has escaped the ravages of time.

"Serle Street, Lincoln's Inn, 26 March, 1800.

"DEAR HALL,

"FROM the enclosed letter, you will see the opinion which the Bishop of London[*] has formed of your sermon, and you will observe that he does some justice to your merit. Mr Archdeacon Eaton, to whom the letter was written, has allowed me to send it to you; and I thought it might not be disagreeable to you to have it, as the opinion of a man, not indeed of very vigorous understanding, but an elegant writer, a man of taste and virtue, not to mention his high station in the church.

"I last night had a conversation about the sermon with a man of much greater talents, at a place where theological, or even literary discussions, are seldom heard. It was with Mr Windham, at the Duchess of Gordon's rout. I asked him whether he had read it. He told me that he had, that he recommended it to every body; and, among others, on that very day, to the new Bishop of Bangor, who had dined with him. He said that he was exceedingly struck with the style, but still more with the matter. He particularly praised the passage on vanity as an admirable commentary on Mr Burke's observations on vanity in his character of Rousseau. He did not like it the worse, he said, for being taken from the source of all good, as he considered Mr Burke's works to be. He thought, however, that you had carried your attack on vanity rather too far. He had recommended the sermon to Lord Grenville, who seemed sceptical about any thing good coming from the pastor of a Baptist congregation, especially at Cambridge.

"This, you see, is the unhappy impression which Priestley has made, and which, if you proceed as you have so nobly begun, you will assuredly efface. But you will never do all the good which it is in your power to do, unless you assert your own importance, and call to mind that, as the dissenters have no man comparable to you, it is your province to guide them, and not to be guided by their ignorance and bigotry. I am almost sorry you thought any apology due to those senseless bigots who blamed you for compassion [towards] the clergy of France, as innocent sufferers and as martyrs of the Christian faith during the most barbarous persecution that has fallen upon Christianity, perhaps since its origin, but certainly since its establishment by Constantine. * * * * * * * * * * I own I thought well of Horsley when I found him, in his charge, call these unhappy men "our Christian brethren:" the bishops and clergy of the persecuted church of France! This is the language of truth. This is the spirit of Christianity.

"I met with a combination in Ovid, the other day, which would have suited your sermon. Speaking of the human descendants of the giants, he says—

> "Sed et illa propago
> Contemptrix superûm, sævæque avidissima cædis
> Et violenta fuit. Scires è sanguine notos." MET. I. 160.

"The union of ferocity with irreligion is agreeable to your reasoning.

"I am going to send copies of my third edition[†] to Paley and Watson, to Fox and the Lord Chancellor[‡]. I should like to send copies of your sermon with them. If you will direct six copies to be sent here, I shall distribute them in such a manner as will, I think, not be hurtful.

"Mrs Mackintosh joins me in the most kind and respectful remembrance. Believe me ever,

"Dear Hall,

"Your affectionate friend,

[*] On the publication of Dr Parr's "Spital Sermon," I took a copy of it to Mr Hall; and sat down at his table while he hastily turned over the leaves. He was greatly amused by the cursory examination, but had evidently no expectation that any of the notes referred to himself. "What a profusion of Greek, sir! Why, if I were to write so, they would call me a pedant; but it is all natural in Parr." "What a strange medley, sir. The gownsmen will call him Farrago Parr." At length I saw his eye glance upon the notes which relate to himself. His countenance underwent the most rapid changes, indicating surprise, regret, and pity: in a very few minutes he threw down the book, and exclaimed, "Poor man! poor man! I am very sorry for him! He is certainly insane, sir! Where were his friends, sir? Was there nobody to sift the folly out of his notes, and prevent its publication? Poor man!"

[‡] The Earl of Rosslyn.

Mr Mackintosh continued to evince both the steadiness of his friendship for Mr Hall, and the high value which he set upon this sermon, by frequently quoting it and applying it to the elucidation of the Lectures which he was then delivering in Lincoln's-Inn. Several of his auditors were, in consequence, induced sometimes to spend their Sundays at Cambridge, that they might listen to the pulpit instructions of the individual of whom they had heard so much. Many also of the members of the University, including not merely under-graduates, but college fellows and tutors, were often seen at the Baptist place of worship. These sometimes amounted to fifty or sixty: and a few of them attended so constantly upon the afternoon services, that they became almost regarded as regular hearers. Among the latter, some have since become distinguished men, and occupy important stations either in the church or in the public service, as statesmen or senators.

The attendance of so many university students upon the services of a dissenting minister, at length began to excite alarm among the "Heads of Houses;" of whom a meeting was summoned to consider the expediency of interposing some authoritative measure to prevent this irregularity. But Dr Mansel, then master of the largest college, Trinity, and afterwards bishop of Bristol, "declared that he could not be a party in such a measure: he admired and revered Mr Hall, both for his talents and for his genuine liberality; he had ascertained that his preaching was not that of a partisan, but of an enlightened minister of Christ; and that therefore if he were not the master of Trinity be should certainly often attend himself; and that even now he had experienced a severe struggle before he could make up his mind to relinquish so great a benefit." Shortly after this he personally thanked Mr Hall, not only for his sermon, but for his general efforts in the Christian cause; and, through the medium of a common friend, endeavoured to induce him to enter the established church. This, I believe, was the only direct attempt to persuade Mr Hall to conform.

None of these circumstances were permitted to draw Mr Hall aside from his ordinary course. His studies, his public duties, his pastoral visits, were each assigned their natural place, as before. If there were any change, it was manifest in his increased watchfulness over himself, and, perhaps, in giving a rather more critical complexion than before to certain portions of his morning expositions, and in always concluding them with such strong practical appeals as might be suited to a congregation of mixed character.

If I do not greatly mistake, however, his sentiments with regard to controversy in general were considerably modified from this period. The language of the preface to his sermon, on the advantages of union, became the language of his heart and conduct; so that he abstained from public discussions except on questions that seemed of vital importance, either in regard to fundamental truth, or the essential privileges of Christians. Having learnt that one of the severest trials of human virtue is the trial of controversy, he resolved, on occasions when silence became inexpedient or censurable, not to repel even injustice and misrepresentation in an angry spirit. Thus when he undertook the refutation of Bishop Horsley's charge, that village preachers among methodists and dissenters were teachers of insubordination and sedition, indignant as he doubtless felt at so unjust an insinuation, he opposed it in a manner as remarkable for the conciliatory spirit which it exhibits, as for the singular train of original thought and cogent argument which runs through that interesting fragment.

In little more than two years after the publication of the sermon on Modern Infidelity, Mr Hall again appeared before the public as an author. The transient peace of Amiens was celebrated by a general thanksgiving throughout England on the 1st of June 1802. In the sermon preached by Mr Hall on that occasion, he endeavoured first to awaken the gratitude of his auditors by a most touching picture of the horrors of war, from which Europe had just escaped: and then to apply the gratitude so excited, to acts of benevolence. I have already adverted to Mr Hall's reasons for preaching that sermon memoriter, without deviation from his own written copy. I recur to it for a moment merely to state, that though it was delivered with the most impressive dignity, and with less rapidity than that to which he usually yielded himself, yet, in one or two parts, he obviously felt great difficulty in checking his inclination either to modify his language, or to expatiate more at large. This was especially observable at the passage commencing with "Conceive but for a moment the consternation which the approach of an invading army would impress on the peaceful villages in this neighbourhood." He mentioned afterwards that the struggle between his desire to correct what, he just then saw, was "a confusion in the grouping," and his determination "not to deviate from his lesson," was such as rendered it almost impossible for him to proceed. To this kind of perplexity he never again exposed himself.

The nation had scarcely tasted the blessings of peace, when a dispute on one of the articles of the treaty of Amiens involved us in a fresh war with the French. Buonaparte, then first consul, aware of the British ascendancy at sea, resolved first to attack our continental dominions. He also seized on the persons and property of the numerous English who had visited France during the brief interval of peace, detaining them as prisoners of war; and then menaced this country with invasion. So strange, and in some respects, so atrocious a commencement of hostilities, had a singular effect in melting down dissension, and diffusing a spirit of almost unexampled unanimity, among all ranks and classes of the community. To adopt Mr Hall's emphatic language: "It was a struggle for existence, not for empire. It must surely be regarded as a happy circumstance that the contest did not take this shape at an earlier period, while many were deceived by certain specious pretences of liberty into a favourable opinion of our enemy's designs. The popular delusion had passed; the most unexampled prodigies of guilt had dispelled it; and, after a series of rapine and cruelty, had torn from every heart the last fibres of mistaken partiality." At this momentous period Mr Hall's love of his country was again signally evinced. On the fast day, 19th October 1803, he preached at Bristol, where he was then on a visit, a sermon afterwards published,—"The Sentiments proper to the Present Crisis," which had the happiest effect in enkindling the flame of generous, active patriotism.

This sermon, perhaps, excited more general admiration than any of the author's former productions; on account of its masterly exposure of prevailing errors, its original and philosophical defence of some momentous truths, and its remarkable appropriateness to the exigencies of the crisis. The last ten pages were thought by many (and by Mr Pitt among the number) to be fully equal in genuine eloquence to any passage of the same length that can be selected from either ancient or modern orators. They were re-printed in various periodical publications, and widely circulated in every direction; and they evidently suggested some of the finest thoughts in Sir James Mackintosh's splendid defence of Peltier, the editor of L'Ambigu, who was tried in London for a libel on Buonaparte.

In an old manuscript of Mr Hall's, containing outline notes of sermons preached by him in 1801, 1802, and 1803, scarcely any of them occupying more than two pages, there are inserted the first rude sketch of this valuable sermon, and, at the distance of several pages, a few hints of thoughts and sentences designed to be introduced near the close.

"I. Particulars in which our notions are wrong, or 'we speak not aright,' with regard to national judgments.

"1. Political speculations on the secondary causes of our calamities, exclusive of a regard to the hand of God.

"2. Wanton and indiscriminate censure of the conduct of our rulers.

"We are permitted within . . . . limits to animadvert on the measures of government.

"3. A confidence in an arm of flesh.

"Cursed is man, &c.

"4. A reliance on our supposed superior virtue.

"5. General lamentations on the corruptions of the age.

"Right sentiments. An acknowledgement of the justice and dominion of God.

"Sincere confession of our sins. Dan. ix. 8. Zech. x. 11, &c."

Such was the original synopsis. The hints intended to be worked in towards the close of the sermon, are as below.

"Eternal God! (O thou) who hast at once declared thyself the God of peace and the Lord of hosts, go forth with our armies and shelter (shield) their heads in the day of battle: give them (endow them with) that undaunted courage, that . . . . from trouble which springs from a sense of thy presence.

"Under thy conduct, and fighting under thy banners, we will employ all the resources which lie within our reach, ... without trusting in an arm of flesh . . . . while we behold with the eye of faith, what thy prophet discerned in ancient times, the plains filled with horses of fire and chariots of fire.

"There is surely not one person here who will tempt himself to . . . . by the fear of death, when he reflects that, in the failure of this great enterprise, should the crisis arrive, he must feel a thousand deaths in the extinction of religion, in the spoliation of property, in the violation of chastity, in the confusion of all orders . . . . when all that is noble or holy, will be trampled upon . . . . . when death would be sought with the avidity of . . . . . when the enemies' triumphs will be felt in . . . . . mourn . . . . . freedom entombed."

I have here presented the incipient germs of thought and expression, in this extraordinary production, from a persuasion that the man of research into the operations of intellect, will be deeply interested on comparing them with their finished result, as exhibited in the first volume.

On looking back upon the preceding pages, I perceive that I shall have laid myself open to the charge of dwelling too long upon that portion of Mr Hall's life during which I also resided at Cambridge. Let me simply observe, then, that it was the portion in which his fine character assumed, by the means I have been tracing, its true place in public estimation; and that I may be forgiven, if I have thus dwelt upon that bright period of my own existence, in which I was open to the constant influence of association with one so pre-eminent in mental and moral excellence. Yet I am not disposed to allow the interesting memory of a long friendship to interfere with biographical fidelity. I have spoken of Mr Hall's richer qualities agreeably to the estimate I then formed, but with a conviction that they had not at that period reached their full maturity and vigour. I shall now advert to a few of his defects, but with an equally strong persuasion that they diminished as his age, and judgment, and piety advanced.

I have already remarked, that Mr Hall was impetuous in argument. I must here add, that he sometimes contended more for victory than for truth. I never knew him voluntarily take what he believed to be the wrong side of an argument, for the sake of showing how adroitly he could carry on the advocacy of any opinions which he, for the moment, took the fancy to maintain; but, if ever he precipitated himself into the assertion of erroneous sentiment, he would strenuously defend his opinion; and, on such occasions, would seem more pleased with perplexing and confounding his opponents, than with faithfully endeavouring to set either them or himself right. This habit was very much restrained, if not altogether overcome, in the latter part of his life. Be it observed, however, that at no time did it tempt him to trifle with the sanctities of religion.

Besides this yielding to the temptation of making the matter of truth and error a prize for contest, there was another thing which, in social life, depreciated the practical value of his great ability, namely, a random carelessness in throwing out opinions and estimates of subjects, books, or men. Many of those opinions were graphically correct, and highly valuable, and they were usually clothed in an aphorismatic terseness of language; yet, were too often such, that plain, credulous listeners for instruction, regarding him as an oracle, would leave him with incorrect and fallacious notions of the topics on which he had spoken; and would, therefore, be strangely perplexed two or three weeks afterwards, on hearing, or hearing reported, contrary opinions on the same subjects stated by him subsequently, when farther investigation had corrected his judgment. Sometimes, too, especially when indulging in panegyric, he would, even in conversation, give himself up to the feelings of the orator, and allow his fancy to escape into the ideal, sketching the picture then existing in his own thoughts, rather than that of the individual whom he imagined himself describing.

It was also much to be regretted, that when in company, he did not keep habitually in view the good which his great talents and high character qualified him to impart. His conversation, though always conveying information on the various subjects generally brought forward in cultivated society, did not indicate the prevailing purpose of leading the minds of others in a right direction. Or, if he entered society with this determination, he frequently permitted the circumstances into which he was thrown, to divert him from his purpose: thus giving away his admirable conversational powers to the mere casual train of topics, many of them trivial in interest. There could not but be various acute remarks, and every now and then a piece of valuable disquisition, or a most important sentiment, or an eloquent flow of striking observations; yet there was not a systematic bearing towards positive utility. Often, indeed, has Mr Hall lamented this defect: often, as we have been returning from a party which he had kept alive by the brilliancy and variety of his observations, has he said, "Ah! sir, I have again contributed to the loss of an evening, as to every thing truly valuable: go home with me, that we may spend at least one hour in a manner which becomes us."

It should be added, however, that it was only in larger parties that this occurred. I never spent an evening with him alone, or with the addition of one or two select companions, in which the sublimer purposes of religious, as well as intellectual intercourse, were not prevailingly kept in view.

In adverting to the deficiencies in Mr Hall's character, I must farther remark, that he did not always seem adequately alive to special modes and efforts of utility. There were times when his apparent indifference must have been thought scarcely compatible with his uniform benevolence and piety, unless by those who were thoroughly aware that his infirmities often compelled him to avoid active exertions, except those which fell within the range of ministerial duty: yet, at other seasons, he exerted himself so powerfully and successfully in favour of some grand object, as, in great measure, to compensate for his habitually avoiding the ordinary detail of minor operations.

His defects, on whatever occasions they showed themselves, were as remote as possible from littleness, and were such as would be most naturally found in a noble character. We may hence learn, however, that a man, though far enriched above his fellows with intellectual and spiritual endowments, still manifests the frailties of a fallen being; and that it always behoves us, therefore, with Christian discrimination, to distinguish between grace and nature; to give to God his own glory, and to refer to men their own infirmities.

But I must return from this digression. During the early months of the year 1803, the pain in Mr Hall's back increased, both in intenseness and continuity; depriving him almost always of refreshing sleep, and depressing his spirits to an unusual degree. On one of his visits to Kettering and its neighbourhood, he consulted Dr Kerr, of Northampton, who recommended him to reside a few miles from Cambridge, and to have recourse to horse exercise. In consequence of this advice, he took a house at Shelford, a village about five miles from Cambridge; and the frequent and short journeys on horseback which thus became necessary for a season, seemed beneficial. Yet, the advantage was not of long continuance. He missed his delightful evenings spent in the society of the intelligent classes of the congregation (of whom there was a much higher proportion than in most congregations), and he missed still more, the simple, heart-refreshing remarks of the poor of his flock, whose pious converse had always been peculiarly soothing to his mind. It is true, he there enjoyed intercourse with two excellent men, both of whom he cordially esteemed, Mr James Nutter, a valuable member of his church at Cambridge, and the Rev. Thomas Thomason, afterwards one of the East-India Company's chaplains at Calcutta. With these friends he sometimes spent his evenings; and in company with the latter, who was Mr Simeon's curate at Trinity Church, he frequently rode to Cambridge on the Sunday mornings: these brothers in the gospel ministry proceeding thus pleasantly, "in the unity of the Spirit," to their respective spheres of labour in the church of God. Gratifying, however, as this intercourse was, both to Mr Hall and his valued neighbours, it still left him too much alone, and too much exposed to all the morbid influences of a disordered body, and of a mind overstrained. Often has he been known to sit close at his reading, or yet more intensely engaged in abstract thought, for more than twelve hours in the day; so that, when one or both of his kind friends have called upon him, in the hope of drawing him from his solitude, they have found him in such a state of nervous excitement, as led them to unite their efforts in persuading him to take some mild narcotic, and retire to rest. The painful result may be anticipated. This noble mind lost its equilibrium; and he who had so long been the theme of universal admiration, now became the subject of as extensive a sympathy. This event occurred in November 1804. Mr Hall was placed under the care of Dr Arnold, of Leicester, whose attention, with the blessing of God, in about two months, restored him both to mental and bodily health.

During this afflictive suspension of his pastoral duties, his church and congregation gave the most unequivocal proofs that they had caught somewhat of his generous and exalted spirit, and that they were desirous to conduce to his welfare in temporal things, in acknowledgement of the spiritual blessings he had been the means of conveying to them. They set on foot a subscription, to which themselves contributed most liberally, and which, by the aid of other friends, became sufficient to produce, besides a life annuity of one hundred pounds, a farther sum nearly equal, vested in government securities; the latter to be at his own disposal at death: each sum being properly vested in trustees.

In April 1805, he resumed his ministerial functions at Cambridge: but, it being deemed inexpedient for him to reoccupy his house at Shelford, he engaged another at Foulmire, about nine miles from Cambridge. This spot, doubtless, was unwisely selected; as his opportunities of social intercourse with old and intimate friends were almost entirely cut off, and he was thus left to feed more upon his own thoughts than in any preceding part of his life. The evil did not show itself in his public ministrations, which were regarded as more devout, intellectual, and impressive, than they had ever been; nor in any diminution of relish for works in which genius stood forth in defence of religious truth;—as his exquisite critique upon Foster's Essays, written at this period, amply evinces. But the evils resulting from solitude and a return of his old pain with more than its usual severity, ere long began to show themselves. Sleepless nights, habitual exclusion from society, a complete self-absorption, and the incessant struggle between what was due to a church and congregation which had given such signal proofs of affection for him, and what he felt to be necessary for his own preservation, a speedy removal from air and scenery that more and more impaired his health and oppressed his spirits: these, at about twelve months after his former attack at Shelford, produced a recurrence of the same malady, which again laid him aside from public duty.

He soon, however, recovered the complete balance of his mental powers, under the judicious care of the late Dr Cox, of Fish Ponds, near Bristol. It was regarded as essential to the permanent possession of mental health and vigour, that he should resign the pastoral office at Cambridge, that he should, for a year, at least, seek retirement in a spot selected and cordially approved by himself, abstain from preaching, and as far as possible, avoid all strong excitement.

Pursuant to this advice, he sent in his letter of resignation, which, with that from the church, in reply, is inserted in the fifth volume of these works. Thus terminated a connexion which had subsisted for fifteen years, and had been of great benefit to Mr Hall's character; while, by the divine blessing upon his labours, it had transformed a society that was rapidly sinking under the influence of cold, or disputatious speculators, into a flourishing church and congregation, "bringing forth the fruits of righteousness," and shining in the lustre of a consistent Christian profession. It is pleasing to remark that the attachment on both sides remained undiminished until Mr Hall's death.

On recovering from this attack, he received a letter from his old friend Sir James Mackintosh, then Recorder of Bombay, which was written soon after Sir James had heard of his first indisposition. It is highly interesting, both as a memorial of genuine friendship, and as a beautiful exhibition of elevated and delicate sentiment. My insertion of it will not, however, be regarded as a proof that I entirely adopt the theory which the writer so elegantly sketched.

"Bombay, Sept. 21, 1805.

"MY DEAR HALL,

"I believe that, in the hurry of leaving England, I did not answer the letter which you wrote to me in December 1803. I did not, however, forget your interesting young friend, from whom I have had one letter from Constantinople, and to whom I have twice written at Cairo, where he now is. No request of yours could, indeed, be lightly esteemed by me.

"It happened to me a few days ago, in drawing up (merely for my own use) a short sketch of my life, that I had occasion to give a faithful statement of my recollection of the circumstances of my first acquaintance with you. On the most impartial survey of my early life, I could see nothing which tended so much to excite and invigorate my understanding, and to direct it towards high, though, perhaps, scarcely accessible objects, as my intimacy with you. Five and twenty years are now past since we first met; yet hardly any thing has occurred since, which has left a deeper or more agreeable impression on my mind. I now remember the extraordinary union of brilliant fancy with acute intellect which would have excited more admiration than it has done, if it had been dedicated to the amusement of the great and the learned, instead of being consecrated to the far more noble office of consoling, instructing, and reforming the poor and the forgotten.

"It was then too early for me to discover that extreme purity, which in a mind pre-occupied with the low realities of life, would have been no natural companion of so much activity and ardour, but which thoroughly detached you from the world, and made you the inhabitant of regions where alone it is possible to be always active without impurity, and where the ardour of your sensibility had unbounded scope amidst the inexhaustible combinations of beauty and excellence.

"It is not given to us to preserve an exact medium. Nothing is so difficult as to decide how much ideal models ought to be combined with experience; how much of the future should be let into the present, in the progress of the human mind. To ennoble and purify, without raising us above the sphere of our usefulness; to qualify us for what we ought to seek, without unfitting us for that to which we must submit; are great and difficult problems, which can be but imperfectly solved.

"It is certain the child may be too manly, not only for his present enjoyments, but for his future prospects. Perhaps, my good friend, you have fallen into this error of superior natures. From this error has, I think, arisen that calamity with which it has pleased Providence to visit you, which, to a mind less fortified by reason and religion, I should not dare to mention, but which I really consider in you as little more than the indignant struggles of a pure mind with the low realities which surround it,—the fervent aspirations after regions more congenial to it,—and a momentary blindness, produced by the fixed contemplation of objects too bright for human vision. I may say, in this case, in a far grander sense than that in which the words were originally spoken by our great poet,

———— ————————" And yet
" The light which led astray was light from heaven."

"On your return to us, you must surely have found consolation in the only terrestrial produce which is pure and truly exquisite; in the affections and attachments you have inspired, which you were most worthy to inspire, and which no human pollution can rob of their heavenly nature. If I were to prosecute the reflections, and indulge the feelings, which at this moment fill my mind, I should soon venture to doubt, whether, for a calamity derived from such a source, and attended with such consolations, I should so far yield to the views and opinions of men, as to seek to condole with you. But I check myself, and I exhort you, my most worthy friend, to check your best propensities, for the sake of attaining their object. You cannot live for men without living with them. Serve God then by the active service of men. Contemplate more the good you can do, than the evil you can only lament. Allow yourself to see the loveliness of virtue amidst all its imperfections; and employ your moral imagination, not so much by bringing it into contrast with the model of ideal perfection, as in gently blending some of the fainter colours of the latter with the brighter hues of real experienced excellence; thus heightening their beauty, instead of broadening the shade which must surround us till we awaken from this dream in other spheres of existence.

"My habits of life have not been favourable to this train of meditation. I have been too busy or too trifling. My nature perhaps would have been better consulted, if I had been placed in a quieter station, where speculation might have been my business, and visions of the fair and good my chief recreation. When I approach you, I feel a powerful attraction towards this which seems the natural destiny of my mind; but habit opposes obstacles, and duty calls me off, and reason frowns on him who wastes that reflection on a destiny independent of him, which he ought to reserve for actions of which he is the master.

"In another letter I may write to you on miscellaneous subjects; at present I cannot bring my mind to speak of them. Let me hear from you soon and often.

"Farewell, my dear friend.
"Yours ever most faithfully,
"JAMES MACKINTOSH."

Two visitations of so humiliating a calamity within the compass of a year deeply affected Mr Hall's mind. Happily, however, for himself and for the world, his spirits soon recovered their wonted tone; and the permanent impression on his character was exclusively religious. His own decided persuasion was, that, however vivid his convictions of religious truth, and of the necessity of a consistent course of evangelical obedience had formerly been, and however correct his doctrinal sentiments during the last four or five years, yet that he did not undergo a thorough transformation of character, a complete renewal of his heart and affections, until the first of these seizures. Some of his Cambridge friends, who visited him at Shelford, previously to his removal to Dr Arnold's, and witnessed his deep prostration of soul while he read the fifty-first psalm, and made each verse the subject of penitent confession and of a distinct prayer, were rather inclined to concur with him as to the correctness of the opinion. Be this, however, as it may (and the wonderful revelations of "the great day" can alone remove the doubt), there can be no question that from this period he seemed more to live under the prevailing recollection of his entire dependence upon God, that his habits were more devotional than they had ever before been, his exercises more fervent and more elevated.

In a letter written to his friend Mr Phillips, of Clapham, after his recovery, he thus adverts to his afflictions:

“I cannot look back upon the events which have befallen me, without admiration and gratitude. I am a monument of the goodness and of the severity of God. My sufferings have been extreme, and the kindness of God, in interposing in my behalf, unspeakable. Pray for me, my dear friend, that I may retain an indelible sense of the mercies received, and that the inconceivable afflictions I have undergone may ‘work for me the peaceable fruits of righteousness.’ I am often afraid lest it should be with me as with the ancient Israelites, who, after they had sung the praises of God, ‘soon forgot his works.’ O! that a life so signally redeemed from destruction, may be as signally employed in that which is alone the true end of life, the service of God. But my heart is ‘like a deceitful bow,’ continually prone to turn aside; so that nothing but the powerful impulse of divine grace can fix it in a right aim.”

At this time, I believe, Mr Hall, under the persuasion to which I have just alluded, made a solemn dedication of himself to God, renewing the act annually on the recurrence of his birth-day. One of these touching and impressive records, which has been found among his papers, will, I feel assured, be read with deep interest.

“An Act of solemn Dedication of myself to God.

“O Lord, thou that searchest the heart and triest the reins of the children of men, be thou the witness of what I am now about, in the strength of thy grace, to attempt: that grace I humbly and earnestly implore, to give validity and effect to that act of solemn engagement of myself to thy service, on which I am about to enter. ‘Thou knowest my foolishness, and my sins are none of them hid from thee.’ ‘I was born in sin, and in iniquity did my mother conceive me.’ I am an apostate, guilty branch of an apostate guilty root, and my life has been a series of rebellions and transgressions, in which I have walked ‘according to the course of this world; according to the Prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience.’ How shall I confess my trangressions before thee; what numbers can reach; what words can adequately express them! ‘My iniquities have increased over my head, and my transgressions have grown up unto Heaven.’ O Lord, I esteem it a wonderful mercy that I have not long since been cut off in the midst of my sins, and been sent to hell before I had an opportunity or a heart to repent. Being assured from the word of God of thy gracious and merciful nature, and of thy willingness to pardon and accept penitent believing sinners on the ground of the blood and righteousness of thine own adorable Son, ‘who died, the just for the unjust, to bring them to God,’ and that ‘him that cometh to him he will in nowise cast out,’ I do most humbly prostrate myself at the footstool of his cross, and through him enter into thy covenant. I disclaim all right to myself from henceforth, to my soul, my body, my time, my health, my reputation, my talents, or any thing that belongs to me. I confess myself to be the property of the glorious Redeemer, as one whom I humbly hope he has redeemed by his blood to be part of ‘the first fruits of his creatures.’

“I do most cheerfully and cordially receive him in all his offices, as my Priest, my Prophet, and my King. I dedicate myself to him, to serve, love and trust in him as my life and my salvation to my life's end.

“I renounce the Devil and all his works, the flesh and the world, with heartfelt regret that I should have been enslaved by them so long. I do solemnly and deliberately take thee to be my full and satisfying good, and eternal portion in and through thine adorable Son the Redeemer, and by the assistance of the blessed Spirit of all grace, the third person in the triune God, whom I take to be my Sanctifier and Comforter to the end of time, and through a happy eternity, praying that the Holy Spirit may deign to take perpetual possession of my heart and fix his abode there.

“I do most solemnly devote and give up myself to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, agreeably to the terms of the Gospel Covenant, and in humble expectation of the blessings it ascertains to sincere believers. I call thee to witness, O God! the truth and reality of this surrender of all I have, and all I am, to thee; and, conscious of the unspeakable deceitfulness of my heart, I humbly and earnestly implore the influence of thy Spirit to enable me to stand steadfast in this covenant, as well as an interest in the blood of the Son, that I may be forgiven in those instances (alas! that such an idea should be possible), in which I may, in any degree, swerve from it.

“Done this [2d] day of May 1809, seven o'clock in the evening, Leicester. Robert Hall.”

Mr Hall, on his removal from Dr Cox's, spent some months among his relatives and friends in Leicestershire. At Arnsby he retraced the scenes of his youth, often visited the grave-yard, which would naturally awaken many interesting recollections of his early life, and on these occasions he has more than once been seen kneeling at his father's grave engaged in earnest prayer. He afterwards resided, for a time, at Enderby, a pleasant and sequestered village, five miles from Leicester, where, by the united influence of calm retirement and gentle spontaneous occupation, he gradually regained his bodily health with great mental tranquillity, and a renewed capacity for usefulness in the church.

His friends, Dr Ryland and Mr Fuller, persuaded of the benefits that would flow from drawing his attention to a specific object, requested him to investigate the critical peculiarities of some difficult texts in the New Testament, respecting which Dr Marshman had asked the opinion of his friends in England. This judicious application directed his thoughts to some of his old and favourite inquiries, and produced the most salutary effects*. From this he passed to other literary occupations, thence to closer biblical study, and, in due time, when his strength and self-possession were adequately restored to permit the exertion without injury, he returned to the delightful work of “proclaiming the good tidings of peace.”

He first preached in some of the villages around him; and then, occasionally, to a small congregation assembling at a chapel in Harvey Lane, Leicester, which had several years before been under the care of that eminent man, Dr Carey, now of Serampore. The congregation had been diminishing for some years, and at this time did not exceed two hundred and fifty: the church consisted of seventy-six members. After having preached to them a few months, he accepted an invitation to become their stated pastor; and his minsterial labours were soon followed by tokens of good. “The people,” said he, in a letter to Dr Ryland, “are a simple-hearted, affectionate, praying people, to whom I preach with more pleasure than to the more refined audience at Cambridge. We have had, through mercy, some small addition, and hope for more. Our meetings in general, our prayer meetings in particular, are well attended.”

With this church he continued connected nearly twenty years. The church and congregation steadily increased during that long interval, and scarcely any thing of moment occurred to interrupt their internal peace. The place of worship, which when Mr Hall first settled there would not conveniently hold four hundred persons, was enlarged in 1809 for the reception of about eight hundred; and in 1817 a second enlargement rendered it capable of accommodating a thousand persons. In 1826, at the close of Mr Hall's labours there, the place was comfortably filled, and the members of the church, besides those who it is believed had gone to their eternal reward, amounted to nearly three hundred. More than a hundred of those who constituted the evening congregation were pious members of the church of England.

In the autumn of 1807 Mr Hall removed from Enderby to a house in Leicester, which he engaged partly that he might more conveniently associate with the people of his charge, and partly in anticipation of his marriage, which took place in March, 1808. This event gave great and sincere satisfaction to his old and intimate friends, most of whom had long regretted that one so evidently formed for domestic enjoyments, should for so many years have lived without attaining them; and had no doubt, indeed, that an earlier marriage would, by checking his propensity to incessant retirement and mental abstraction, have preserved him from the heavy afflictions which had befallen him. As Mrs Hall still lives to mourn the loss of her incomparable husband, I must not permit myself more than to testify how highly he estimated her kindness and affection, and how often, in his conversation, as well as in his letters, he expressed his gratitude to God for giving him so pious, prudent and devoted a wife. Of their five children, three daughters and one son survive. Another son died in 1814.

Mr Hall's residence at Leicester was not only of longer continuance than at any other place, but I doubt not that it was the period in which he was most happy, active and useful. His domestic comfort at once contributed to a more uniform flow of spirits than he had for some time experienced, and greatly to the regularity of his habits. The increase both of attentive hearers, and of the number among them who were admitted to church-fellowship, supplied constant reason for encouragement and thankfulness. He was also within the reach of ministers and others, of different persuasions, men of decided piety, and some of them of considerable attainments, who knew how to appreciate the extraordinary advantages of frequent intercourse with such an individual; thus yielding him the delight of an interchange of soul and sentiment, besides that fruit of friendship so aptly characterized by Lord Bacon:—"Whosoever hath his mind fraught with many thoughts, his wits and understanding do clarify and break up in the communicating and discoursing with another—he tosseth his thoughts more easily—he marshalleth them more orderly—he seeth how they look when they are turned into words—and he waxeth wiser than himself, often more by an hour's discourse than by a day's meditation[*]."

* For more than two years he employed much time in a critical examination of the New Testament, and in arranging such corrected translations as he deemed important, with short reasons for his deviating from the authorized version; intending to publish the whole in a pamphlet of about one hundred pages. Just as he had finished this work, he for the first time saw Macknight's new translation of the Apostolic Epistles; and finding himself anticipated in many of the corrections which he thought most valuable, destroyed his manuscript.

Leicester, from its situation in the heart of the midland counties, as well as from its importance in a leading inland manufacture, was the centre of influence and operation to a considerable distance around; and the concurrence of many favourable circumstances had rendered it the centre also of a religious influence, and of religious operations, diffusing themselves incessantly with a new and growing impulse. To this the zeal and activity of the late Rev. Thomas Robinson of Leicester, and of Mr Hall's father, had greatly contributed; and many clergymen and dissenting ministers in Leicestershire and the neighbouring counties, were, in their respective fields of labour, instrumental in producing the most cheering and successful results. The attention of the Christian world had been recently invited, or, I might perhaps say, summoned, to promote the noble objects of Missionary Societies, Bible Societies, Sunday and other Schools for the instruction of the poor; and the summons had been obeyed in a universality and cordiality of vigorous Christian effort, and in a spirit of conciliation and harmony, such as the world had not yet known. Placed in the midst of so extensive a sphere of benevolent and sacred influence, Mr Hall was soon roused to a measure of activity and a diversity of employment to which he had hitherto been a stranger. The Bible Society at Leicester, Missionary Societies there and all around, asked and received his aid; and these, with the different public services of frequent occurrence among orthodox dissenters, gave occasion to the happiest exercise of his varied powers.

His religious character thus became correctly estimated by a much larger portion of the community. Instead of being known chiefly to men of reading and taste, as an author who had appeared before the world on a few momentous occasions, and, after a striking exhibition of intellectual and moral energy, had hastened back to his retirement, he now became much more known and revered as the correct and eloquent interpreter of the Christian faith, the intrepid assertor of its infinite superiority to all human systems of philosophy or morals. Long had he been admired by the intelligent as a great man; the circumstances in which he now moved with so much philanthropic ardour, caused him to be regarded, not merely by these, but by pious men of every persuasion, as a good man, rejoicing to consecrate his best faculties to the specific objects of the Christian ministry, and such purposes of enlarged exertion as were fully compatible with his holy calling.

Nor were these efforts, and this high estimate of their value, confined to the field of activity he thus occupied. He had, on quitting Bristol in 1791, consented to spend a few weeks with his friends there, every two years. He had, also, made a similar arrangement for visiting Cambridge, where the members of his former congregation had peculiar claims upon him. Although his invariable dread of notoriety, and his dislike of the bustle of the metropolis, caused his visits there to be, "few and far between," yet they occurred sufficiently often to excite almost universally the highest admiration of his singular qualities as a preacher, and to convince many who previously had contemplated the evangelical system of religion with great disrelish, that it was the only foundation of elevated morality, and that its cordial adoption was not necessarily repugnant to genius, learning, and intellectual cultivation.

Wherever he went, he was called to address overflowing congregations, and commonly of a remarkably mixed character. Churchmen and dissenters; men of rank and influence, individuals in lower stations; men of simple piety, and others of deep theological knowledge; men who admired Christianity as a beautiful system, and those who received it into the heart by faith; men in doubt, others involved in unbelief:—all resorted to the place where he was announced as the preacher. Frequently he was apprized of this peculiarity in the structure of the auditory, and, whenever that was the case, the striking appropriation of the sermon to the assembly was always manifest. Of this the reader will have ample evidence in the sermons inserted in this volume, many of which were delivered on public occasions.

Mr Hall's writings during his residence at Leicester, though by no means numerous, tended greatly to augment his influence upon society.

The first of these was published anonymously in the Eclectic Review, but left no room for hesitation as to its author. It was a critique upon a pamphlet entitled "Zeal without Innovation," which he undertook at the earnest entreaty of the late Mr Robinson of Leicester, "who, in common with all the serious clergy in those parts, disapproved the pamphlet highly[*]". As it is no part of my intention to present elaborate accounts of Mr Hall's successive publications, it may suffice for me to remark with regard to this critique, that while it places the controversy between the puritans and their opponents in a flood of light, and exhibits the essential importance of religious liberty to the growth, if not in some cases, to the existence, of genuine, devotional Christianity; it presents a more admirable picture of the character of the Evangelical Clergy[†], a more powerful, liberal, and successful defence of their object and conduct, than has been, as yet, accomplished by any other person. Many regard it as among the most instructive and useful, as well as among the most masterly, of Mr Hall's productions. It abounds in keen satire, in irrefragable argument, in touching description, in tasteful imagery, in exquisite diction, and in sentiments of a weight and worth only to be fully estimated by men whose minds are elevated above the prejudices which tie us down to sects and parties, and can rejoice at the extension of true religion, among persons of any persuasion, or through the instrumentality of whomsoever the Great Head of the Church may employ. The value set by the public upon this disquisition, was evinced in the rapid sale of three editions, in a separate pamphlet, independently of its circulation in the Review.

Of the sermons published by Mr Hall during his residence at Leicester, the first was preached in behalf of the Sunday School connected with his own congregation, and appeared under the title of "The Advantages of Knowledge to the Lower Classes." The subject is not precisely adapted to the decorations of eloquence; for the deplorable effects of ignorance and the blessings of knowledge are best exhibited in the detail of facts, which admit of no embellishment. Mr Hall's desire to enlarge the capacity for enjoyment among the lower classes, as well as to promote their highest welfare, tempted him, however, to enter this region of commonplaces, and thus gave a fresh opportunity of showing how an original thinker can communicate an air of freshness to a worn-out topic, bring up to the surface arguments and illustrations that lie far below the reach of ordinary reasoners, and enforce them with a warmth and energy calculated equally to impress and to convince.

The two next sermons are of a much higher order. One of them, on "The Discouragements and Supports of the Christian Minister," was addressed to the Rev. James Robertson, on his ordination over the Independent Church at Stretton, Warwickshire; the other, which portrays the duties, discouragements, and supports "of the Christian Missionary," was addressed to the Rev. Eustace Carey, on his designation as a missionary to India. In these the author traces with a master hand the various sources of discouragement and consolation, which appertain to the respective offices of the minister and the missionary. Like one intimately acquainted with comparative anatomy, he exhibits the points of agreement, as well as those of diversity in the different subjects, with the most convincing discrimination; while conversant, as well with the morbid as the healthy anatomy of the subjects before him, he explores to its inmost recess, that universal moral disease which calls forth the efforts of both Ministers and Missionaries, and then (where the analogy must drop) he reveals the principles and the origin of an infallible cure. Both these addresses are remarkable for their originality and variety; every topic successively advanced is irradiated with eloquence, and glows with feeling; and so skilfully are both the discourses conducted, that, while they are avowedly directed to the minister and the missionary, and abound in the most valuable instructions to them respectively, the private Christian, who reads with devout attention, may derive from them as rich instruction for himself, and as many directions for his own religious improvement, as though they were specifically addressed to him alone. This, indeed, was a decided characteristic of Mr Hall's sermons. He who heard, or he who read, would find his astonishment and admiration strongly excited; but often, if not always, the more his emotion was enkindled by the preacher, the more forcibly was he compelled to retire to "the chambers of imagery," and examine his own heart.

[*] Mr Hall, however, from the midway position of Leicester between London, and the large towns in Lancashire and Yorkshire, was much exposed to interruptions. Many persons who had but a slight acquaintance with him would invariably spend a day at Leicester, in their way from London to Liverpool, Manchester, Sheffield, &c., or from either of those places to London, that they might, during the greater part of it, enjoy his society; and though he often felt this to be a real annoyance, yet such was his feeling of what was due to strangers in point of courtesy, that it was not until he had sustained the inconvenience for almost twenty years, that he would consent that this class of visitors should be informed he would not be at leisure to see them until evening.

[*] While this sheet was going through the press, I accidentally found among some old letters, one from a friend residing in France, in which there was the following allusion to Mr Hall by a French protestant clergyman, who was visiting Bristol in Sept. 1822. In a letter addressed to another protestant minister, Mr Kerpezdron, of Aulnay, he says:

"I heard Mr Robert Hall of Leicester, last Tuesday morning; but his sermon was so great, so good, so eloquent, so simple, so pious, in a word, so complete a piece of pulpit oratory, that I cannot tell you any thing about it, except that it has made an indelible impression on my mind. I thought when I came out, that I never could preach again."

[†] I use this term to avoid a periphrasis, and because it is intelligible and strictly characteristic.

The sudden and untimely death of the Princess Charlotte, of Wales, was an event calculated to make the deepest impression upon a mind constituted like Mr Hall's. The illustrious rank of the victim, her youth and recent marriage, the affecting nature of the catastrophe, its probable influence upon the reigning monarch, upon the succession to the throne, and the welfare of the nation even to distant ages; all presented themselves to his thoughts with the most heart-stirring energy. He preached three sermons on the occasion, of which many of the auditors affirm, the one published was by no means the best. It, however, by universal acknowledgement, bore the palm above all the numerous valuable sermons that were then published. It embraces the various topics that would occur to a man of piety, feeling, and excursive thought, on the contemplation of such an event,—the mysteriousness of God's providence, the vicissitudes of empires, the aggravated poignancy of sudden calamity to individuals of elevated station, "the uncertainty of life, the frailty of youth, the evanescence of beauty, the nothingness of worldly greatness," the blindness of man to futurity, "the human race itself withering" away, and the perpetuity of God's promises as the great and noble contrast to universal fragility;—these are touched in succession with the utmost tenderness, beauty, and sublimity. In felicity of diction, in delicacy and pathos, in the rich variety of most exquisite and instructive trains of thought, in their cogent application to truths of the utmost moment, in the masterly combination of what in eloquence, philosophy and religion, was best calculated to make a permanent and salutary impression, this sermon probably stands unrivalled.

Besides the various sermons and reviews which he wrote and published, during his residence at Leicester, he composed for circulation among the associated Baptist churches in the counties of Northampton, Leicester and Warwick, two tracts on the Work of the Holy Spirit, and on Hearing the Word; both deeply imbued with simple evangelical truth, and rich in excellent practical remarks, fitted for the beneficial perusal of all classes. There were also other compositions which he executed with singular felicity. I mean, his biographical sketches. They are, except the rapid but exquisite sketches of Brainerd, Fletcher of Madeley, and Henry Martyn, the delineations of a friend; and, perhaps, in a few particulars, need a slight allowance for the high colouring to which the warmth of friendship tempts us when meditating upon departed excellence; yet they are, on the whole, exact in the resemblance, and finely exemplify the author's varied powers, especially his delicate and accurate discrimination of the degrees and shades of human character.

One of these, the Character of the Rev. John Sutcliff is an unfinished portrait; Mr Hall, after a few unsatisfactory trials, relinquishing the attempt. The following letter to Mr Fuller, on the occasion of this failure, will be read with interest, as an example both of his diffidence and of his sense of the obligation of a promise.

"My Dear Brother,

"I am truly concerned to tell you that I cannot succeed at all in my attempts to draw the character of our dear and venerable brother Sutcliff. I have made several efforts, and have sketched, as well as I could, the outlines of what I conceive to be his character; but have failed in producing such a portrait as appears to me fit for the public eye. I am perfectly convinced that your intimacy with him, and your powers of discrimination, will enable you to present to posterity a much juster and more impressive idea of him than I can. I am heartily sorry I promised it. But promises I hold sacred; and, therefore, if you insist upon it, and are not willing to release me from my engagement, I will accomplish the task as well as I can. But if you will let the matter pass sub silentio, without reproaching me, you will oblige me considerably. It appears to me that, if I ever possessed a faculty of character-drawing, I have lost it, probably for want of use; as I am far from taking any delight in a minute criticism on character, to which, in my younger days, I was excessively addicted. Both our tastes and talents change with the progress of years. The purport of these lines, however, is to request you to absolve me from my promise, in which light I shall interpret your silence; holding myself ready, however, to comply with your injunctions.

"I am, my dear sir,
"Your affectionate brother,
"Sept. 1814." "R. Hall."

For several years, about this time, Mr Hall's thoughts were greatly occupied upon the subject of "Terms of Communion." His first publication in reference to it appeared in 1815: but they who were admitted to his intimacy, will recollect how often, three or four years before its appearance, he advocated a cautious revision of the practice of nearly all churches; and how successfully he refuted the arguments of those who favoured any narrow system of exclusion. He regarded the existence of a principle which made so many churches points of repulsion instead of centres of union, as a very serious evil; and often deplored it in language similar to that which commences his first production on the subject.

The discussion, indeed, is neither of slight, nor of temporary interest. It involves the prevailing practice of every church in Christendom, whether established, or independent of an establishment; and it includes an answer to the inquiry how purity of faith and conduct shall be preserved, without an infringement of the principles requisite to make every church a portion of that sublime invisible society, the "Church Universal," constituted of all the members of Christ's mystical body.

Rapidly approaching, as we seem to be, to that state of things, when all churches, national as well as others, will feel the expediency, if not the necessity, of reverting to first principles in modifying and improving their several communities, the controversy or "Terms of Communion" forces itself upon the attention as one of primary importance, serving to ascertain and determine almost every question of value in reference to ecclesiastical polity.

I thus, though but for a moment, advert to this controversy, that the general reader may not be induced to undervalue it. It occupies the greater portion of the second volume of these works, besides the substance of a distinct pamphlet inserted in the third volume. Of the different writers who opposed Mr Hall on this occasion. Mr Kinghorn was, unquestionably, the most acute and learned. His volume should be read, in connexion with Mr Hall's, by such as wish to view the question in all its bearings. Mr Hall's part of the controversy is conducted with his characteristic frankness and decision; and evinces the same clearness, copiousness, strength and majesty of diction, as he uniformly displayed upon every subject to which he bent his mind with all its power. Sometimes when a narrow, illiberal sentiment, calculated to check the spirit of Christian union and affection, excites his indignation, he rebukes with a cutting severity: and I feel no inclination to deny, that, in a few cases, he has suffered himself to indulge in terms of sarcasm, if not of contempt, that add nothing to his argument, and had been better spared. Yet, as one of his bitterest opponents has declared, "it was seldom that his thunder was heard, but the bolt was felt; and both were exercised on the side of truth and virtue."

In these, as in others of his controversial pieces, the reader may safely reckon upon much that is eloquent and impressive, apart from what immediately relates to the questions under debate. Among which may be specified the remarks on excommunication, the beautiful delineation of the conduct of our Lord, the passages distinguishing between conditions of salvation and meritorious conditions, and those in which he discriminates between the atonement contemplated as a fact, and as a doctrine, and thence infers the "peculiar glory of the Gospel in contradistinction from the law of Moses."

About this time* Mr Hall had a correspondence with a friend on a kindred subject, that of occasional communion. That individual, though a decided baptist, and long a member of a dissenting church, was in the habit of occasional communion with an episcopalian chapel in his neighbourhood, of which the minister held evangelical sentiments. Mr Hall expressed a desire to be acquainted with his reasons for this practice. In reply he informed Mr Hall that he thought those reasons flowed obviously from the principles for which he himself was so earnestly and successfully contending: that one of the highest enjoyments of a man who humbly hoped he constituted a part of the church universal, was to testify his feeling of brotherhood with other assemblies of orthodox Christians, than that with which he was immediately connected, by holding communion with them at convenient seasons: that in this respect, as the political grounds of dissent were of very little value in his esteem, he made no mental distinction between established and separate churches: that having no conscientious objection to kneeling at the sacrament, and having resolved never to communicate even occasionally but where he had reason to believe the bulk of those who partook of the sacrament were real Christians, he felt no hesitation as to the propriety, while he could speak decidedly as to the comfort, of the course he had pursued. He stated, farther, that with Richard Baxter he "disowned the principle of many who think their presence maketh them guilty of all that is faulty in the public worship and ministration: for this dissolveth all worshipping churches on earth, without exception;" that he considered Baxter's refutation of Dr. Owen's arguments against occasional communion as complete; and that he would rather err in the spirit of Baxter and Howe, on such a question, than be right according to the narrow measures by which too many would enforce a contrary practice. Mr Hall's reply, which is subjoined, exemplifies his usual manner of guarding against a misapprehension of the real extent of his agreement with another, upon any disputed point.

"6th March, 1818.

"My Dear Friend,

"I am much obliged to you for the frankness with which you have answered my inquiries. Perhaps I may not be quite prepared to go with you to the full extent of your moderation; though on this I have by no means made up my mind. I admire the spirit with which you are actuated, and esteem you more than ever for the part you have acted. I perfectly agree with you that the old grounds of dissent are the true ones, and that our recent apologists have mixed up too much of a political cast in their reasonings upon this subject. Though I should deprecate the founding of any established church, in the popular sense of that term, I think it very injudicious to lay that as the corner-stone of dissent. We have much stronger ground in the specific corruptions of the church of England, ground which our pious ancestors occupied, and which may safely defy every attempt of the most powerful and acute minds to subvert. With respect to occasional conformity, I by no means think it involves an abandonment of dissent; and I am inclined to think that, were I in a private station, (not a minister I mean), I should, under certain circumstances, and in certain situations, be disposed to practise it; though nothing would induce me to acknowledge myself a permanent member of the church of England.

"In regard to episcopacy, it appears to me entirely a human, though certainly a very early invention. It was unknown, I believe, in the apostolical times; with the exception, probably, of the latter part of John's time. But as it was practised in the second and third centuries, I should have no conscientious objection to it. As it subsists at present among us, I am sorry to say I can scarcely conceive a greater [abuse]. It subverts equally the rights of pastors and of people, and is nothing less than one of the worst relics of the papal hierarchy. Were every thing else what it ought to be in the established church, prelacy, as it now subsists, would make me a decided dissenter.

"I remain, my dear sir, with great esteem,
"Yours, most affectionately,
"R. Hall."

Mr Hall's engagements for the press, numerous and heavy as they were, to one who wrote with so much difficulty and pain, did not draw him aside from pastoral watchfulness over his church and congregation; nor were they permitted to shorten those hours of retirement in which he sought "converse with God." Nothing, on the contrary, was more evident than his increased spirit of devotion as he advanced in life. About the year 1812, he commenced the practice of setting apart one day in a month for especial prayer and fasting. On these occasions he retired into his study immediately after the morning domestic worship, and remained there until the evening. Finding this eminently conducive to his own comfort, at the end of about two years he recommended the church to hold quarterly fasts. They at once adopted the recommendation; and some of the members often speak of the first meeting for this purpose, as a most extraordinary season of devout and solemn feeling.

About the same time, or somewhat earlier, he announced his opinion of the disadvantage arising from the presence of others besides the communicants on sacramental occasions. In a short address he explained the customs of the early Christians with regard to the Lord's Supper, and showed that the admission of spectators, who were not members of the church, during the celebration, was comparatively a modern innovation. He pointed out the inconclusiveness of the ordinary arguments,—that spectators often receive benefit from the addresses of the ministers, and that therefore their exclusion was cutting them off from good, and that such exclusion was an infringement of religious liberty. He also stated that the presence of such spectators deprived him of much comfort during the communion service, and that he should regard their keeping away as a personal kindness to himself. His address was received with affectionate respect; and from that time, those who had previously remained to witness the administration discontinued the custom.

Some time after the conclusion of his part of the controversy on "Terms of Communion," he made an effort to persuade the church at Harvey Lane to adopt the practice of "mixed communion;" but, finding that it would disturb the peace which had so long subsisted in the society, he relinquished his intention, and recommended the formation of a distinct church on the mixed communion principle, its sacramental service being held on the morning of the same sabbath on which the "strict communion" church held its corresponding service in the afternoon. This plan was adopted and followed during Mr Hall's continuance at Leicester, without causing any interruption of the harmony which prevailed among the different classes of worshippers.

In the year 1823, the minister of a Unitarian congregation at Leicester, having delivered a series of what are usually denominated "Challenge Lectures," in defence of his own opinions, to hear which individuals of other persuasions were publicly invited, Mr Hall felt it to be his duty to offer a timely antidote to the evil. He, therefore, preached twelve lectures on the points at issue, and had the happiness to know that they were serviceable in checking the diffusion of Socinian error. His concise outline of these lectures, as well as fuller notes of two or three, are inserted in the fifth volume. He was strongly urged by several members of his congregation, and by various neighbouring ministers, to publish the whole; but unfortunately replied, that though he believed they had been beneficial, he was conscious they contained nothing that could be regarded as really new in the controversy; and that Dr Wardlaw had so admirably occupied the ground in his sermons, already before the public, that any thing which he could offer in print would only be regarded as an impertinent intrusion.

Throughout the whole of Mr Hall's residence at Leicester, he suffered much from his constitutional complaint; and neither his habit of smoking, nor that of taking laudanum*, seemed effectually to alleviate his sufferings. It was truly surprising that this constant severe pain, and the means adopted to mitigate it, did not in any measure diminish his mental energy. A little difference was, perhaps, discernible in the vivacity of his conversation; but his preaching had, as yet, lost nothing of its force. In letters to his friends he expressed a hope that "a greater savour of Jesus Christ accompanied his ministry;" and remarked, that "his strain of preaching was much less elegant, but more intended for instruction, for awakening conviction, and carrying home truth with power to the heart." And thus it was found, that, as he advanced in years, though there might be a little less of elaboration and polish, there was more of spiritual feeling, more of tender and earnest expostulation, and of that pungency of application to the heart and conscience, which resulted from an enlarged acquaintance with human character, and a deeper knowledge of "the things of God." That the divine blessing accompanied these labours, and in many cases rendered the impression permanent, the history of the church and congregation abundantly proves.

*Nearly at this time, also, viz. in September, 1817, the faculty of Marischal College, Aberdeen, at the instance of their late learned principal, Dr W. L. Brown, conferred upon Mr Hall the degree of D. D. in testimony of their high admiration of his talents and character. He felt much gratified by this mark of their good opinion; but, having a conscientious objection to the title of Doctor of Divinity, he never adopted it.

* In 1812 he took from fifty to one hundred drops every night. Before 1826 the quantity had increased to one thousand drops.

The death of Dr Ryland in 1825 led to Mr Hall's invitation to take the pastoral office over the church at Broadmead, Bristol, an office which had been long and honourably sustained by that excellent individual. After some months spent in anxious deliberation, in advising with his friends, and seeking counsel from above, from the dread he felt lest he "should rush into a sphere of action to which he was not called, and offend God by deserting his proper post," he at length decided to dissolve his long and happy connexion with the church at Leicester. The day of separation, the last sacrament sabbath, March 26th 1826, was a day of anguish to him and them, of which I shall not attempt the description. Suffice it to say, that he went through the ordinary public duties of the day with tolerable composure[*]; but at the sacramental service he strove in vain to conceal his emotion. In one of his addresses to the members of the church, on adverting to the pain of separation, he was so much affected that he sat down, covered his face with his hands, and wept; they sharing in his distress, gave unequivocal signs of the deepest feeling. Mr Eustace Carey, who was present, continued the devotional part of the service, until Mr Hall was sufficiently recovered to proceed. At the close of the solemnity the weeping became again universal, and they parted "sorrowing most of all that they should see his face no more."

Very shortly afterwards the church received from Mr Hall the following letter of resignation:

"To the Church of Christ meeting in Harvey-Lane, Leicester.

"3d April, 1826.

"My dear Brethren and Sisters,

"I take this opportunity of solemnly and affectionately resigning the pastoral charge which I have long sustained among you, and of expressing, at the same time, the deep sense I shall ever retain of the marks of affection and esteem, with which, both collectively and individually, you have honoured me.

"Though the providence of God has, as I conceive, called me to labour in another part of his vineyard, my solicitude for your spiritual welfare will ever remain unimpaired, nor will any thing give me more joy than to hear of your growth in grace, peace, and prosperity. My prayer will never cease to ascend to the God of all comfort, that he will establish your hearts in love, unite you more and more in the fellowship of saints, and make you fruitful in every good work.

"Let me earnestly intreat you to guard most anxiously against whatever may tend to weaken your union, diminish your affection, or embitter your spirits against each other. 'Let brotherly love continue:' 'Seek peace and pursue it:' and, 'may the God of peace, who brought again from the dead the Lord Jesus Christ, that Great Shepherd of the sheep, stablish, strengthen, settle, and make you perfect.'

"I hope that, in the choice of a successor, you will earnestly and anxiously seek divine direction; prefer the useful to the splendid; the solid to the glittering and showy; and be supplied with a pastor who will, in doctrine, exhibit 'uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity and sound speech which cannot be condemned,' and be in manner and behaviour a pattern to believers.

"Permit me, on this occasion, to return you my sincere acknowledgements for the uniform kindness with which you have treated me, the respectful attention you have paid to my ministry, and the candour with which you have borne my infirmities.

"With my most earnest prayers for your spiritual and eternal welfare, I remain,
"My dear brethren and sisters,
"Your obliged and affectionate friend and brother,
"Robert Hall."

Mr Hall was in his sixty-second year when he removed to Bristol, the scene of his first continuous labours, and now to become the scene of his closing ministry. Some of the friends of his early life still survived to welcome his return among them; and many others, who had profited by his pulpit exertions on his periodical visits to Bristol, congratulated themselves that he to whom, under God, they owed so much, had become their pastor. All things indeed, except his infirm state of health, seemed to conspire in promoting his own happiness as well as the prosperity of the church with which he had again connected himself.

The church and congregation soon received numerous accessions. In writing to a friend, early in 1829, he says, "I continue to be very happy with my people, from whom I daily receive every demonstration of affection and respect. Our attendance is as good as I could wish; and we have added to the Baptist church, during the last year, twenty-seven, and six are standing candidates for baptism. For these tokens of the divine presence I desire to be thankful."

His heavenly Father, during the concluding years of his life, made a rich provision for his social enjoyments, both in his family, and among his friends. Besides the comfort of frequent association with many of his own flock, his pleasures were greatly heightened by intercourse with Mr Foster, and the tutors of the Baptist Academy, as well as with several clergymen and other ministers, and laymen, residing in Bristol and its vicinity. It is true, that wherever he went, or in whatever he engaged, he carried with him the complaint from which he had suffered so much and so long. It had become, as his esteemed friend Mr Addington termed it, "an internal apparatus of torture;" yet, such was the peculiar structure of his mind, doubtless fortified and prepared for patient endurance by an energy imparted from above, that though his appointment by day and by night was incessant pain, yet high enjoyment was, notwithstanding, the law of his existence.

Between his final removal to Bristol, and his death, he visited his friends at Cambridge twice, namely, in 1827 and 1829. These visits were undertaken with the sense of responsibility of one who had formerly been their pastor: and he made it a rule so to arrange his time while there, as to see, converse with, and exhort every member of the church, and a great proportion of the congregation. He paid also one visit to his recently quitted flock at Leicester; and two to his friends in London. On these occasions the anxiety to hear him preach was as great as it had ever been; while his sermons were characterized in a high degree by the qualities that had long distinguished them,—with the addition of a stronger manifestation of religious and benevolent affections, a still more touching persuasiveness of manner, continued with an increasing intensity of feeling, with deeper and deeper solemnity of appeal; the entire effect being greatly augmented by the sudden introduction, just as the last sentence seemed dropping from his lips, of some new topic of application or of caution, most urgently pressed; as though he could not cease to invite, to warn, to expostulate, until the "Great Master of assemblies" vouchsafed to him the assurance that he had not been pleading his cause in vain[*].

Mr Hall's increasing infirmities did not extinguish his literary ardour, or abate his love of reading. Except during the first years of his residence at Cambridge, reading, and the thinking it called forth, were his incessant occupation to the very close of life; and both the pursuit, and its application to the benefit of others, yielded him the highest delight. In his early life, as I have already mentioned, it was common with him to carry on five or six different courses of study, simultaneously. But for the last ten or twelve years, he mostly confined himself to one book at a time, and read it to the end. His reading continued to be very extensive and varied, (for it was his decided opinion that every species of knowledge might be rendered subservient to religion), but his predilection, next to the Scriptures, was for works of clear, strong and conclusive reasoning, though conveyed in language far from elevated, and sometimes perhaps obscure. Thus he, for full sixty years, read Jonathan Edwards' writings with undiminished pleasure. And of Chillingworth's "Religion of Protestants," he has often been known to say, "It is just like reading a novel:" which indeed, was his usual expression of commendation, with regard to such works of a dry or abstract nature, as discovered subtilty, depth, or vigour of thought. In this class he placed the works of Jeremy Bentham, for whom he entertained the highest estimation, as an original, profound and accurate thinker; observing often, that in the particular province of his speculations, the science of legislation, he had advanced to the limits of reason; and that if he were compelled to legislate for the world upon uninspired principles, "he should take Bentham, and go from state to state with as firm a step as though he walked upon a pavement of adamant*".

[*] In order that neither his feelings nor those of the congregation might be too severely tried, during the public services, he preached two sermons for the Baptist Mission:—That in the morning from Ephes. iii. 8 "Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given, that I should preach among the Gentiles, the unsearchable riches of Christ:"—That in the evening, from Matt. vi. 10. "Thy Kingdom come."

[*] It was seldom that the friends who attempted to take down Mr Hall's sermons did not unconsciously relinquish writing as he approached the close.

If, at any time, he could not settle a point of interest without studying a language of which he was ignorant, that constituted no impediment. Shortly before he quitted Leicester, a friend found him one morning, very early, lying on the carpet, with an Italian dictionary and a volume of Dante, before him. Being about to quit the room, he said, "No, sir, don't go. I will tell you what I have been about for some weeks. A short time since I was greatly delighted with a parallel between the Paradise Lost, and the Divine Comedy of Dante, which I read in the Edinburgh Review. But in matters of taste, as well as others, I always like to judge for myself; and so I have been studying Italian. I have caught the idiom, and am reading Dante with great relish; though I cannot yet say, with Milton,

"'Now my task is smoothly done,
I can fly or I can run.'"

It may seem somewhat out of place, yet I shall be forgiven if I here insert an extract of a letter just received from Mr Ryley, one of Mr Hall's most intelligent Leicester friends, in reference to his course of reading there.

"It was what some men might think desultory; but it was essentially a constant habit of grappling with the strong. Belles Lettres he did not altogether neglect, though he held the average of such literature in small estimation. Poetry he seldom read, nor did he seem to me to have even studied it con amore. He thought Gray's Elegy the finest thing ever written. Milton was his favourite. There was something peculiar in his habits respecting poetry. He spoke slightly of poets, with few exceptions, and those few by no means what might have been expected from his own highly imaginative cast of mind. Yet, when he did get hold of an exquisite poem, he would read it with intense attention, apparently with the deepest interest, and then abuse it. With the exception of Milton, who is, in fact, an antique, he preferred the ancient to the modern poets. Of the poetry of our own day, he spoke with a contempt, which an accurate or extensive acquaintance with it, would have compelled him to relinquish. He had not, I think, made history a distinct and consecutive study, though he had read many of the original historians. He seemed to feel this of late years, and gave much of his time to the subject."

His enjoyment of the writings of the illustrious men of Greece and Rome, remained unimpaired to the last. Plato, Aristotle and Cicero, suggested to him many noble arguments in favour of an internal spring of morality, which he employed with his wonted skill in support of the religion of pure motive and devotedness of spirit. Virgil's Georgics he characterized as the most finished of human compositions; and he continued to prefer Virgil to Homer. He greatly admired the copiousness, grace, and harmony, of Cicero's diction; but considered Demosthenes by far the most powerful orator the world had known; and after speaking with fervid applause of the oration περι Στεφανου, added, that he thought it impossible for a man of soul and feeling to read a single page without catching fire. Only a few months before his last illness, in classifying the different natures and respective effects of the eloquence of reason, of passion and of imagination, he selected his principal illustrations from Demosthenes, and endeavoured to show that where the two former kinds of eloquence existed in due proportion, the third was of very minor consequence. The individual to whom he made these remarks was struck, as he proceeded, with the development which they supplied of the causes of the deep impression made by his own pulpit addresses; and imputed his more sparing use of imagery in later years, rather to the deliberate conviction of his mind, than to any diminution of the imaginative faculty.

But I must restrain myself, and pass to Mr Hall's everyday habits after his return to Bristol. The course of his life at home, when not interrupted by visitors, was very uniform. He generally rose and took his breakfast about nine o'clock. Breakfast was immediately succeeded by family worship. At this exercise he went regularly through the Scriptures, reading a portion of the Old Testament in the morning, and of the New Testament in the evening. On Sunday morning he almost invariably read the ninety-second Psalm, being short, and appropriate to the day. He also read in his family the translation of the four Gospels, by Campbell, whom he particularly admired, and often recommended, as an accurate translator, and a critic of great acuteness, taste and judgment. He seldom made any remarks on the portion of Scripture, except when strangers were present, who, he knew would be disappointed at their entire omission. He regarded himself as very incompetent to render this brief kind of exposition instructive. In the prayer that succeeded, he was not in the habit of forming his petitions on the passage of Scripture just read, though the prayer was usually of considerable length, and very minute in its appropriation. He adverted specifically to all the persons belonging to his family, present and absent; never forgot the people of his care; and dwelt on the distinct cases of members of the Church that were under any kind of trial or affliction.

After breakfast and worship, he retired into his study, and uniformly spent some time in devotion, afterwards generally reading a portion of the Hebrew Bible. For the two last years, he read daily two chapters of Matthew Henry's Commentary. As he proceeded he felt increasing interest and pleasure; admiring the copiousness, variety, and pious ingenuity of the thoughts; the simplicity, strength and pregnancy of the expressions. He earnestly recommended this commentary to his daughters; and on hearing the eldest reading, for successive mornings, to the second, he expressed the highest delight. The remainder of the morning until dinner, about three o'clock, was spent in reading some work of learning, or of severe thought. After dinner he generally retired to his study, and, if not in so much pain as to prevent it, slept for some time.

On Tuesday evenings are held what are termed "the conferences," in the vestry of the Broadmead chapel: they are meetings ordinarily attended by about two hundred persons, at which two of the students belonging to the Bristol Education Society, or one of the students and the president, speak on a passage of Scripture previously selected for the purpose. Mr Hall always attended on these occasions, and concluded by speaking for about a quarter of an hour, on the subject of the preceding address. He also attended the prayer meetings, in the same place, on Thursday evenings; except once a month, namely, on the Thursday previous to the administration of the Lord's Supper, when he preached.

The other evenings in the week, except Saturday, (and that, indeed, not always excepted), he usually spent at the house of one or other of his congregation, with a very few friends, who were invited to meet him. His inability to walk having greatly increased, his friends generally sent a carriage for him about six o'clock, and conveyed him back about ten.

It is difficult to say whether he had greater fondness for retirement or for company. It displeased him if, especially by sudden interruptions, he was obliged to give up his morning hours of study to visitors; and it would commonly have been a disappointment, if he had not the opportunity of spending his evenings in society. If he were, at any time, thrown among persons of distinguished talents and attainments, and their general character pleased him, it was soon shown how truth and knowledge might be educed by the operation of intellect upon intellect, and how rich a field of instruction and delight would thus be open for the general enjoyment of the party. Usually, however, his choice turned simply upon the prerequisite of piety; he sought for no other acquisitions in his associates than the graces of the Spirit; intelligence added to the enjoyment, but was not essential to it. The society of old friends had with him an exquisite charm, which was greatly heightened if their fathers had been known and esteemed by him or his father; such intercourse, requiring no effort, gave full scope to his affections, without disturbing his mental repose. He uniformly retired from these evening parties, full of grateful references to the pleasure which he had felt. If any of his family who accompanied him, happened to say that the evening had been dull, he would reply, "I don't think so. It was very pleasant. I enjoyed it. I enjoy every thing." Considering the continuity of his sufferings, how touching a commentary is this upon the inspired aphorism, "the good man shall be satisfied from himself!"

* He always recommended those who were likely to be offended with the strangeness of Bentham's style, to study his principles through the medium of his elegant French commentator, M. Dumont.

Mr Hall commonly retired to rest a little before eleven o'clock; but, after his first sleep, which lasted about two hours, he quitted his bed to obtain an easier position on the floor, or upon three chairs; and would then employ himself in reading the book on which he had been engaged during the day. Sometimes, indeed, often, the laudanum, large as the doses had become, did not sufficiently neutralize his pain, to remove the necessity for again quitting his bed*. In these cases he would again put on the dress prepared to keep him adequately warm, and resume his reading. On Sunday mornings, as soon as he awoke, it was usual with him to say, "This is the Lord's day. This is the day the Lord hath made; let us rejoice and be glad in it." And he often impressed it on his family, that they ought "not to think their own thoughts," or "to find their own pleasure," on that day.

He did not pursue any plan of training, or of discipline, with his children. He was remarkably affectionate and indulgent; but he did nothing systematically to correct defects, to guide or excite their minds. Now and then he recommended his daughters to read some particular book; one, perhaps, that he had himself read with peculiar satisfaction: but beyond this there do not appear to have been any direct, specific, endeavours to impart knowledge, or, in any uniform manner, to inculcate religious principles.

When, however, any of his children were about to quit home for a short time, it was his practice to summon them to his study, exhort them, and pray with them. One of his daughters on writing to a friend after his death, says, "Well I remember that, when I was a child, on leaving home for a few days, or on going to school, he would call me into the study, give me the tenderest advice, make me to kneel down by him at the same chair, and then, both bathed in tears, would he fervently supplicate the divine protection for me. This, I believe, he did with regard to all of us on leaving home, while young." Their minds were also often deeply impressed, by hearing him, as they passed his study door, commending them, by name, with the utmost fervency, to God, and entreating those blessings for each, which, in his judgment, each most needed†.

Periodical private fasts, such as those which he observed at Leicester, he continued to observe at Bristol, making them seasons of extraordinary self-examination, prayer, and renewed dedication to God. He was not in the habit of keeping a regular journal, nor, generally speaking, did he approve of it, from a persuasion that it tempted to an artificial tone of expression which did not accord with the actual state of the heart. But on some solemn occasions he made a short note, in one of his memorandum books, containing hints of texts, &c.

Thus: "New-years'-day, January first, 1826. I have begun the year with a sincere resolution, in the strength of divine grace, to devote myself wholly and entirely to God: but, knowing my extreme weakness and corruption, I dare place no dependence whatever on my own resolutions. I have, on many occasions, found them unstable as water. I can only cast myself on the mercy of my God, and cry, with the Psalmist, 'Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe.' O Thou most holy and merciful Lord God, I beseech Thee to take up thine abode in my heart, and shape me entirely anew. Amen. Amen."

Again, on his birth-day 1828. "This day I commence my 64th [65th] year. What reason have I to look with shame and humiliation on so long a tract of years spent to so little purpose. Alas! I am ashamed of my barrenness and unprofitableness. Assist me, O Lord, by Thy grace, that I may spend the short residue of my days in a more entire devotion to Thy service. It is my purpose, in the strength of divine grace, to take a more minute inspection into the state of my heart, and the tenor of my actions, and to make such observations and memorandums as circumstances may suggest. But, to Thee, O Lord, do I look for all spiritual strength, to keep Thy way, and do Thy will."

Mr Hall still evinced a peculiar solicitude for the welfare of the poorer members of his flock, and greatly lamented his incapacity, from the loss of locomotive energy, to seek them out in their own habitations, and associate with them frequently, as he had done with the poor at Cambridge and Leicester. He publicly expressed his concern that some plan was not arranged for his meeting them in small parties at specified times, and assured them of the cordial readiness with which his part of such a plan should be executed. This, I believe, was not accomplished.

The indications of infirm age now rapidly exhibited themselves, but happily were unaccompanied by a decaying mind, or a querulous spirit. The language of his conduct, and of his heart, corresponded with that of the pious ancient, "Lord, give me patience now, and ease hereafter!" If tempests come they will not last long, but soon will be hushed into an eternal calm.

His inability to take exercise, on account of the gradual increase of his complaint, gave rise, about six years before his death, to another disorder, formidable in its nature, and fatal in its issue. The indications of a plethoric habit became more and more apparent. "Thus," adopting the language of Mr Addington, "the system of the blood-vessels had a laborious duty to perform in circulating their fluid, which, for want of the full aid of muscular exertion, could not be equally distributed. The smaller ones on the surface of the body, and in the extremities, never appeared to derive a sufficient quantity of blood to furnish the usual proportion of animal heat, while the large trunks in the interior became overloaded. The natural consequence was, that the heart, on whose power the propulsion of the blood to the extremities depends, being over stimulated and oppressed by the condition of the large vessels, became weakened; and, occasionally failing in the regular and equable transmission of the blood, would produce a sensation of distress in the region of the chest." The malady, thus produced, becoming more and more severe, Mr Hall, when in London in 1828, was persuaded by his friends to take the advice of an eminent physician: from which, however, no permanent good resulted. By the summer of 1830, the disorder had increased so seriously, that his medical friends at Bristol recommended a suspension of his pastoral duties for a few weeks, that he might try the effect of a total change of air and scene.

He therefore spent some time at Coleford, in the forest of Dean, in the society of his old and valued friend, the Rev. Isaiah Birt. He also spent a few weeks at Cheltenham. At both these places he preached with his accustomed talent; and his general appearance too clearly indicating that the close of his ministerial labours was at hand, gave a deeper impression to his instructions and exhortations. When absent from home he was in the habit of writing to his children. My narrow limits have prevented my giving extracts from any of those letters; but I am induced to insert part of one, written at this time to his son, who had been placed with a respectable chemist and druggist at Bristol, in the hope that it may be useful to other youths in similar circumstances.

"15*th October*, 1830.

"MY DEAR ROBERT,

"I have long desired to write to you, that I might communicate to you some hints of advice, which I could convey more easily, and, perhaps, more effectually, than by speaking.

"I need not tell you, my dear boy, how solicitous I am for your welfare in both worlds, and how often I have borne you on my heart in my secret addresses to that Father which is in Heaven. But alas! the prayers of parents for their children will avail nothing, if they are not induced to pray for themselves, 'for every one must give an account of himself to God.' I hope, my dear child, you do not live in the entire neglect of this most important duty: let me entreat you to attend to it constantly, and never to begin or end a day without it. Daily entreat the pardon of your sins, for the sake of the Redeemer, and earnestly implore the assistance of his grace, to enable you to resist temptation, and to live in such a manner as shall prepare you for a blessed immortality. Pray do not neglect, at the same time, to read a portion, longer or shorter, of the word of God. 'Wherewith shall a young man cleanse his ways, but by taking heed thereto according to thy word!'

"I hope, my dear Robert, you will continue in your present situation. On the supposition of your doing so (and I can do nothing better for you), let me entreat you to make it your constant care to conciliate the esteem of Mr C——, which you will certainly do, if you cheerfully comply with his orders, and make his interest your own. Nothing injures the character of a young man more than restlessness and fickleness; nothing, on the contrary, secures his credit and comfort like a steady and persevering attention to the duties of his station. Every situation has its inconveniences and its difficulties; but time and perseverance will surmount the one, and make you almost insensible of the other. The consciousness of having overcome difficulties, and combatted trials successfully, will afford you, in the issue, a far higher satisfaction than you can ever hope to obtain by recoiling from them.

* For more than twenty years he had not been able to pass a whole night in bed. When this is borne in mind, it is truly surprising that he wrote and published so much; nay, that he did not sink into dotage before he was fifty years of age.

† His habit of oral, audible, private prayer, rested upon the conviction, that silent prayer was apt to degenerate into meditation, while, from our compound nature, a man cannot but be affected by the sound of his own voice, when adequately expressing what is really felt.

"Combat idleness in all its forms; nothing is so destructive as idle habits, nothing so useful as habits of industry.

* * * * * * *

"Never demean yourself by contending about trifles; yield in things of small moment to the inclinations and humours of your companions. In a word, my dear boy, make yourself amiable.

"Fear God, and love your fellow-creatures, and be assured you will find 'Wisdom's ways, ways of pleasantness, and her paths, paths of peace.'

"To say all in one word, 'If you are wise, my heart shall rejoice, even mine.'

"I am your affectionate father,
"ROBERT HALL[*]."

On Mr Hall's return to Bristol towards the end of October, hopes were entertained that his health was improved, and his strength recruited; but they were only of short duration. The spasmodic affection of the chest occurred with increasing frequency, and in a more alarming character. In one instance, on the first of January 1831, the attack was so severe as to threaten immediate dissolution. It passed off, however, as former attacks had done, on taking blood from the arm; and soon afterwards he returned to spend the remainder of the evening with the friends whom he had left when the paroxysm came on; and in his usual cheerful and happy spirit took his ordinary share, and evinced an undiminished interest, in the conversation.

The morning of that day had been signalized by the extraordinary pathos which he imparted to the religious services, at a prayer meeting, held according to annual custom, in the vestry at Broadmead. The intensity of his devotional feelings, and the fervour of his supplications in behalf of the assembled congregation; as well as the glowing affection and deep solemnity with which he addressed them, as he reviewed the past dispensations of providence, and anticipated some of the probable events of the year now opening upon them, both in relation to them and himself, excited the strongest emotion, and, in connexion with the events that immediately followed, made an indelible impression upon their minds; nearly all his subsequent addresses, whether on the Sunday or the week-day evening services, partook, more or less, of the same pathetic and solemnly anticipatory character. One of the most impressive of these, of which many of the congregation retain a vivid recollection, was delivered on the morning of Sunday, January 16th. The text from which he preached was, Deuteronomy xxxiii. 25: "Thy shoes shall be iron and brass; and as thy days, so shall thy strength be."

In this discourse he seemed to be preparing his people and himself, for that event by which they were to be deprived of their invaluable pastor, and he to be freed from anguish and sorrow: when, his soul liberated from its chain, and clothed in the Redeemer's righteousness, was to go forth, "first into liberty, then into glory."

A highly valued correspondent[†], whose communications greatly enrich this volume, enables me to present the following summary of Mr Hall's application or improvement; which from its occasion as well as its excellence, cannot but be read with lively interest.

"Improvement. I. Take no thought, no anxious, distressing, harassing thought, for the morrow; suffer not your minds to be torn asunder by doubt or apprehension. Consider, rather, what is the present will of God, and rest satisfied and content; without anticipating evils which may never arrive.

"Do not heighten your present sorrows by a morbid imagination. You know not what a day may bring forth. The future is likely to be better than you expect, as well as worse. The real victory of Christians arises from attention to present duty. This carries them from strength to strength.

"Some are alarmed at the thought of death; they say, How shall I meet the agonies of dissolution? But when you are called to die, you will, if among God's children, receive dying consolation. Be satisfied if you have the strength to live to God, and God will support you when you come to die. Some fear persecution, lest at such a season, they should 'make shipwreck of faith and of a good conscience:' 'As thy day is, such shall thy strength be.'

"2. Consider to what it is we owe our success. If we are nearer our salvation than when we believed, let us not ascribe it to ourselves, to our own arm, but to the grace of God: 'Not I, but the grace of God with me,' enabling me to sustain, and to conquer. If we continue, it is, 'because we have obtained help of God:' we are 'kept by his mighty power unto salvation.' In all our sufferings, if Christians, we are perpetually indebted to divine succour.

"3. Let us habitually look up to God, in the exercise of faith and prayer. Instead of yielding ourselves to dejection, let us plead the promises, and flee to the Divine Word. He has been accustomed to sustain the faithful: and He is 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.' He is never weary: Look to him: 'They that wait on him shall mount up with eagles' wings; run, and not be weary; walk, and not faint.' Go to Him in prayer,—cling to His strength,—lay hold on His arm. You have a powerful Redeemer: 'be strong in the power of His might!' Draw down the succours of His grace, which will enable you to go on, 'from strength to strength,' until you appear before God in Zion."

The last service at Broadmead in which Mr Hall took any part, was the church meeting (when only the members of the church are assembled) on Wednesday the 9th of February. His closing prayer, on that occasion, is spoken of as most spiritual and elevated, exhibiting in its highest manifestation, the peculiar union of humility, benevolence and fervour, by which his devotional exercises had very long been characterized.

On the next evening, Thursday, the usual monthly sermon preparatory to the administration of the Lord's Supper, was to have been delivered; but Mr Hall's discharge of this duty was prevented, by a severe attack of the complaint in his chest, which came on just after he had retired to his study to prepare for that service. This was the commencement of the series of paroxysms which terminated in his dissolution.

"Early on the Sunday morning (I again quote one of the letters of my esteemed friend, Mr Addington) being requested to see him, I found him in a condition of extreme suffering and distress. The pain in his back had been uncommonly severe during the whole night, and compelled him to multiply, at very short intervals, the doses of his anodyne, until he had taken no less than 125 grains of solid opium, equal to more than 3,000 drops, or nearly four ounces of laudanum!! This was the only instance in which I had ever seen him at all overcome by the soporific quality of the medicine; and it was, even then, hard to determine whether the effect was owing so much to the quantity administered, as to the unusual circumstance of its not having proved, even for a short time, an effectual antagonist to the pain it was expected to relieve.

"Inured as he was to the endurance of pain, and unaccustomed to any strong expression of complaint, he was forced to confess that his present agony was unparalleled by any thing in his former experience. The opium having failed to assuage his pain, he was compelled to remain in the horizontal posture; but whilst in this situation, a violent attack in his chest took place, which, in its turn, rendered an upright position of the body no less indispensable. The struggle that ensued, between these opposing and alike urgent demands, became most appalling, and it was difficult to imagine that he could survive it; especially, as from the extreme prostration of vital energy, the remedy by which the latter of those affections had often been mitigated, viz. bleeding, could not be resorted to. Powerful stimulants, such as brandy, opium, ether, and ammonia, were the only resources; and, in about an hour from my arrival, we had the satisfaction of finding him greatly relieved and expressing his lively gratitude to God.

"The whole of his demeanour throughout this agonizing crisis, as well as during the remainder of the day, a day of much suffering, exhibited, in a striking degree, the efficacy of Christian faith and hope, in supporting and tranquillizing the mind of their possessor, in a season of extreme and torturing affliction. His language abounded with expressions at once of the deepest humility and of thankfulness to God for his 'unspeakable mercies,'—together with affectionate acknowledgements of the care and assiduities of his family and the friends around him."

[*] The youth to whom this letter was addressed went abroad soon after the decease of his father, and intelligence of his death has been received since these sheets were prepared for the press.

[†] The Rev. Thomas Grinfield, A. M., of Clifton, near Bristol.

From this time the paroxysms increased rapidly both in frequency and severity; and Mr Hall, in the intervals between their occurrence, was usually so weak and exhausted, as seldom to be able to converse with those around him. His expressions, however, insulated and broken as they often were, proved that he was able fully to exercise that trust in God which is the grand principle of religion, and that thus trusting in him, his soul was kept in peace. No murmuring, no language of irritability, escaped from his lips.

It is not my intention to dwell upon the melancholy detail of the ten days previous to his death. I will only record a few such expressions as serve to show that, acute as were his sufferings, God left him not without support.

Thus, when he first announced his apprehension that he should never again minister among his people, he immediately added, "But, I am in God's hands, and I rejoice that I am. I am God's creature, at his disposal, for life or death; and that is a great mercy."

Again, "I have not one anxious thought, either for life or death. What I dread most are dark days. But I have had none yet: and I hope I shall not have any."

Again, "I fear pain more than death. If I could die easily, I think I would rather go than stay; for I have seen enough of the world, and I have a humble hope."

On another occasion, a friend having said to him, "This God will be our God;" he replied, "Yes, he will,—he will be our guide even unto death."

On recovering from one of his severe paroxysms, he adverted to the affectionate attentions of his beloved wife and daughters, as well as his numerous comforts, and exclaimed —"What a mercy it is to have so many alleviations! I might have been deprived of all these comforts;—I might have been in poverty;—I might have been the most abject wretch on the face of the earth."

During one night, in which the attacks were a little mitigated in number and severity, he frequently expressed the most lively gratitude to God, as well as his simple, unshaken reliance on his Saviour; and repeated nearly the whole of Robinson's beautiful hymn.

> "Come, thou Fount of every blessing!
> Tune my heart to sing thy grace;
> Streams of mercy never ceasing,
> Call for songs of endless praise!" &c.

The same night, under one of the paroxysms, he said to the friend who was with him, "Why should a living man complain? a man for the punishment of his sins? I have not complained, have I, sir!—and I won't complain."

When Dr Prichard was invited to join Mr Chandler and Mr Addington in consultation, on his arrival Mr Hall arose and received him so much in his wonted, cordial, courteous manner, as, at the first moment, almost to check the apprehension of danger. On the evening of the same day he expatiated on the mercy of God in bringing him to close his life at Bristol.

His prevailing kindness was evinced throughout, in his solicitude for the comfort of those who sat up with him at night, or who remained in the house, to be called to his assistance, if necessary. He also exhorted the members of his family, and others occasionally present, to make religion the chief, the incessant concern; urging especially upon some of the young among his friends, the duty of openly professing their attachment to Christ and his cause.

When he was a little recovered from one of his severe paroxysms, "I asked him (says Mr Chandler) whether he felt much pain. He replied that his sufferings were great: 'but what (he added) are my sufferings to the sufferings of Christ? his sufferings were infinitely greater: his sufferings were complicated: God has been very merciful to me—very merciful: I am a poor creature—an unworthy creature; but God has been very kind—very merciful.' He then alluded to the character of the sufferings of crucifixion, remarking how intense and insufferable they must have been, and asked many minute questions on what I might suppose was the process by which crucifixion brought about death. He particularly inquired respecting the effect of pain—the nervous irritation—the thirst—the oppression of breathing—the disturbance of the circulation—and the hurried action of the heart, till the conversation gradually brought him to a consideration of his own distress; when he again reverted to the lightness of his sufferings when contrasted with those of Christ. He spoke of our Lord's 'enduring the contradiction of sinners against himself'—of the ingratitude and unkindness he received from those for whom he went about doing good—of the combination of the mental and corporeal agonies sustained on the cross—the length of time during which our Lord hung—the exhaustion occasioned, &c. He then remarked how differently he had been situated; that though he had endured as much or more than fell to the lot of most men, yet all had been in mercy. I here remarked to him, that with most persons the days of ease and comfort were far more numerous than those of pain and sorrow. He replied, 'But I have been a great sufferer in my time: it is, however, generally true: the dispensations of God have been merciful to me.' He then observed, that a contemplation of the sufferings of Christ was the best antidote against impatience under any troubles we might experience; and recommended me to reflect much on this subject when in pain or distress, or in expectation of death*.

"During the whole of this severe illness, he read much in Campbell's translation of the Gospels; and, at intervals, one of his daughters read to him, from this version, his favourite to the last. On the morning of the 21st, the day on which he died, he had it laid before him, as usual, and read it himself in his ordinary recumbent attitude.

Mrs Hall, in the course of this morning, remarking to him that he appeared better, and expressing her hopes that he would recover, he replied, "Ah! my dear, let us hope for the best, and prepare for the worst." He then stated his opinion that this day would be critical. When his medical attendants met in consultation, a little after noon, he seemed rather better; and Mr Chandler left him, between one and two, reclining on the sofa, leaning on his elbow with as much muscular energy as ever.

"Before leaving him (he remarks) I explained to him the plan of proceeding to be observed; on which he bowed, saying, that whatever we wished he would comply with, he would do whatever we desired; begging that he might not interfere with my duties to other patients, and adding that he thought he should be very comfortable till my return.

"In a very short time, and before I had reached home, I was summoned to behold the last agonizing scene of this great and extraordinary man. His difficulty of breathing had suddenly increased to a dreadful and final paroxysm. It seems this last paroxysm came on more gradually than was usual with those which preceded. Mr Hall finding his breathing becoming much worse, first rose more on his elbow, then raised his body, supporting himself with his hand, till the increasing agitation obliged him to rise completely on the sofa, and to place his feet in hot water—the usual means he resorted to for relief in every paroxysm. Mrs Hall, observing a fixation of his eyes, and an unusual expression on his countenance, and indeed in his whole manner, became alarmed by the sudden impression that he was dying; and exclaimed in great agitation, 'This can't be dying!' when he replied, 'It is death—it is death—death! Oh the sufferings of this body!' Mrs Hall then asking him, 'But are you comfortable in your mind?' he immediately answered, 'Very comfortable—very comfortable:' and exclaimed, 'Come, Lord Jesus —come.'——He then hesitated, as if incapable of bringing out the last word; and one of his daughters, involuntary as it were, anticipated him by saying, 'quickly!' on which her departing father gave her a look expressive of the most complacent delight.

"On entering his room I found him sitting on the sofa, surrounded by his lamenting family; with one foot in the hot water and the other spasmodically grasping the edge of the bath; his frame waving in violent, almost convulsive heavings, sufficiently indicative of the process of dissolution. I hastened, though despairingly, to administer such stimulants as might possibly avert the threatening termination of life; and as I sat by his side for this purpose he threw his arm over my shoulders for support, with a look of evident satisfaction that I was near him. He said to me, 'I am dying: death is come at last: all will now be useless.' As I pressed upon him draughts of stimulants, he intimated that he would take them if I wished; but he believed all was useless. On my asking him if he suffered much, he replied, 'dreadfully.' The rapidly increasing gasping soon overpowered his ability to swallow, or to speak, except in monosyllables, few in number, which I could not collect; but, whatever might be the degree of his suffering (and great it must have been), there was no failure of his mental vigour or composure. Indeed, so perfect was his consciousness, that in the midst of these last agonies he intimated to me very shortly before the close, with his accustomed courteousness, a fear lest he should fatigue me by his pressure; and when his family, one after another, gave way in despair, he followed them with sympathizing looks, as they were obliged to be conveyed from the room. This was his last voluntary movement; for immediately a general convulsion seized him, and he quickly expired."

* Chandler's Authentic Account, p. 23.

O! how inconceivably blest is the change, when, at the moment of utmost agony, the soul enters the regions of endless joy; passes from the land of the dying to the land of the living; from the society of saints to the blissful presence of the King of Saints, where knowledge, illumination, purity and love, flow for ever and ever from the Inexhaustible Fountain! Such is the ineffable reward which awaits all the faithful followers of the Lamb. "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory."

Nothing, I feel, would be more presumptuous than for me to attempt to portray fully the literary, intellectual, or religious character of my inestimable friend. I have known, and still know, many whom I greatly value, many whom I cordially love and admire, many from whom I have learnt much and might have learnt more, but from my incapacity to receive what they were ready to impart; but I have known none in whom so many elements of mental and moral greatness were so happily combined as in Mr Hall; none whose converse and whose diversified knowledge have so constantly interested, charmed and instructed me; none whose transcendent qualities excited so high and overawing a veneration, yet none whose humility and cordiality, exquisitely blending with genius and piety, inspired so unhesitating a confidence. His profound acquaintance with the mind and heart, and his corresponding faculty of tracing and separating the springs of human action, gave him an unusual influence with the present race as a sacred orator: while he seems to be one of the few men whose creative intellect, and whose singular ability in the development of religious truth, and the illustration and confirmation of many principles of universal and increasing interest, qualify them to operate with as extensive an influence in moulding the intellectual and moral character of succeeding generations.

His varied and extraordinary powers, thus diffusively applied to the most momentous subjects, will be seen from his "Works," which are now collected, that they may constitute his noblest monument, the most enduring tribute to his memory.

NOTE A.—(See page 14).

MISCELLANEOUS GLEANINGS FROM MR HALL'S CONVERSATIONAL REMARKS.

I am perfectly well aware that no memoranda can convey an adequate idea of the vivacity, originality and brilliancy, of Mr Hall's conversational powers. It was usually easy to remember the sentiments which he expressed, and sometimes the images, whether sportive or tasteful, by which he illustrated them; but the beautiful language in which his remarks in conversation were clothed, could seldom be recalled, except when he fully communicated his meaning in a very short, but happily turned phrase.

This note, therefore, while it may serve to record some of his sentiments and opinions on interesting topics, must be understood as giving a very faint notion of his manner of expressing himself, except in those cases where the language, at once brief, clear and characteristic, fixed itself indelibly upon the memory.

The connected series, first presented, has been kindly transmitted by the Rev. Robert Balmer, of Berwick-upon-Tweed, and is selected from his recollections of the substance of three or four conversations which he had with Mr Hall in the years 1819 and 1823.

In the course of some remarks on various theological writers of our own times, he said, "Dr Smith is the best Biblical critic with whom I am personally acquainted; and I should think him one of the most learned theologians now alive." On my asking, If he did not consider Archbishop Magee superior in ability, and equal in learning, to Dr Smith? he replied, with his usual decision, "Not nearly equal in learning, sir; I do not suppose that Archbishop Magee knows any thing about the German critics, with whom Dr Smith is intimately acquainted, and from whom, notwithstanding all their absurdity and impiety, much may unquestionably be learned. There is one thing," he added, "in Dr Smith's work, much to be lamented; and that is, the tone of excessive lenity maintained towards his opponents. In consequence of this, his reasonings will not produce an effect proportioned to their intrinsic force; and his readers are tempted to regard the opinions which he refutes with far less horror than they deserve. The proper tone in theological controversy is, I imagine, somewhere between Bishop Horsley's intolerable arrogance and asperity, and Dr Smith's unwarrantable softness and urbanity."

On informing him, that I had been perplexed with doubts as to the extent of the death of Christ, and expressing a wish to know his opinion, he replied, "There, sir, my sentiments give me the advantage of you; for on that point I entertain no doubts whatever: I believe firmly in 'general redemption;' I often preach it, and I consider the fact that 'Christ died for all men' as the only basis that can support the universal offer of the Gospel."—"But you admit the doctrine of election, which necessarily implies limitation. Do you not think that election and particular redemption are inseparably connected?"—"I believe firmly," he rejoined, "in election, but I do not think it involves particular redemption; I consider the sacrifice of Christ as a remedy, not only adapted, but intended for all, and as placing all in a salvable state; as removing all barriers to their salvation, except such as arise from their own perversity and depravity. But God foresaw or knew that none would accept the remedy, merely of themselves, and therefore, by what may be regarded as a separate arrangement, he resolved to glorify his mercy, by effectually applying salvation to a certain number of our race, through the agency of his Holy Spirit. I apprehend, then, that the limiting clause implied in election, refers not to the purchase but to the application of redemption." This representation seemed to me, at the time, to be encumbered with considerable difficulties; and I was not sure that I correctly apprehended it. Not choosing, however, to request Mr H. to repeat or elucidate his statements, I asked him if he could refer me to any book where I should find what he regarded as the Scripture doctrine on the subject, stated and illustrated. He referred me to a book to which Dr Smith, of Homerton, had, not many days before, referred me, in answer to a similar question; "Bellamy's True Religion Delineated."

In the course of our conversation respecting the extent of Christ's death, Mr Hall expatiated at considerable length on the number and variety of the Scripture expressions, in which it seems to be either explicitly asserted or necessarily implied, that it was intended not for the elect exclusively, but for mankind generally, such as, "the world," "all," "all men," "every man," &c. He made some striking remarks on the danger of twisting such expressions from their natural and obvious import, and on the absurdity of the interpretations put on them by some of the advocates of particular redemption. He mentioned, especially, the absurdity of explaining "the world," John iii. 16, to signify the elect world, as the text would then teach that some of the elect may not believe. He noticed farther, that the doctrine of general redemption was not only asserted expressly in many texts, but presupposed in others, such as "Destroy not with thy meat," &c. and "Denying the Lord that bought them;" and that it was incorporated with other parts of the Christian system, particularly with the universal offers and invitation of the Gospel.

On the question of church government, Mr H.'s sentiments seemed to me undecided and somewhat inconsistent; and by many they would have been regarded as latitudinarian. He expressed his doubts whether any one form or model was delineated in the New Testament, as obligatory in all ages and in all circumstances; and said, that he was much disposed to adopt the maxim, "Whatever is best administered is best." In another conversation, when mention was made of a church, which, along with its minister, had been guilty of a scandalous irregularity in a matter of discipline, I stated what would be done in such circumstances among Presbyterians, and put the question, Will the neighbouring churches and ministers not interfere? Mr H. intimated that they ought to remonstrate and advise; but that any claim to jurisdiction would, in his apprehension, be altogether unwarrantable; adding that the independence of churches appeared to him a principle expressly sanctioned by the word of God.

With regard to the question of "Terms of Communion," we had repeated conversations. On this subject he spoke with uncommon interest and animation; and seemed surprised at the arguments of those who were opposed to his views. I recollect, in particular, the effect produced on him, when I stated that I had heard Dr Lawson, of Selkirk, declare, that he would not admit a Roman Catholic, not even Fenelon or Pascal, to the table of the Lord: Mr H., who had been previously reclining on three chairs, instantly raised himself on his elbow, and spoke without intermission and with great rapidity for nearly a quarter of an hour; expatiating on the amazing absurdity and presumption of rejecting those whom Christ receives, and of refusing to hold communion on earth with those with whom we hope to associate in heaven. During all this time his manner was exceedingly vehement, his other arm was in continual motion, and his eyes, naturally most piercing, were lighted up with unusual brilliancy.

It was interesting and amusing to observe how Mr Hall's exquisite sensibility to literary beauty, intermingled with, and qualified the operation of his principles and leanings, both as a Christian and Dissenter. Of this, I recollect various instances; but shall give only one. While conversing respecting Archbishop Magee, his talents, sentiments, conduct, &c., I quoted, as a proof of his high church principles, a remark from a charge then newly published: it was to this effect: That the Roman Catholics have a church without a religion; the Dissenters have a religion without a church; but the establishment has both a church and a religion. Mr Hall had not heard the remark before, and was exceedingly struck with it. "That, sir," he exclaimed, smiling, "is a beautiful saying. I have not heard so fine an "observation for a long time. It is admirable, sir." You admire it, I presume, for its point, not for its truth. H. "I admire it, sir, for its plausibility and cleverness. It is false, and yet it seems to contain a mass of truth. It is an excellent stone for a churchman to pelt with."

After speaking of Antinomians, of whom it appeared there were then several in the neighbourhood of Leicester: "Pray, sir," said he, "have you got any Antinomians in Scotland?" None, I replied, who avow themselves such. There are individuals in the congregations who have what I consider a morbid aversion to practical preaching, and to a minute enforcement of duty; but almost all our people who know and care any thing about religion, will tell you that, although the believer is delivered from the law as a covenant of works, he is subject to it as a rule of life. "That," said Mr H. "is precisely what I expected. Your ministers and your people have too much information to be ensnared by such impieties. Antinomianism is a monster which can live only in darkness; bring light on it and it expires."

The following opinions were expressed by Mr H. respecting various writers in theology. I give them in the form of dialogue, inserting, of course, such questions and remarks of my own as led to his observations. Let it be remembered at the same time, that they are only fragments, as, in many instances, I do not now recollect more than a third or fourth part of what was said.

B. May I ask, sir, what writers you would most recommend to a young minister. H. "Why, sir, I feel very incompetent to give directions on that head; I can only say that I have learned far more from John Howe, than from any other author I ever read. There is an astonishing magnificence in his conceptions. He had not the same perception of the beautiful, as of the sublime; and hence his endless subdivisions." B. That was the fault of his age. H. "In part, sir; but he has more of it than many of the writers of that period, than Barrow, for example, who was somewhat earlier. There was, I think, an innate inaptitude in Howe's mind for discerning minute graces and proprieties, and hence his sentences are often long and cumbersome. Still he was unquestionably the greatest of the puritan divines."

After adverting to several of Howe's works, Mr H. said, in reference to his 'Blessedness of the Righteous:' "Perhaps, Baxter's 'Saint's Rest' is fitted to make a deeper impression on the majority of readers. Baxter enforces a particular idea with extraordinary clearness, force and earnestness. His appeals to the conscience are irresistible. Howe, again, is distinguished by calmness, self-possession, majesty and comprehensiveness; and for my own part, I decidedly prefer him to Baxter. I admire, exceedingly, his 'Living Temple,' his sermon on the 'Redeemer's Tears,' &c.: but, in my opinion, the best thing he ever wrote, is his defence of the sincerity of the Gospel offer. I refer to the treatise, called, the 'Reconcilableness of God's Prescience of the Sins of Men, with his Counsels, Exhortations, and whatever other means he used to prevent them.' This I regard as the most profound, the most philosophical, and the most valuable of all Howe's writings."

B. 'Do you think highly of Dr Owen?' H. "No, sir, by no means. "Have you read much of Owen, sir; do you admire him?" B. 'I have read his Preliminary Exercitations to his great work on the Hebrews; his exposition of particular verses here and there; his book on church government; and some of his smaller treatises. I do not greatly admire him, nor have I learned much from him.' H. "You astonish me, sir, by your patience. You have accomplished a Herculean undertaking in reading Owen's Preliminary Exercitations. To me he is intolerably heavy and prolix." B. 'I do think, sir, there are many valuable ideas in his writings; but as a reasoner, he seems to me singularly illogical; for he often takes for granted the thing to be proved,' H. "I quite concur with the latter part of your statement. As a reasoner, Dr Owen is most illogical, for he almost always takes for granted what he ought to prove; while he is always proving what he ought to take for granted; and after a long digression, he concludes very properly with, 'This is not our concernment,' and returns to enter on something still farther from the point."

I remarked that Jonathan Edwards' theory was opposed to our consciousness and our indestructible feelings; for whenever we blamed ourselves for having acted wrong, we had an irresistible belief, not only that we could have acted otherwise, if we had chosen, but that we could have willed otherwise. To all this, Mr H. readily assented, adding some remarks respecting two of Edwards' distinctions: the distinction between liberty to will, and liberty to act according to our own will; and that between natural and moral necessity. Respecting the one of these, (I do not precisely remember which), Mr H. made the following ludicrous but characteristic observations.

"That distinction, sir, lies at the basis of Edwards' theory; but it is not original. It is to be found in the works of Dr Owen: I think it certain that Edwards found it there, buried, like the rest of Owen's ideas, amid a heap of rubbish: and finding it there, he did what Owen had not strength of arm to do, took a firm grasp of it, and dragged it into light. It proved a monster, and ought to have been smothered; but Edwards found it would be useful to frighten the enemies of divine sovereignity and free grace, and, therefore, instead of smothering it, he nursed it."

Mr Hall made some inquiry respecting Dr Henry, the historian, once a minister in Berwick, and afterwards colleague of Dr Macnight, the commentator, in one of the churches in Edinburgh: I informed him, that from all I have ever heard, I believed Dr Henry must have been a very dry and uninteresting preacher This led to a reference to the well-known anecdote relative to these two individuals; according to which, the one when coming to church on a Sabbath morning, having got his clothes wet by a heavy rain, asked his colleague to officiate for him. "Go into the pulpit," said the other, "and you will be dry enough." Some doubt being expressed which of the two it was, to whom this remark was made, Mr Hall observed; "I suppose, sir, it was applicable to both." Immediately checking himself, he added, "And yet, I should think, that to an intellectual audience, an audience that had any relish for Scripture exposition, Macnight must have been interesting, if the discourses which he preached resembled his published writings." 'Pray, sir,' I said, 'do you admire Macnight as a commentator?' "Yes, sir," he replied, "I do, very much; I think it would be exceedingly difficult, indeed, to come after him in expounding the apostolic epistles. I admit, at the same time, that he has grievous deficiencies: there is a lamentable want of spirituality and elevation about him. He never sets his foot on the other world if he can get a hole to step into in this; and he never gives a passage a meaning which would render it applicable and useful in all ages, if he can find in it any local or temporary allusion. He makes fearful havoc, sir, of the text on which you preached to-day. His exposition of it is inimitably absurd." The text referred to was Ephesians i. 8. "Wherein he hath abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence;" and the "wisdom and prudence" are explained by Macnight, not of the wisdom of God, as displayed in the scheme of redemption, but of the wisdom and prudence granted to the apostles to enable them to discharge their office.

Mr Hall repeatedly referred to Dr ——, and always in high admiration of his general character. The following are some remarks, respecting that extraordinary individual. "Pray, sir, did you ever know any man who had that singular faculty of repetition possessed by Dr —? Why, sir, he often reiterates the same thing ten or twelve times, in the course of a few pages. Even Burke himself had not so much of that peculiarity. His mind resembles that optical instrument lately invented; what do you call it!" B. 'You mean, I presume, the kaleidoscope.' H. "Yes, sir, it is just as if thrown into a kaleidoscope. Every turn presents the object in a new and beautiful form; but the object presented is still the same. Have you not been struck, sir, with the degree in which Dr —— possesses this faculty!" 'Do you not think, sir,' I replied, 'that he has either far too much of this faculty, or that he indulges it to a faulty excess!' H. "Yes, sir, certainly; his mind seems to move on hinges, not on wheels. There is incessant motion, but no progress. When he was at Leicester, he preached a most admirable sermon, on the necessity of immediate repentance; but there were only two ideas in it, and on these his mind revolved as on a pivot."

On metaphysics and moral philosophy, we talked at great length; but I cannot now give a tolerable specimen of his acute and eloquent remarks. One of his observations, however, I do remember, which struck me at the time, as exceedingly just and happy. Much had been said respecting the utility or inutility of metaphysical studies, and respecting the fact that they as yet had led to no useful discoveries. I made some such remark as this, that admitting such studies did not terminate in profitable discoveries, still they were advantageous as a field for cultivating and invigorating the mental powers. Mr H. said, "An arena, not a field. Metaphysics yield no fruit. They are not a field, they are only an arena, to which a man who has got nothing to do, may go down sometimes, and try his skill in intellectual gladiatorship. This, at present, is their chief recommendation."

Of the literary characters respecting whom we conversed, there was none whom he praised so highly as his friend sir James Mackintosh, and the following fragments will convey some idea of Mr Hall's estimate of that distinguished and lamented person. "I know no man," he said repeatedly and emphatically, "equal to Sir James in talents. The powers of his mind are admirably balanced. He is defective only in imagination." At this last statement, I expressed my surprise, remarking that I never could have suspected that the author of the eloquent oration for Peltier was deficient in fancy. "Well, sir," said Mr H. "I don't wonder at your remark. The truth is, he has imagination, too; but, with him, imagination is an acquisition rather than a faculty. He has, however, plenty of embellishment at command; for his memory retains every thing. His mind is a spacious repository, hung round with beautiful images, and when he wants one he has nothing to do but reach up his hand to a peg, and take it down. But his images were not manufactured in his mind; they were imported." B. 'If he be so defective in imagination, he must be incompetent to describe scenes and delineate characters vividly and graphically; and I should apprehend, therefore, he will not succeed in writing history.' H. "Sir, I do not expect him to produce an eloquent or interesting history. He has, I fear, mistaken his province. His genius is best adapted for metaphysical speculation; but, had he chosen moral philosophy, he would probably have surpassed every living writer." B. 'I admired exceedingly some of his philosophical papers in the Edinburgh Review, his articles, for instance, on Madame de Stael's Germany, and on Dugald Stewart's Preliminary Dissertation; but there seemed to me a heaviness about them, and I do think that Mr Jeffrey could expound a metaphysical theory with more vivacity and effect.' H. "With more vivacity, perhaps, but not with equal judgment or acuteness. He would not go so deep, sir; I am persuaded that if Sir James Mackintosh had enjoyed leasure, and had exerted himself, he would have completely outdone Jeffrey and Stewart, and all the metaphysical writers of our times."

Of Dugald Stewart Mr H. spoke slightingly; and it seemed to me that he was somewhat prejudiced against that amiable and accomplished philosopher, in consequence of unfavourable reports which had reached him respecting Mr Stewart's religious sentiments. "He is," said Mr H. "a pleasing, but a feeble writer. I would never compare him with any of our great metaphysicians; with Malebranche, or Locke, or Berkeley, or even with Tucker. Read had a more vigorous and original mind than Stewart; and Campbell, I suspect, was superior to both. If Campbell had devoted his attention to mental philosophy, he could have done all that Read or Sewart has accomplished; but neither of them could have written the 'Preliminary Dissertations' to his work on the Gospels. There is also too much egotism and parade about Dugald Stewart. He is always polishing away at the corner of a subject; but he could not rear a system of his own."

This comparison Mr Hall followed out at considerable length, and in language exceedingly beautiful and magnificent; which, however, I cannot now recall. With regard to Stewart's style, Mr H. observed, "That it was unquestionably one of the finest philosophical styles that ever was written; that Mr S. had carried embellishment farther into the region of metaphysics than any author that had preceded him; and that his embellishment was invariably consistent with perfect sobriety of taste."

Of Dr Thomas Brown, Mr Hall observed, "That he was a man of more genius, but less judgment, than his predecessor; that his style, with all its beauties, was far inferior to Stewart's, as a vehicle for philosophical speculation; that it was deficient in clearness and precision; and so exceedingly diffuse, that all that was valuable in the four volumes of his lectures might be condensed into one." I remarked that Dr Brown was often the victim of his own ingenuity; that, in point of candour, he was immeasurably inferior to Stewart; that the former would never agree with any writer, if he could possibly differ from him, and that the latter would never differ from any one, if he could possibly agree with him. Mr H. acquiesced in substance in these remarks, and proceeded to comment on Dr B.'s amazing boldness and originality. He characterized briefly several of his lectures, stating that those which had most deeply interested him, and which he thought among the best, were the 'Lectures on Immateriality and the Immutability of the Soul.'

Mr H. mentioned that he had read a considerable portion of Kant's works. On my remarking that I knew nothing of that philosopher, except from Dr Thomas Brown's article upon him, in an early number of the Edinburgh Review, and from Madame de Stael's book on Germany; that I should suppose his writings to be utterly unintelligible and uninteresting; Mr H. replied, "It is certainly no great loss to be ignorant of Kant's works. His philosophy is a system of scepticism." In answer to his question, "whether I had read much of Madame de Stael's works," I informed him that I had read her "Remarks on Rousseau," one of her novels, and her book on Germany. H. "Did you read her book on Germany from beginning to end!" B. "I did." H. "I admire your patience more and more, sir." He added that he had looked into Madame de Stael's Germany; that on finding some philosopher, a well-known idealist, (I cannot at this moment recollect who it was), spoken of as an opponent of the ideal theory, he had thrown aside the book in disgust; supposing that very little could be learned from a writer so ill informed as to be capable of such a blunder. He seemed very reluctant to allow that many of her remarks were acute and ingenious; and when something was said about the flights of her fancy, he said, "that, for his part, he could not admire her flights, for to him she was generally invisible; not because she ascended to a great height above the earth, but because she invariably selected a foggy atmosphere."

To the preceding selections from Mr Balmer's communication, may be added a few of Mr Hall's Remarks, rapidly thrown off on various occasions, taken from the letters of different friends.

On the return of the Bourbons to France, in 1814, a gentleman called upon Mr Hall, in the expectation that he would express himself in terms of the utmost delight on account of that signal event. Mr Hall said, "I am sorry for it, sir. The cause of knowledge, science, freedoom and pure religion, on the Continent, will be thrown back half a century; the intrigues of the Jesuits will be revived; and Popery will be resumed in France with all its mummery, but with no power, except the power of persecution." This opinion was expressed about six weeks before the issuing of the Pope's bull for the revival of the order of the Jesuits in Europe, 7th August 1814.

A few years afterwards, Mr Hall, on an allusion being made to the battle of Waterloo, remarked, "I have scarcely thought of the unfulfilled prophecies, since that event. It overturned all the interpretations which had been previously advanced by those who had been thought sound theologians, and gave new energy to the Pope and the Jesuits, both of whom seemed rapidly coming to nothing, as the predictions seemed to teach. That battle, and its results, seemed to me to put back the clock of the world six degrees."

Notwithstanding his decided sentiments as a whig and a reformer, he manifested through life a reverence for ancient institutions, rank, and illustrious descent. He was present in Westminster Abbey at Handel's Commemoration, and saw the King (George III.) stand up in one part of the performance of the Messiah, shedding tears. Nothing, he said, had ever affected him more strongely. "It seemed like a great act of national assent to the fundamental truths of religion." He was most acurately acquainted with the descents and dependencies of our principal noble families.

More than once have I heard him, with affectionate respect, mention Dr Ryder, the present Bishop of Lichfield, whom he had known as a pious and useful parish clergyman in the neighbourhood of Leicester. "He has not been injured," said Mr H., "by promotion; he is the same man as a bishop, that he was as the laborious parish priest; to such a bishop, we may apply the apocalyptic title, 'an angel of the church.' We may say of him what St John says of Demetrius, that he 'has good report of all men, and of the truth itself.'"

Speaking of Mrs H. More's writings, (about twenty years ago), he eulogized them very highly. He thought that she and Mr Wilberforce had done more for the cause of Christianity, by writing, than any other persons living. Somebody mentioned a review of one of her books in the ———, written by Miss ——. "Miss ——, sir," said Mr Hall, "Miss —— think of reviewing Mrs More! Sir, it is like throwing soft peas against a rock."

On being asked if he had read the Life of Bishop Watson, then (in 1818) recently published, he replied that he had, and regretted it, as it had lowered his estimate of the bishop's character. Being asked, why? he expressed his reluctance to enlarge upon the subject; but added, "Poor man, I pity him! He married public virtue in his early days, but seemed for ever afterwards to be quarrelling with his wife."

He did not like Dr Gill as an author. When Mr Christmas Evans was in Bristol, he was talking to Mr Hall about the Welch language, which he said was very copious and expressive. 'How I wish, Mr Hall, that Dr Gill's works had been written in Welch.'—"I wish they had, sir; I wish they had, with all my heart, for then I should never have read them. They are a continent of mud, sir."

John Wesley having been mentioned, he said, "The most extraordinary thing about him was, that while he set all in motion, he was himself perfectly calm and phlegmatic: he was the quiescence of turbulence."

He spoke of Whitfield as presenting a contrast in the mediocrity of his writings to the wonderful power of his preaching: of the latter there could be no doubt, however; but it was of a kind not to be represented in writing; "it is impossible to paint eloquence."

Speaking of Mr ——'s composition: "Yes, it is very eloquent, but equally cold; it is the beauty of frost."

"Poor Mr —— [a nervously modest man], seems to beg pardon of all flesh for being in this world."

Some one observing to Mr Hall that his animation increased with his years, — "Indeed: then I am like touch-wood; the more decayed, the easier fired."

Lord Byron was mentioned.—"I tried to read Childe Harold, but could not get on, and gave it up."—'Have you read the fourth canto, sir, which is by far the best!'—"Oh no, sir, I shall never think of trying."—'But, sir, independently of the mere poetry, it must be interesting to contemplate such a remarkable mind as Lord Byron's.'—"It is well enough, sir, to have a general acquaintance with such a character; but I know not why we should take pleasure in minutely investigating deformity."

OBSERVATIONS

MR HALL'S CHARACTER AS A PREACHER.

BY JOHN FOSTER.

The biographical and literary illustrations of Mr Hall's character and performances, expected from the highly qualified Editor of his works, and from the eminent person who has engaged for a part of that tribute to his memory, may render any formal attempt in addition liable to be regarded as both superfluous and intrusive; the public, besides, have been extensively and very long in possession of their own means of forming that judgment which has pronounced him the first preacher of the age: and again, so soon after the removal of such a man, while the sentiments of friendship and admiration are finding their natural expression in the language of unrestrained eulogy, it is hardly permitted to assume a judicial impartiality. From these considerations it has been with very great reluctance that I have consented, in compliance with the wishes of some of Mr Hall's friends, to attempt a short description of what he was in the special capacity of a preacher; a subject which must indeed be of chief account in any memorial of him; but may also admit of being taken in some degree separately from the general view of his life, character, and writings.

For more reasons than that it must be one cause, added to others, of an imperfect competence to describe him in that capacity, I have to regret the disadvantage of not having been, more than very occasionally, perhaps hardly ten times in all, a hearer of Mr Hall till within the last few years of his life. It appears to be the opinion of all those attendants on his late ministrations, who had also been his hearers in former times, (and from recollection of the few sermons which I heard many years since my own impression would be the same), that advancing age, together with the severe and almost continual pressure of pain, had produced a sensible effect on his preaching, perceptible in an abatement of the energy and splendour of his eloquence. He was less apt to be excited to that intense ardour of emotion and utterance which so often, animating to the extreme emphasis a train of sentiments impressive by their intrinsic force, had held dominion over every faculty of thought and feeling in a large assembly. It is not meant, however, that a considerable degree of this ancient fire did not frequently appear glowing and shining again. Within the course of a moderate number of sermons there would be one or more which brought back the preacher of the times long past, to the view of those who had heard him in those times.

I have reason to believe, that this representation of his diminished energy should be nearly limited to a very late period, the period when an increased, but reluctant, use of opiates became absolutely necessary, to enable him to endure the pain which he had suffered throughout his life, and when another obscure malady was gradually working towards a fatal termination. For at a time not more than seven or eight years since, I heard in close succession several sermons delivered in so ardent an excitement of sentiment and manner as I could not conceive it possible for himself, or any other orator to have surpassed. Even so lately as within the last four or five years of his life, the recurrence of something approaching to this was not so unfrequent as to leave any apprehension that it might not soon be displayed again.

There was some compensation for the abatement of this character of force and vehemence, supplied by a certain tone of kindness, a milder pathos, more sensibly expressive of benevolence towards his hearers, than the impetuous, the almost imperious energy, so often predominant when an undepressed vitality of the physical system was auxiliary to the utmost excitement of his mind.

There seems to be a perfect agreement of opinion that a considerable decline of the power or activity of his imagination was evident in the latter part of his life. The felicities of figure and allusion of all kinds, sometimes illustrative by close analogy, often gay and humorous, sometimes splendid, less abounded in his conversation. And in his public discourses there appeared to be a much rarer occurrence of those striking images in which a series of thoughts seemed to take fire in passing on, to end in a still more striking figure, with the effect of an explosion. So that, from persons who would occasionally go to hear him with much the same taste and notions as they would carry to a theatrical or mere oratorical exhibition, and caring little about religious truth and instruction, there might be heard complaints of disappointment, expressed in terms of more than hinted depreciation. They had hardly any other idea of eloquence, even that of the pulpit, than that it must be brilliant; and they certainly might happen to hear (at the late period in question) several of his sermons which had not more than a very moderate share of this attraction. But even such persons, if disposed to attend his preaching regularly for a few weeks, might have been sure to hear some sermons in which the solidity of thought was finely inspirited with the sparkling quality they were requiring.

But whatever reduction his imagination may have suffered from age, and the oppression of disease and pain, it is on all hands admitted that there was no decline in what he valued far more in both himself and others, and what all, except very young or defectively cultivated persons, and inferior poets, must regard as the highest of mental endowments—the intellectual power. His wonderful ability for comprehending and reasoning; his quickness of apprehension, his faculty for analyzing a subject to its elements, for seizing on the essential points, for going back to principles and forward to consequences, and for bringing out into an intelligible and sometimes very obvious form, what appeared obscure or perplexed, remained unaltered to the last. This noble intellect, thus seen with a diminished lustre of imagination, suggested the idea of a lofty eminence raising its form and summit clear and bare toward the sky, losing nothing of its imposing aspect by absence of the wreaths of tinctured clouds which may have invested it at another season.

It is to be observed, that imagination had always been a subordinate faculty in his mental constitution. It was never of that prolific power which threw so vast a profusion over the oratory of Jeremy Taylor or of Burke; or which could tempt him to revel, for the pure luxury of the indulgence, as they appear to have sometimes done, in the exuberance of imaginative genius.

As a preacher, none of those contemporaries who have not seen him in the pulpit, or of his readers in another age, will be able to conceive an adequate idea of Mr Hall. His personal appearance was in striking conformity to the structure and temper of his mind. A large-built, robust figure, was in perfect keeping with a countenance formed as if on purpose for the most declared manifestation of internal power, a power impregnable in its own strength, as in a fortress, and constantly, without an effort, in a state for action. That countenance was usually of a cool unmoved mien at the beginning of the public service; and sometimes, when he was not greatly excited by his subject, or was repressed by pain, would not acquire a great degree of temporary expression during the whole discourse. At other times it would kindle into an ardent aspect as he went on, and toward the conclusion become lighted up almost into a glare. But, for myself, I doubt whether I was not quite as much arrested by his appearance in the interval while a short part of the service, performed without his assistance, immediately before the sermon, allowed him to sit in silence. With his eyes closed, his features as still as in death, and his head sinking down almost on his chest, he presented an image of entire abstraction. For a moment, perhaps, he would seem to awake to a perception of the scene before him, but instantly relapse into the same state. It was interesting to imagine the strong internal agency, which it was certain it was then employed on the yet unknown subject about to be unfolded to the auditory.

His manner of public prayer, considered as an exercise of thought, was not exactly what would have been expected from a mind constituted like his. A manner so different in that exercise from its operation in all other employments could hardly have been unintentional; but on what principle it was preferred cannot be known or conjectured. It is to the intellectual consistence and order of his thoughts in public prayer that I am adverting, in uncertainty how far the opinion of others may have been the same: as to the devotional spirit, there could be but one impression. There was the greatest seriousness and simplicity, the plainest character of genuine piety, humble and prostrate before the Almighty. Both solemnity and good taste forbade indulgence in any thing showy or elaborately ingenious in such an employment. But there might have been, without an approach to any such impropriety, and as it always appeared to me, with great advantage, what I may venture to call a more thinking performance of the exercise; a series of ideas more reflectively conceived, and more connected and classed, if I may express it so, in their order. Many of the conceptions were not, individually, presented in that specific expression which conveys one certain thing to the apprehension; nor were there, generally speaking, those trains of petitionary thought, which would strongly fix, and for a while detain, the attention on each distinctly, in the succession of the subjects of devotional interest.

No one, I may presume, will be so mistaken as to imagine that pieces of discussion, formal developments of doctrine, nice casuistical distinctions, like sections of a theological essay, are meant in pleading that it must be of great advantage for engaging attention, exciting interest, and inducing reflection, that instead of a rapidly discursive succession of ideas, the leader of the devotions should often dwell awhile on one, and another important topic, and with a number of accumulated sentiments specifically appropriate to each; in order that its importance, thus exposed and aggravated, may constrain the auditory to reflect how deeply they are concerned in that one subject of petition. Any one pernicious thing deprecated—a spiritual evil, a vice of the heart or life, an easily besetting temptation, a perilous delusion into which men are liable to fall, or a temporal calamity,—and so, on the other hand, any one of the good gifts implored,—might thus be exposed in magnified and palpable importance before the minds of the people.

Will it be objected that this would tend to a practice not consistent either with the comprehensiveness of religion, or with the generality of scope requisite to adapt the prayer to the aggregate interests of a very mixed assemblage; that it would be to confine the attention to a few selected particulars of religion, losing the view of its wide compass; and to reduce the prayer which should be for all the people collectively regarded, to a set of adaptations to certain supposed individual cases, or small classes, singled out in the congregation, to the exclusion, in effect, of the general body? I may answer that, in perfect safety from shrinking into such speciality and exclusiveness, the great element of religion may be resolved into particular subjects and adaptations in public prayer. Particular parts of divine truth may come in view as suggesting matter of distinct and somewhat prolonged petition, conceived in terms that shall constantly and closely recognize the condition of the people. A man well exercised in religion, and well acquainted with the states and characters of men, might recount to himself a greater number of such topics than the longest book in the Bible comprises chapters; and would see that each of them might beneficially be somewhat amplified by thoughts naturally arising upon it; that one of them would be peculiarly appropriate to one portion of the assembly, another of them adapted to several conditions, and some of them commensurate with the interests of all. In one prayer of moderate length he might comprehend a number of these distinguishable topics, thus severally kept in view for a few moments; and varying them from time to time, he might bring the concerns which are the business of prayer, in parts, and with special effects, before the minds of the people, instead of giving the course of his thoughts every time to the guidance of entirely accidental and miscellaneous suggestion. I might ask, why should sermons be constructed to fix the attention of a mixed congregation on distinct parts of religion, instead of being, each in succession, vaguely discursive over the whole field? I would not say that the two exercises are under exactly the same law; but still, is there a propriety, that in a discourse for religious instruction some selected topics should stand forth in marked designation, to work one certain effect on the understanding or the feelings, and no propriety that any corresponding principle should be observed in those prayers which may be supposed to request, and with much more than a passing momentary interest, such things as that instruction would indicate as most important to be obtained?

But besides all this, there is no hazard in affirming, that prayers which do not detain the thoughts on any certain things in particular take very slight hold of the auditors. Things noted so transiently do not admit of a deliberate attention, and seem as if they did not claim it; the assembly are not made conscious how much they want what is petitioned for; and at the close would be at a loss to recollect any one part as having awaked a strong consciousness that that is what they have themselves in a special manner to pray for when alone.

Such observations are, under small limitation, applicable to Mr Hall's public prayer. The succession of sentences appeared almost casual, or in a connexion too slight to hold the hearer's mind distinctly, for a time, to a certain object. A very large proportion of the series consisted of texts of Scripture; and as many of these were figurative, often requiring, in order to apprehend their plain sense, an act of thought for which there was not time, the mind was led on with a very defective conception of the exact import of much of the phraseology. He did not avail himself of the portion of Scripture he had just read, as a guiding suggestion of subjects for the prayer; and very seldom made it bear any particular relation to what was to follow as the subject of the discourse.

One could wish that, with the exception of very peculiar cases, personalities, when they must be introduced, should be as brief as possible in public prayer; especially such as point to individuals who are present, and whose own feelings, one should think, would earnestly deprecate their being made conspicuous objects of the prolonged attention of the congregation. Mr Hall's consideration for individuals standing officially, or brought incidentally, in association with an assembly, often led him to a length and particularity in personal references, which one could not help regretting as an encroachment on the time and the more proper concerns of the exercise, and as a sanction lent by an example of such high authority to a practice which leads the thoughts quite away from the interests in common; tempting the auditors into an impertinence of imagination about the persons so placed in exhibition, their characters, domestic circumstances, and so forth; with possibly a silent criticism, not much in harmony with devotion, on some flaw of consistency between the terms which the speaker is now employing, and those which he may be heard, or may have been heard, to use in other times and places respecting the same individuals. In the laudatory tone and epithets into which he inevitably glides (for he never adverts to any faults of the persons thus prominently held in view, with prayer for their correction), it is hardly possible for him, while the matter is kept long under operation, to avoid changing its colour, from that of reverence towards God into that of compliment to a fellow mortal and fellow sinner.

If there was a defect of concentration, an indeterminateness in the direction of thought, in Mr Hall's public prayers, the reverse was conspicuous in his preaching. He surpassed perhaps all preachers of recent times in the capital excellence of having a definite purpose, a distinct assignable subject, in each sermon. Sometimes, indeed, as when intruders had robbed him of all his time for study, or when his spirits had been consumed by a prolonged excess of pain, he was reduced to take the license of discoursing with less definite scope, on the common subjects of religion. But he was never pleased with any scheme of a sermon in which he could not, at the outset, say exactly what it was he meant to do. He told his friends that he always felt "he could do nothing with" a text or subject till it resolved and shaped itself into a topic of which he could see the form and outline, and which he could take out both from the extensive system of religious truth, and, substantially, from its connexion with the more immediately related parts of that system; at the same time not failing to indicate that connexion by a few brief clear remarks to show the consistency and mutual corroboration of the portions thus taken apart for separate discussion. This method assured to him and his hearers the advantage of an ample variety. Some of them remember instances in which he preached, with but a short interval, two sermons on what would have appeared, to common apprehension, but one subject, a very limited section of doctrine or duty; yet the sermons went on quite different tracks of thought, presenting separate views of the subject, related to each other only by a general consistency. His survey of the extended field of religion was in the manner of a topographer, who fixes for a while on one separate district, and then on another, finding in each, though it were of very confined dimensions, many curious matters of research, and many interesting objects; while yet he shall possess the wide information which keeps the country at large so comprehensively within his view, that he can notice and illustrate, as he proceeds, all the characters of the relation of the parts to one another and to the whole.

The preacher uniformly began his sermons in a low voice, and with sentences of the utmost plainness both of thought and language. It was not, I believe, in observance of any precept of the rhetoricians, or with any conscious intention, that he did so; it was simply the manner in which his mind naturally set in for the consideration of an important subject. This perfect plainness of the introduction, quietly delivered in a voice deficient in tone and force, and difficult to be heard at first by a large part of the congregation, occasioned surprise and disappointment sometimes to strangers drawn by curiosity to hear "the celebrated orator," in the expectation, perhaps, of powerful sallies, flourishes, and fulminations. "Can this be he?" has been the question whispered between some two such expectants, seated together. A short comment on the facts in Scripture history found in connexion with the text, or which had been the occasion of the words; or on circumstances in the condition of the primitive church; or on some ancient or modern error relating to the subject to be proposed; would give, within the space of five or ten minutes, the condensed and perspicuous result of much reading and study. Sometimes he would go immediately to his subject, after a very few introductory sentences. And the attentive hearer was certain to apprehend what that subject was. It was stated precisely, yet in so simple a manner, as to preclude all appearance of elaborate definition.

The distribution was always perfectly inartificial, cast in order of the least formality of division that could mark an intelligible succession of parts, very seldom exceeding the number of three or four; which set forth the elements of the subject in the merest natural form, if I may express it so, of their subsistence. Generally, each of these parts was illustrated in two or three particulars, noted as first, second, and perhaps third. He never attempted, never thought of, those schemes of arrangement in which parts are ingeniously placed in antithesis, or in such other disposition as to reflect cross-lights on one another, producing surprise and curious expectation, with a passing glance of thought at the dexterity of the preacher who can work them in their contrasted positions to one ultimate effect. It is not denied that such ingenious and somewhat quaint devices of arrangement have had their advantage, in the hands of men who made them the vehicles of serious and important sentiment, really desirous not to amuse, but to attract and instruct. They catch attention, make the progress and stages of the discourse more sensible by the transitions between points apparently so abruptly asunder, and leave more durable traces in the memory than, it was often complained, could be preserved of Mr Hall's sermons. But such a mode was entirely foreign to the constitution and action of his mind. He never came on his subject by any thing like manœuvre; never approached it sideways; never sought to secure himself resources in particular parts, corners and adjuncts, against the effects of a failure in the main substance; never threw out the force of a subject in off-sets; never expended it in dispersed varieties. He had it in one full single view before him, the parts lying in natural contiguity as a whole; and advanced straight forward in pursuance of a plain leading principle; looking to the right and the left just so far as to preserve the due breadth of the illustration.

This is meant as a description generally applicable to the earlier and middle portions of the discourse, which were often, as regarded in a purely intellectual view, much the most valuable[*]. It was highly interesting, even as a mere affair of reason, independently of the religious object, to accompany this part of his progress; from the announcement of his subject (sometimes in the form of a general proposition founded on the text, oftener in a more free exposition), onward through a series of statements, illustrations and distinctions, till an important doctrine became unfolded to view, full in its explication, and strong in its evidence. In this progress he would take account of any objections which he deemed it of consequence to obviate, meeting them without evasion, with acuteness and exact knowledge, available to the point. Every mode and resource of argument was at his command; but he was singularly successful in that which is technically denominated reductio ad absurdum. Many a specious notion and cavil was convicted of being not only erroneous, but foolish.

He displayed, in a most eminent degree, the rare excellence of a perfect conception and expression of every thought, however rapid the succession. There were no half-formed ideas, no misty semblances of a meaning, no momentary lapses of intellect into an utterance at hazard, no sentences without a distinct object, and serving merely for the continuity of speaking; every sentiment had at once a palpable shape, and an appropriateness to the immediate purpose. If now and then, which was seldom, a word, or a part of a sentence, slightly failed to denote precisely the thing he intended, it was curious to observe how perfectly he was aware of it, and how he would instantly throw in an additional clause, which did signify it precisely. Another thing for curious observation was, that sometimes, in the middle of a sentence, or just as it came to an end, there would suddenly occur to him some required point of discrimination, some exception perhaps, or limitation, to the assertion he was in the act of making; or at another time, a circumstance of reinforcement extraneously suggested, a transient ray, as it were, from a foreign and distant object; and then he would, at the prompting of the moment, intimate the qualifying reference in a brief parenthesis in the sentence, or by a reverting glance at the end of it.—In these last lines of the description, I have in view the more closely intellectual parts of his public exercises, the parts employed in the ascertainment and elucidation of truth. There will be occasion, toward the close of these notices, to attribute some defect of discrimination and caution to other parts or qualities of his sermons.

It were superflous to say, that Mr Hall's powerful reasoning faculty, and his love and habit of reasoning, went into his preaching; but I may be allowed to observe, that the argumentative tenor thence prevailing through it, was of somewhat different modification from the reasoning process exhibited in the composition of some of the most distinguished sermon-writers. To say that he had much, very much, of the essence and effect of reasoning without its forms, will perhaps be considered as unqualified praise. Certainly we have a good riddance in the obsoleteness of the cumbrous and barbarous technicalities of logic, in use among schoolmen, and of which traces remain in the works of some of our old divines, especially of the polemic class. But, divested of every sort of technicality, a natural and easy logic (easy, I mean, for the hearers' or readers' apprehension) may pervade a discourse in such manner, that it shall evidently have more of the consistence of a contexture than of an accumulation. The train of thinking may preserve a link of connexion by the dependence of the following thought on the foregoing; that succeeding thought not only being just in itself, and pertinent to the matter in hand, but being so still more specially in virtue of resulting, by obvious deduction, or necessary continuation, from the preceding; thus at once giving and receiving force by the connexion. It is of great advantage for the strength of a discourse, when it is so conceived as to require the not unfrequent recurrence of the signs, "for," "because," "if—then," "consequently," "so that," and the other familiar logical marks of conjuction and dependence in the series of ideas.

[*] There was a remission of strict connexion of thought toward the conclusion, where he threw himself loose into a strain of declamation, always earnest, and often fervid. This was of great effect in securing a degree of favour with many, to whom so intellectual a preacher would not otherwise have been acceptable; it was this that reconciled persons of simple piety and little cultivated understanding. Many who might follow him with very imperfect apprehension and satisfaction through the preceding parts, could reckon on being warmly interested at the latter end. In that part his utterance acquired a remarkable change of intonation, expressive of his own excited feelings.

This will not be mistaken to mean any thing like a long uninterrupted process, as in a mathematical demonstration carried on in a rigorous strictness of method, and with a dependence of the validity of some one final result on the correctness of each and every movement in the long operation. No lengthened courses of deduction are required or admissible in popular instruction; the discourse must, at no distant intervals, come to pauses and changes, introducing matters of argument and illustration which are chosen by the preacher for their general pertinence and effectiveness to the subject, rather than by any strict logical rule of continuity; and he is not required to answer a captious question of a disciple of the schools whether this topic, and this again, be in the most exact line of sequence with the foregoing. It is sufficient that there be an obvious general relation, connecting the successive portions of the discourse; so that each in the succession shall take along with it the substantial effect of the preceding. But through the extent of each of these portions, the course of thinking might be conducted in a certain order of consecutive dependence, which should make the thoughts not merely to coincide, but to verify and authenticate one another while they coincide in bearing on the proposed object. And such a mode of working them into evidence and application, would give them a closer grapple on the mind.

There will be testimony to this from the experience of readers conversant with the best examples; for instance, the sermons of South, which, glaringly censurable as many of them are on very grave accounts, are admirable for this linked succession, this passing to a further idea by consequence from the preceding, and not merely by that principle of relation between them, that they both tend to the same effect. Yet, at the same time, so far is he from exhibiting a cold dry argument, like Clarke in his sermons, that his ratiocination is abundantly charged with what may be called the matter of passion; often indeed malicious and fierce, sometimes solemnly impressive; at all events serving to show, that strong argument may be worked in fire as well as in frost. It has always appeared to me, that Mr Hall's discourses would have had one more ingredient of excellence, if the rich and strong production of thought, while pressing, as it always did, with an united impulse toward the point in view, had been drawn out in a sequence of more express and palpable dependence and concatenation. The conjunction of the ideas would sometimes appear to be rather that of contiguity than of implication. The successive sentences would come like separate independent dictates of intellect, the absence of which would indeed have been a loss to the general force, but not a breach of connexion. It must be observed, however, that when special occasions required it, he would bring into exercise the most severe logic in the most explicit form. Many fine examples of this are found in his controversy on Terms of Communion. And such would, at times, occur in his sermons.

Every cultivated hearer must have been struck with admiration of the preacher's mastery of language, a refractory servant to many who have made no small efforts to command it. I know not whether he sometimes painfully felt its deficiency and untowardness for his purpose; but it seemed to answer all his requirements, whether for cutting nice discriminations, or presenting abstractness in a tangible form, or investing grand subjects with splendour, or imparting a pathetic tone to expostulation, or inflaming the force of invective, or treating common topics without the insipidity of common-place diction. His language in the pulpit was hardly ever colloquial, but neither was it of an artificial cast. It was generally as little bookish as might consist with an uniformly sustained and serious style. Now and then there would be a scholastic term, beyond the popular understanding, so familiar to himself, from his study of philosophers and old divines, as to be the first word occurring to him in his rapid delivery. Some conventional phrases which he was in the habit of using, (for instance, "to usher in," "to give birth to," &c.) might better have been exchanged for plain unfigurative verbs. His language in preaching, as in conversation, was in one considerable point better than in his well-known and elaborately composed sermons, in being more natural and flexible. When he set in reluctantly upon that operose employment, his style was apt to assume a certain processional stateliness of march, a rhetorical rounding of periods, a too frequent inversion of the natural order of the sentence, with a morbid dread of degrading it to end in a particle or other small-looking word; a structure in which I doubt whether the augmented appearance of strength and dignity be a compensation for the sacrifice of a natural, living, and variable freedom of composition. A remarkable difference will be perceived between the highly-wrought sermons long since published, and the short ones now printed, which were written without a thought of the press; a difference to the advantage of the latter in the grace of simplicity. Both in his conversation and his public speaking, there was often, besides and beyond the merit of clearness, precision, and brevity, a certain felicity of diction: something which, had it not been common in his discourse, would have appeared the special good luck of falling without care of selection on the aptest words, cast in elegant combination, and producing an effect of beauty even when there was nothing expressly ornamental.

From the pleasure there is in causing and feeling surprise by the exaggeration of what is extraordinary into something absolutely marvellous, persons of Mr Hall's acquaintance, especially in his earlier life, have taken great license of fiction in stories of his extemporaneous eloquence. It was not uncommon to have an admired sermon asserted to have been thrown off in an emergency on the strength of an hour's previous study. This matter has been set right in Dr Gregory's curious and interesting note (prefixed to Vol. I.) describing the preacher's usual manner of preparation; and showing that it was generally made with deliberate care*. But whatever proportion of the discourse was from premeditation, the hearer could not distinguish that from what was extemporaneous. There were no periods betraying, by a mechanical utterance, a mere recitation. Every sentence had so much the spirit and significance of present immediate thinking, as to prove a living dictate of the speaker's mind, whether it came in the way of recollection, or in the fresh production of the moment. And in most of his sermons, the more animated ones especially, a very large proportion of what he spoke must have been of this immediate origination; it was impossible that less than this should be the effect of the excited state of a mind so powerful in thinking, so extremely prompt in the use of that power, and in possession of such copious materials.

Some of his discourses were of a calm temperament nearly throughout; even these, however, never failing to end with a pressing enforcement of the subject. But in a considerable portion of them (a large one, it is said, during all but a late period of his life) he warmed into emotion before he had advanced through what might be called the discussion. The intellectual process, the explications, arguments, and exemplifications, would then be animated, without being confused, obscured, or too much dilated, by that more vital element which we denominate sentiment; while striking figures, at intervals, emitted a momentary brightness; so that the understanding, the passions, and the imagination of the hearers, were all at once brought under command, by a combination of the forces adapted to seize possession of each. The spirit of such discourses would grow into intense fervour, even before they approached the conclusion.

In the most admired of his sermons, and invariably in all his preaching, there was one excellence, of a moral kind, in which few eloquent preachers have ever equalled, and none ever did or will surpass him. It was so remarkable and obvious, that the reader (if having been also a hearer of Mr Hall) will have gone before me when I name—oblivion of self. The preacher appeared wholly absorbed in his subject, given up to its possession, as the single actuating principle and impulse of the mental achievement which he was as if unconsciously performing:—as if unconsciously; for it is impossible it could be literally so; yet his absorption was so evident, there was so clear an absence of every betraying sign of vanity, as to leave no doubt that reflection on himself, the tacit thought, 'It is I that am displaying this excellence of speech,' was the faintest action of his mind. His auditory were sure that it was as in relation to his subject, and not to himself, that he regarded the feelings with which they might hear him.

* Once, in a conversation with a few friends who had led him to talk of his preaching, and to answer, among other questions, one respecting this supposed and reported extemporaneous production of the most striking parts of his sermons in the early period of his ministry, he surprised us by saying, that most of them, so far from being extemporaneous, had been so deliberately prepared that the words were selected, and the construction and order of the sentences adjusted.

What a contrast to divers showy and admired orators, whom the reader will remember to have seen in the pulpit and elsewhere! For who has not witnessed, perhaps more times than a few, a pulpit exhibition, which unwittingly told that the speaker was to be himself as prominent, at the least, as his sacred theme? Who has not observed the glimmer of a self-complacent smile, partly reflected as it were, on his visage, from the plausive visages confronting him, and partly lighted from within, by the blandishment of a still warmer admirer? Who has not seen him swelling with a tone and air of conscious importance in some specially fine passage; prolonging it, holding it up, spreading out another and yet another scarlet fold, with at least a temporary stop to survey the assembly, as challenging their tributary looks of admiration, radiating on himself, or interchanged among sympathetic individuals in the congregation? Such a preacher might have done well to become a hearer for a while;—if indeed capable of receiving any corrective instruction from an example of his reverse; for there have been instances of preachers actually spoiling themselves still worse in consequence of hearing some of Mr Hall's eloquent effusions; assuming, beyond their previous sufficiency of such graces, a vociferous declamation, a forced look of force, and a tumour of verbiage, from unaccountable failure to perceive, or to make a right use of the perception, that his sometimes impetuous delivery, ardent aspect, and occasionally magnificent diction, were all purely spontaneous from the strong excitement of the subject.

Under that excitement, when it was the greatest, he did unconsciously acquire a corresponding elation of attitude and expression; would turn, though not with frequent change, toward the different parts of the assembly, and, as almost his only peculiarity of action, would make one step back from his position (which, however, was instantly resumed) at the last word of a climax; an action which inevitably suggested the idea of the recoil of heavy ordnance*. I mention so inconsiderable a circumstance, because I think it has somewhere lately been noticed with a hinted imputation of vanity. But to the feeling of his constant hearers, the cool and hypocritical equally with the rest, it was merely one of those effects which emotion always produces in the exterior in one mode or another, and was accidentally become associated with the rising of his excitement to its highest pitch, just at the sentence which decisively clenched an argument, or gave the last strongest emphasis to an enforcement. This action never occurred, but when there was a special emphasis in what he said.

Thus the entire possession and actuation of his mind by his subject, evident in every way, was especially so by two signs: First; that his delivery was simply and unconsciously governed by his mind. When it was particularly animated, or solemn, or pathetic, or indignant, it was such, not by rule, intention, or any thought of rhetorical fitness; but in involuntary accordance with the strain of the thought and feeling. In this sense, he "spake as he was moved: and consequently nothing in his manner of delivery was either out of the right place, or in it by studied adjustment†.

The other indication of being totally surrendered to the subject, and borne on by its impetus when the current became strong, was (in perfect contrast to what is described above) the rapid passing by and passing away, of any striking sentiment or splendid image. He never detained it in view by reduplications and amplifying phrases, as if he would not let it vanish so soon; as if he were enamoured of it, and wanted his hearers to be so for his sake; as if he wished to stand a while conspicuous by its lustre upon him. It glistened or flashed a moment and was gone.

The shining points were the more readily thus hastened away, as they intimately belonged to that which was passing. They occurred not as of arbitrary insertion, but with the appropriateness of a natural relation. However unexpectedly any brilliant idea might present itself, its impression was true and immediate to the purpose. Instead of arresting and diverting the attention to itself, as a thing standing out, to be separately admired for its own sake, it fell congenially into the train, and augmented without disturbing the effect. The fine passage would, indeed, in many instances, admit of being taken apart, and would in a detached state retain much of its beauty: but its greatest virtue was in animating the whole combination of sentiments. Mr Hall's imagination always acted in direct subservience to his intellectual design.

A seriousness of spirit and manner, was an invariable characteristic of his preaching, whatever were the topic, or occasion, or place, or preceding social intercourse, or temporary mood of his feelings. As his conversation often abounded with wit, in the strictest sense of the term, with the accompaniment of humour, both frequently playing into satire (in which he was not a little formidable), it has been justly wondered that nothing of this kind appeared in his sermons. I now wish I had ventured to ask him how this happened; whether it was that he had determined, on principle, to forbid himself all strokes and sparkles of that amusing faculty, as in every case detrimental to the effect of preaching; or that no witty turns or fancies did really ever occur to him during that exercise. However the case might be, all the repeaters of his witty vivacities and severities have forborne, as far as I ever heard, to report any one of them as a sentence of a sermon. No more than a single instance is within my own recollection of any thing devious on this side from his accustomed tenor; it was a most biting sarcasm at the hypocritical cant of those wealthy persons who pretend a concern for the promotion of the Christian cause, but, under the affectation of a pious trust in Providence for that promotion, take good care to hold fast all but some parsimonious driblets of their money.

The absorbing seizure of his faculties by his subject, when it was prosecuted at uninterrupted length, carried him sometimes, I suspected, into a peculiar and extraordinary state of mind for a public speaker. It appeared to me not unfrequently that his ideas pressed into his view so much in the character of living realities, that he lost all distinct sense of the presence of the congregation; so that he had for a while no more than a general and almost unconscious recognition of them as listening to him. His look at such times was that of a person so withdrawn to something within, that he is evidently taking no notice of what his eyes appear to fall upon. In confirmation that the case was so, I remember instances in which, being asked, after the service, whether he had not been grievously annoyed by an almost incessant and most thoughtlessly unrepressed coughing in many parts of the congregation, with other offensive and more voluntary noises, which had destroyed a third part at the least of his sentences for the hearing of a great proportion of the assembly, he said he had not been at all aware there was any such annoyance. It needs not to be observed, to those who have heard him, how necessary it was rendered by the defect of clear strong sound in his voice, when not forcibly exerted, that no other sounds should interfere.

At other times, however, he was in every sense present to his auditory, and spoke to them in pointed address; especially when a hortatory application at the end made them all feel that he was earnestly desirous to instruct, impress, and persuade. I may have occasion to advert again, with a somewhat different reference, to the circumstance of his mental abstraction.

It has been observed that he had the command of ample and various resources for illustration and proof. The departments from which he drew the least might be, the facts and philosophy of the material world. His studies had been directed with a strong and habitual preference to the regions of abstraction and metaphysics. And he furnished a fine example of the advantage which may be derived from such studies to the faculty for theological and moral discussions, by a mind at the same time too full of ardour, sentiment and piety, to be cooled and dried into an indifference to every thing but the most disembodied and attenuated speculation. The advantage, as exemplified by him, of the practice and discipline of dealing with truth in the abstract, where a severe attention is required to apprehend it as a real subsistence, to see and grasp it, if I may so speak, in tangible forms, might be noted as twofold. First, (that which has been anticipated in former remarks), the utmost precision in every thing he uttered. He could express each dictate of thought in perfect freedom from doubt whether it might not be equivocal; whether it might not be of loose import and vague direction, instead of strictly to the point; whether it might not involve some latent inconsistency within itself or in its immediate conjunction with another idea; whether it were exactly the very thing he intended. It was of complete formation in his understanding; it had its including line and limit, instead of being confused with something else. As it was once happily said by himself of Johnson, "he shone strongly on the angles of a thought." The consequence of his rigorous habits of thinking thus came with eminent value into discourse addressed and intelligible to ordinary good sense, where there was no obvious intervention of that refined speculation which was nevertheless contributing, in effect, so much to the clearness and strength of its consistence. What was of philosophic quality in its most immediate agency, became a popular excellence in its result.

* In sermons plainly and almost exclusively exegetical, or in which bodily disorder repressed his characteristic energy, he would often keep nearly one posture, looking straight forward, during the whole service. At all times, his gesture was clear of every trace of art and intention. Indeed he had scarcely any thing of what is meant by gesticulation or action in the schools of oratory. It was what he never thought of for himself, and he despised its artificial exhibition in others, at least in preachers.

† I remember, at the distance of many years, with what a vivid feeling of the ludicrous he related an anecdote of a preacher, long since deceased, of some account in his day and connexion. He would, in preaching, sometimes weep, or seem to weep, when the people wondered why, as not perceiving in what he was saying any cause for such emotion, in the exact places where it occurred. After his death. one of his hearers, happening to inspect some of his manuscript sermons, exclaimed, "I have found the explanation; we used to wonder at the good doctor's weeping with so little reason sometimes, as it seemed. In his sermons, there is written here and there in the margins, 'Cry here;' now I verily believe the Doctor sometimes mistook the place, and that was the cause of what appeared so unaccountable."

But secondly: besides the distinctness and precision of all the particulars of thought in detail, that exercise of abstract speculation had brought him into possession and mastery of those general principles, in virtue of which these particular sentiments must have their authority. It is not at all necessary in any ordinary course of instruction, to be continually tracing the particular back, for its verification, to the general; but it is a great advantage to be able to do so when it is necessary, as it sometimes will be. He could do this; he knew from what original truths could be deduced the varieties of sentiment which the speaker utters in unqualified assertion, as not liable to be questioned. Any of them, not self-evident, he could have abstracted into a proximate principle in a generalization, and that again resting on a still deeper or ultimate one. He had seen down to the basis, and therefore was confident of the firmness of what he stood upon; unlike a man who is treading on a surface which he perceives or suspects to be hollow, and is ignorant and fearful of what there may be underneath. Or, to change the figure, he could trace the minor outermost ramifications of truth downward into the larger stems; and those larger into the main trunk and the root. This conscious ability of the preacher, or any other discourser, to sustain upon first principles what he is advancing with the freedom of unhesitating assertion and assumption, will impart a habitual assurance of safety while he is expatiating thus in what may be called the outward, free, and popular exposition of his subject.

It is presumed that this representation of the use he made, in sermons, of his power and habits of abstract speculation, may suffice to prevent a notion, in the minds of any of our readers who may seldom or never have heard him, that he was in a specific sense a philosophical or metaphysical preacher. He did often indeed (and it was a distinguishing excellence equally of his talking, preaching and writing) point to some general principle, and briefly and plainly show how it authorized an opinion. Occasionally, in a more than usually argumentative discourse, he would draw out a more extended deduction. He would also cite from the doctrines of philosophy, with lucid application, some law of the human mind (for instance, and especially, that of association). But still it was far more a virtual than a formal result of his abstruser studies that pervaded his preaching.

His intimate acquaintance with many of the greatest authors, whom he had studied with a sentiment of reverence, and whose intellectual and religious wealth was largely drawn into his own capacious faculties, contributed to preclude an ostentation of originality. His sermons would make, on cultivated hearers, a general impression of something new, in the sense of being very different, by eminent superiority, from any common character of preaching; but the novelty would appear less to consist in absolute origination, than in the admirable power of selection and combination. It was not exhibited in a frequency of singularly bold prominent inventions, in the manner of the new mountains and islands sometimes suddenly thrown up on tracts of the globe; but rather in that whole construction of the performance by which the most appropriate topics, from whatever quarter, were brought into one array, were made imposing by aggregation, strong by unity of purpose, and often bright by felicitous apposition; in short, were so plastically ordered as to assume much of the character of a creation. It is probable that if his studies had been of slighter tenor, if his reading had been less, or more desultory, if his faculties had been suffered to run more loose, his discourses would have more abounded with ideas starting out, as it were singly, with an aspect like nothing ever seen before. His mental ground was cultivated too industriously and regularly for substantial produce, to leave room for those often beautiful wild-flowers, which spring spontaneously in a fertile half-wrought soil. His avowed indifference to poetry might be taken as one indication of a mind more adapted to converse with the substantialities of truth, than to raise phantoms of invention. Perhaps the most striking feature of his originality was seen in his talent (like the chemistry which brings a latent power into manifestation and action) of drawing from some admitted principle hitherto unthought-of inference, which affects the whole argument of a question, and leads to a conclusion either new or by a new road.

While he availed himself in his sermons of the powers and means of reason, he constantly referred, I believe with an increased explicitness in the more advanced periods of his ministry, to Revelation as the supreme and final authority. No preacher, or writer on subjects of divinity, was ever more faithful to the principle that all doctrines professing to be Christian, must, both in their statement and proof, be founded on the Scriptures, whatever further light or corroboration they may admit from independent reason, or from matter of fact. It is understood that it cost him, at an early season of his life, a great effort, with respect to some particular opinions, to subdue his speculative disposition to such an uncompromising submission to that authority, as to renounce not only the presumptions which place themselves in contravention to the Scriptures, but all the expedients of a forced or evasive interpretation of them. But the submission became absolute and perpetual. And in this spirit he maintained through life so assiduous a practice of studying the Bible, that he acquired a remarkable facility for citing from every part of it, in the course of his preaching, the passages most pertinent for evidence or enforcement of whatever he was advancing. It would often strike the hearers that probably no texts could have been found in the whole book more exactly to the purpose. Though he studied the Scriptures critically, he was sparing of learned criticism in the pulpit; never resorted to it but when he saw a question of some importance involved in a right or wrong construction or interpretation; and then with the greatest possible brevity. In some few of the instances he might seem to rest too much of the weight of an argument on the acceptation of a single insulated expression; for he was not, from his ability to bring a copious induction of texts in proof of a doctrine, the less tenacious of any and every one which he thought could be vindicated for an assertion or implication of it by a correct interpretation.

In his choice of subjects, a prevailing desire to do good directed him most frequently to those, or to select parts and views of those, that present themselves as of chief importance on the common field of Christianity. When he took what appeared an insulated subject, of a peculiar and somewhat curious cast, he would seldom fail, while illustrating it in a manner appropriate to itself, to bring it at last, and by an unforced incidence, to coalesce with or merge in some grand generality or cardinal doctrine of Christian faith. This method contributed to maintain a consistency in the doctrine and tendency of his diversified ministrations.

He insisted with the utmost emphasis on the principle that Christianity, instead of being merely a circumstantial modification, or clearer exposition, or augmented sanction, or supplemental adjunct of religion conceived as in its original subsistence in the relation between the Creator and a race not involved in moral evil, is an absolutely distinct and peculiar economy, appointed for a race that is in that disastrous condition, and constituted upon the essentially altered relation, the relation between man as a depraved guilty being and his Maker. In his judgment any theory which does not acknowledge Christianity in this express character, positively rejects it; with the guilt, to him who dares this rejection, of insulting the Almighty, and the calamity of being self-doomed to meet the righteous Judge on an interdicted ground, a fatal ground, therefore, where justice will be apart from mercy. From his conviction of the importance of this principle of the peculiarity of the Christian economy, he brought continually in view the doctrines which constitute its peculiarity. The scheme of mediation; the Mediator's character, in the various views and lights in which it can be displayed, of dignity and humiliation, of majesty and benignity; his vicarious sacrifice for the atonement of sin; were the subjects of his very marked and habitual preference. On the last of them he enlarged in such extent and frequency, that, with the same perfect conviction as himself of its vital and transcendant importance, I sometimes thought that there was hardly a due proportion yielded to the correlative subjects—to that extent and peremptoriness of the requirements of the divine law, that condition of the human nature, that actual existence and stupendous amount of guilt, which are the cause that there is a necessity for an atonement.

His practice, just noticed, of prosecuting the discussion of particular subjects, while in a manner strictly appropriate to each as a separate theme, yet also with a bearing toward an ultimate combination with some essential principle of Christianity, conduced to keep almost constantly in view the evangelical principles, those which are peculiarly characteristic of the mediatorial economy; for these were very commonly the points to which the various courses of thought running through his different sermons were made to tend, and where they fell in confluence.

His system of theological tenets (creed is an ill-favoured term) was strictly orthodox, on the model of what has come to be denominated Moderate Calvinism. With the other conspicuous points, the doctrine of the Trinity, the divinity of Christ, the atonement, and justification by faith alone, he held the more distinctively Calvinistic doctrine of predestination; though I cannot answer for the precise terms in which he would have stated it; but I presume he would have accepted those employed in the articles of the Church of England. In preaching he very rarely made any express reference to that doctrine; and his recognition of it by implication was too indistinct for toleration from the rigidly Calvinistic hearers of any preacher not privileged by talents and public favour to bear down all censorial pretensions.

Under our total ignorance of divine decrees, our ignorance of all but the general purpose of the Almighty in the promulgation of the gospel, he considered that men are to be addressed as rational beings, on subjects of which, unless they will practically renounce that property of their nature, they must apprehend the vast importance; subjects which, as well as appealing to their coolest reason, ought to be of mighty force to press on the conscience and the passions; to which it were, consequently, the last absurdity to decline summoning that reason, and arousing these passions. He was therefore exempt from all those restrictions, in respect to the mode of presenting and urging the overtures of redemption, which have been imposed on some good men of the Calvinistic faith by a concern for systematic consistency. He took the utmost liberty in his strain of inculcation; exhorting, inviting, entreating, expostulating, remonstrating; in language of nearly the same tenor as that which might be employed by an Arminian preacher; with the exception, of course, of that notion of free-will, which recurs with such laborious iteration in the preaching of that order, and which was excluded from his faith equally by theological and philosophical reasons. This non-advertence in his sermons to the Calvinistic tenet, was not from any secret consciousness that the belief of it is essentially incongruous with his free strain of inculcation; it was not that he might enjoy a license for inconsistency through the device of keeping one of two incompatible things out of sight; but he judged that neither the doctrine itself, nor the process of reasoning to prove the belief of it consistent with the most unrestricted language of exhortation, could be made a profitable part of popular instruction. He deemed it authority enough for his practice, independently of all abstracted reasoning on the subject, that he had the example of the divinely inspired preachers urging the demands of the gospel on the unbelievers and the wicked, in the most unmeasured terms of exhortation, the predestinating decrees of heaven set out of the question; and that in modern experience it is a notorious fact, that those preachers of the Calvinistic school (for one memorable example, Whitfield) who have nevertheless availed themselves of this freedom to the utmost extent, have been incomparably more successful in effecting the great object of preaching, than those who have somewhat presumptuously, charged themselves with so much responsibility respecting the unknown determination of the Almighty, that they must not call men to faith and repentance lest they should contravene his sovereign purposes.

Perhaps it would not have been expected from Mr Hall's great capacity, that he should be habitually indisposed to dwell or expatiate long near the borders of the remoter, darker tracts, of the regions of religious contemplation. Such, however, appears to have been the fact. If the cause were inquired, undoubtedly one thing that withheld or withdrew him was, a consideration of usefulness, a preference for what was most adapted to be beneficial to his own religious discipline and to the best interests of others. He was amply informed and warned, by his knowledge of the history of philosophy and theology, of the mischiefs of a restless, presumptuous, interminable speculation, a projection of thought, beyond the limits of ascertainable truth. But there was a cause more radical in his mental constitution. That constitution was not predominantly either imaginative or contemplative; it was intellectual, in the strictest sense; in the (perhaps arbitrary) sense, that the matter of his speculations must be what he could distinctly understand, what he could survey in such form and order as to admit of propositions and reasons; so that the speculative process lost its interest with him if carried into a direction, or if exceeding the limit, where it could no longer be subjected to the methods of proof; in other words, where it ceased to comprehend and reason, and turned into conjecture, sentiment and fancy. He seemed to have no ambition to stretch out his intellectual domain to an extent which he could not occupy and traverse, with some certainty of his movements and measurements. His sphere was very wide, expanded to one circle beyond another, at each of which in succession he left many other men behind him, arrested by their respective limits; but he was willing to perceive, and even desirous to verify, his own ultimate boundary; and when he came to the line where it was signified to him, "Thus far, and no further," he stopped, with apparently much less of an impulse than might have been expected in so strong a spirit, to seek an outlet, and attempt an irruption into the dubious territory beyond.

With a mind so constituted and governed, he was less given than many other men of genius have been to those visionary modes of thought; those musings exempt from all regulation; that impatience of aspiration to reach the vast and remote; that fascination of the mysterious, captivating by the very circumstance of eluding; that fearful adventuring on the dark, the unknown, the awful; "those thoughts that wander through eternity," which have often been at once the luxury and the pain of imaginative and highly endowed spirits, discontented with their assigned lot in this tenebrious world. No doubt, in his case, piety would have interfered to restrain such impatience of curiosity, or audacity of ambitious thinking, or indignant strife against the confines of our present allotment, as would have risen to a spirit of insubordination to the divine appointment. And possibly there were times when this interference was required; but still the structure of his faculties, and the manner of employing them to which it determined him, contributed much to exempt him from that passion to go beyond the mortal sphere which would irreligiously murmur at the limitation. His acquiescence did not seem at least to cost him a strong effort of repression.

This distinction of his intellectual character was obvious in his preaching. He was eminently successful on subjects of an elevated order, which he would expand and illustrate in a manner which sustained them to the high level of their dignity. This carried him near some point of the border of that awful darkness which encompasses, on all sides, our little glimmering field of knowledge; and then it might be seen how aware he was of his approach, how cautiously, or shall I say instinctively, he was held aloof, how sure not to abandon the ground of evidence, by a hazardous incursion of conjecture or imagination into the unknown. He would indicate how near, and in what direction, lay the shaded frontier; but dared not, did not seem even tempted, to invade its "majesty of darkness."

This procedure, in whatever proportion owing to his intellectual temperament or to the ascendancy of religion, will be pronounced wise for a general practice. If, however, he could have allowed himself in some degree of exception, it would have been gratifying to a portion of his hearers. There are certain mysterious phenomena in the moral economy of our world, which compel, and will not release, the attention of a thoughtful mind, especially if of a gloomy constitutional tendency. Wherever it turns, it still encounters their portentous aspect; often feels arrested and fixed by them as under some potent spell; making an effort, still renewed and still unavailing, to escape from the appalling presence of the vision. Now it was conceived, that a strenuous deliberate exertion of a power of thought like his, after he had been so deeply conversant with important and difficult speculations, might perhaps have contributed something to alleviate this oppression. Not, of course, that it should be dreamed that his, or any still stronger human intelligence, should be able to penetrate with light the black clouds which overshadow our system. But it was imagined possible for such force of reason to impart somewhat of an extenuating quality to the medium through which they are beheld, and through which they might then be beheld with a less painful and total prostration of spirit. It might have been an invaluable service, it was thought, if his whole strength and resources had been applied to display comprehensively the nature, the extent, the solidity of the ground on which faith may rest with a firm confidence in the goodness of the sovereign Governor, notwithstanding all the strange and awful phenomena of our economy[*].

This disinclination to adventure into the twilight of speculation was shown in respect to subjects of less formidable mystery, of solemn indeed, but rather attractive than overawing character. For instance, the mode, the condition, of that conscious existence after death, of which, as a fact, he was so zealous an assertor against the dreary dogma which consigns the soul to insensibility in the separate state; if indeed it be any existent state of an intelligence when all we know of its attributes is abolished. It would have been gratifying, and might have been beneficial for serious impression, to see some gleams of his vigorous thought thrown upon the border of that scene of our destiny, so obscure, but at the same time so near, and of transcendent interest; to see the reserved and scattered intimations of the sacred oracles brought into combination, and attempted to be reduced to something approaching to the form of a theory; to see how far any conjectural imaginations could be accompanied by reasons from analogy, and any other principle of probability; with a citation, perhaps, of certain of the least arbitrary and fanciful of the visions of other inquisitive speculators, commented on as he would have commented. But he did not appear to partake of the intense curiosity with which the inquiries and poetical musings of some pious men have been carried into the subject. He seemed, beyond what might have been expected in relation to a matter which lies across the whole breadth of our prospect, and so closely at hand, content to let it remain a terra incognita till the hour that puts an end to conjecture. It will be understood that this is mentioned, not with any meaning of animadversion, but as exemplifying that peculiarity of his mental character by which he appeared disinclined to pursue any inquiries beyond the point where substantial evidence fails. The regret of some of his hearers was, that he should not oftener be willing to exert his whole strength to try whether that point be really fixed where it appears and is assumed to be. They would have been gratified to see him undertaking sometimes the discussion of subjects, which they would have deprecated any attempt upon by men of ordinary ability. While so superior a mental engine, if I may be allowed the expression, was in their hands, they wished they could make the most of its powers.

I have deferred to the last, some additional observations, which I shall attempt with considerable difficulty; partly from a doubt whether I may be able to render them plainly intelligible; and partly from apprehension that they may not please some of those who most admired Mr Hall, of whose talents, however, no man's admiration was higher than mine.

The general purport of what I would say is this, that while his preaching was superlatively excellent in many of its qualities, it was not, from a defect in certain important ones, the best adapted for salutary efficacy. A short indication of what I would allege would be, that it was too general and theoretic; that it presented things too much in unbroken breadth and mass; that it was apt to exceed, in the most eloquent parts, the allowed license of exaggeration; that it was not kept in due relation to the realities of life; that while it was most excellent in the discrimination of topics, sentiments, arguments, it did not discriminate and individualize human characters; that therefore it did not maintain an intimate commerce with the actual condition of the hearers.

It were superfluous to repeat how pre-eminently he displayed, in the perspicuous and convincing statement, development and confirmation of truth, the primary excellence of preaching, as it is of all instruction; or how earnestly the practical interest of the doctrine was often enforced toward the conclusion of his sermons. The defect, which, nevertheless, I am wishing to mark as not excluded by such rare merit, was, that (as a general fact, and with exceptions) his preaching did not bring and keep the people under a closely disciplinary process. It allowed them too much of the privilege of the spectators of a fine and well ordered series of representation, of such a nature, that they can look on at ease from any similar disturbance to that of the king in Hamlet, at sight of the acted garden-scene.

A consideration of the whole design of preaching might suggest something approaching to a model of what would seem the most probably calculated to attain its several ends, in combination to one grand purpose. We may regard the preacher as holding a kind of comprehensive jurisdiction over the spiritual and moral condition of the congregation, who are a mingled assemblage of all varieties of that condition. Should not, then, the best mode of ministration, for beneficial effect, be that which applies itself to this condition, not only either generally in the mass, or as viewed in the two divisions of religious and irreligious, but also with a special recognition of those varieties?

I need not here say so self-evident a thing as that the generalities of religion should be often presented; that the Christian doctrines should be stated and illustrated; that, in a word, the theory of Christianity, as a whole, and in its principal branches, should be kept conspicuous in the people's view. But while justice is done to the subjects of general consideration in religion, what a large account there is of more particular matters, on which, and on each of which, it is most important to call men's reason and conscience into exercise. There are the various causes, distinguishable and assignable ones, which frustrate the exhibition of religious truth, and may be so commented on as to show how they frustrate it. There is the sad catalogue of the perversities and deceits of the heart; there are the distortions and presumptions of prejudice; the principles, which, in disguised form perhaps, and afraid of audacious avowal, but of malignant essence, react against the divine authority; the subterfuges of insincerity; the various ways in which men evade conviction, falsify in effect the truth to which they assent in terms, or delude themselves in their estimates of their own spirit and conduct. There is the estrangement from reflection, the extreme reluctance to honest self-examination. There is also in the majority of a large congregation, many of those who make a direct profession of personal religion not excepted, an indistinct apprehension, and a lax application, of the principles and rules of Christian morality. These last, together with the state of men's notions and habits in relation to them, are within the province of the religious instructor; unless the universally, cogently and even minutely preceptive character of revelation be a grand impertinence.

It is of the utmost importance that things like these should occupy a large space in the ministration. They claim to be made the subject of the preacher's best exertion, to show what they are, by illustration verified upon the actual state of human beings, and how they interfere with religion in all its doctrines and applications. There is not one of those here noted (and many more might be specified) that would not be, apart, a matter of the most useful discussion for the longest sermon. And if this be true, the majority of the evangelical teachers of our congregations seem very far from being aware (in respect especially to what belongs to the moral department of the great Christian school) of the extent of either the resources or the duties of their office.

But besides the propriety of discoursing on such things formally and at large, there is a valuable use to be made of them in a secondary and more incidental way, by adverting to them, any of them, as the case may require, in short and pointed reference, when any lesson of the religious discipline can by means of them be more strongly fastened on men's minds; on minds which will play loose from its hold if such expedients be not employed to strike and grasp them. Through whatever subject (except the most exclusively speculative) the Christian instructor can direct his course, considerations relating to such matters are, some or other of them, near at hand, to admonish him of something which, if he do not take account of it, will keep him off from obtaining possession of the inner man. And therefore it would be well that, instead of passing by these considerations unnoticed, and prosecuting with exclusive attention the pure

[*] It may be mentioned, in further explanation of the indisposition noted above, that in spite of the long and often severe persecution of bodily pain, his temperament was cheerful and buoyant He had a remarkable facility of finding or making sources and occasions of pleasurable feeling, and averting his mind from gloomy subjects; insomuch that he appeared to be, even on the mere strength of this temperament, much less subject than might have been expected of so enlarged a capacity of thought, to be invaded by the dark and fearful forms which those subjects can assume.

rationale of his subject, he should admit them to interfere with his progress, should implicate such of them as come most immediately on his track with the train of his observations; sometimes with a short interruption and suspension of that train, in order to take in and insist on an accessory consideration which may turn the subject with a more special pointedness on the hearers than would be done by its strictly regular prosecution. He might thus, without losing sight of the general objects of his discourse, give it a particularity, a pressure at critical points, a distinctness of arrest on the attention and conscience.

Now Mr Hall had, both by the cast of his mind and his addiction to prolonged speculative studies, an inaptitude to such a manner of preaching. His subject took the form of an intellectual theme, homogeneous, continuous, and nowhere allowing a diversion from its order, or a breaking up among its topics to turn any of them for a few moments to a peculiar and insulated use; or admitting the intervention of any thing which would bring the progress to a stand. The channel of his thoughts was so straight on, and the current so full and rapid, that there could be no refluxes and eddies. He entered on his subject with a clear prospect over it to the end; the interest, to himself, of his movement in prosecution of it, was in throwing his mind still forward on the next succeeding part, with a propulsion augmented by each as he passed through it; and he would have been impatient of any thing that should check or turn aside his career. He could not remit and draw in, to stay awhile, so to speak, with some one important observation, to give it individually an aggravated stress, to kindle it into an intense light, deliberately held close to the minds before him, penetrating to the recesses as a trial of the spirit, revealing unsuspected, or but slightly suspected, qualities in the feelings, the motives, the habits; and indicating unthought-of relations between these and the principles of Christianity, the rules of duty, or the conditions of safety. Still pressing vigorously onward, he could not make a pause to revert unexpectedly on what he had just said; and by an appeal to the hearers for its truth, or by a brief strong inference from it, render it more impressive than it could be as hastily passing away. He could not abate his movement so as to address them with a pointed interrogation, solemn or familiar, in a manner as if waiting for a reply; thus breaking in upon any tendency there might be to their yielding themselves to be carried along in a pleasing reverie of admiration and vague assent; drawing them into something like a mental dialogue with him on the point, and awaking them to reflect whether they should make, or were making, any application of it to themselves. That extraordinary degree of withdrawment from recognition of the local scene, when his mind was in its full race, which has been noticed before rather as a circumstance of manner than as affecting the character of his preaching, contributed much to what is here attempted to be described. He did feel, I repeat, a benevolent interest for the congregation, as a general sentiment, and at times it would manifest itself expressly and even pathetically; but I still deem it a fact, that during a large proportion of his public exercise, and especially in the seasons of highest excitement, the subject itself, as a subject, was the grand interest. It was by that that he was filled, possessed, and borne along, with no more than a very general consciousness of being in communication with an auditory. The train of his thoughts, therefore, swept on at a certain altitude, as it were, in the air, rather than proceeded on a level and in contact with the people, in a series of arresting inculcations and inquisitions.

I have said that he did not individualize human characters. While he had a deep insight into the structure of human nature as a species, his preaching would sometimes have suggested the remark that was made on a certain philosopher, that "he understood man but not men"—I say, his preaching; for a different apprehension was received from his conversation. He had been acquainted less or more with a very extensive variety of persons, including most of the differences seen in society; had a remarkably exact remembrance of them; and showed, by his characteristic descriptions and anecdotes, that he was not a superficial, though he was not a studiously intentional, observer. At all times he was interested by facts, witnessed or related, which exemplified a leading property, or a peculiar modification, of this strange nature of ours. It was therefore a cause of wonder, notwithstanding all that was so apparent of his habits of abstraction and generalization, that so many forms of the good and evil of humanity, accumulated within the ample magazine of his materials, should not be brought into service, divested, of course, of the peculiarities that would betray individual portraiture, and a little idealized into representatives of classes, but still of such genuine living features, that the people might recognize them as things in actual existence. Forms of character thus discriminately shaped from matter of fact, would stand forth exposing what human nature is, not merely as a general subject for religious and moral treatment, but also in those special modifications to which the discipline should be applied. It may then be applied with a peculiar, and, in the hands of an able man, a striking appropriateness; it will be seen to be fitted to the part; and there can be no question whether its force and probable efficacy will be much in proportion to this evidently specific pertinence. By this practice he who is desirous that truth may strike, stands much nearer to his mark, leaving less room for the shaft to pass harmlessly by in a slanting direction, than if he took a general aim from a distance. Let the blended mass of human character be thus resolved into classes, not so small certainly that the address, in order to be appropriate to each, must be frittered into minute and almost trifling particulars, yet so circumscribed that it may bear on each in one definite manner, and many persons will be made to find their own place, and find themselves brought to account, who would remain quite at their ease under a theoretic generality in the administration of the religious and moral jurisdiction; who might even approve and applaud the very lecture by which they were arraigned and condemned, in perfect impunity from any whisper of the admonition, "Thou art the man." It was to be regretted that the singularly compact conformation, and the speculative and abstract propensity, of Mr Hall's mind, should so much have precluded his great talents and excellent purpose from this resource for augmenting the efficacy of preaching. It might be anticipated from the nature of the case, and it was verified by observation, that too many of the attendants witnessed some of the brightest displays rather with the feeling of looking at a fine picture than of being confronted by a faithful mirror; and went away equally pleased with a preacher that was so admirable, and with themselves for having the intelligence and taste to admire him.

There was cause for observation on his manner of placing in contrast the two great divisions, the righteous and the wicked, Christians and men of the world. There should be some essential test of the difference; but then what to do with all those appearances among the professedly better class, which betray so much likeness, after all, to the worse! Nothing can be more perplexing to a thoughtful beholder of men as they are, who, in disregard of all system, must take these signs for what they plainly import; and what they plainly import is, that whatever be the essentially distinguishing principle of the separation, there are, in numbers, whom he may not in a judgment of charity pronounce to be no Christians, many grievous and habitual approximations to those who confessedly are none. At times, the whole subject will almost assume, under his view, the appearance of an affair of gradation, from the maximum on one side, and the minimum on the other, divided by no wide interval at the point of approach. If he be a public teacher of religion, and in that capacity under a solemn responsibility for the estimates to be entertained of the Christian character, and of themselves, by his hearers, he will have a severe exercise for his caution and discrimination. He may overlook, if he will, the unhappy mixture and competition of evil with the good in the better division of actual human characters; and indulge himself in the pleasure of constructing and setting up a golden image (not like that which, with a portion of gold, was composed for the greater part of baser materials, as low as clay) the radiant ideal of all the Christian graces and virtues assembled in harmony and perfection. But to what end? Is it that the people, when they recover themselves to consideration, may, with grief on the part of the pious and benevolent, and with malignant pleasure on the part of the profane, adjudge the greater proportion of those who have a general acceptance as religious persons, not to be truly such? Or is it, that persons sincerely intent on religion, actuated in some considerable degree by its spirit, but painfully conscious of a vast disparity to the pattern so splendidly exhibited, should therefore resign themselves to despondency! Or what else? What else?—unless, after looking up to this consummate pattern, the teacher, taking a descending track of thought, shall exert his best judgment to show, through several degrees cautiously followed downward, how the genuine principle may exist where there is much at variance with it; insisting, at each grade, on the manner in which it is essential for that principle to act, in proof that it is really there, notwithstanding the offensive things that keep their place with it; and solemnly protesting against the fatal propensity to find a ground of safety at the last and lowest point at which it may be hoped, that the principle may still be not absolutely incompatible with that with which it is inconsistent?

It appeared a serious defect in Mr Hall's preaching, that he practically took on him too little of this responsibility. In temporary oblivion of the rule that theoretic description should keep existing fact so much in view that a right adjustment may be made between them, he would expatiate in eloquent latitude on the Christian character, bright and "full-orbed" in all its perfections, of contempt of the world, victory over temptation, elevated devotion, assimilation to the divine image, zeal for the divine glory, triumphant faith, expansive charity, sanctity of life; without an intimation, at the time or afterwards, that all this, so sublime if it were realized, so obligatory as the attainment toward which a Christian should be, at whatever distance, aspiring, is yet unhappily to be subjected, in behalf of our poor nature, to a cautious discussion of modifications and degrees; especially when the anxious question comes to be, What deficiencies prove a man to be no Christian?

Now a hearer, left to some coolness of thought, was tempted to say to himself, What do the people think of this? —if indeed they do think, if they be not beguiled away from reflection. How does it strike the many persons in this large assembly, who, respectable perhaps as men of the world, make no pretension to what is meant by personal religion; and how those others who despise or hate it, and would hardly endure to hear any thing about it but for the sake of the eloquence which they think might have been more worthily employed[*]! Are they carrying out, in imagination, this brilliant picture into the real world, where they have observed and descried, with no little vigilance, the culpable tempers, habits and proceedings, the inconsistencies, weaknesses and errors, of many whom the preacher himself would be the last man to pronounce altogether destitute of piety! But if they do make this invidious use of the description, will they not with pernicious self-complacency assume—not exactly that all are alike, but—that none are Christians, or that super-emphatically they must be "few that be saved," if absolutely this alone be Christianity? Why let them go off with this mischievous advantage?

And how does it strike the persons here, who stand in the recognized accepted class of the religious! Have they, while hearing this elevated strain, any such thing as reflection on themselves? Is their conscience lulled by what might seem adapted in all reason to alarm it? Have they no secret monition—are the very serpents themselves that infest a corrupt and but imperfectly renovated nature, so charmed into stillness that there is no consciousness—of many things which this grand examplar shines but to expose and condemn! What! is there no internal voice to accuse them, any of them, of such things as a proneness to an excessive love of the world, as coldness of devotion, reluctance to duty, insubordination to the divine will, lapses into a besetting sin, the indulgence of evil tempers, selfish competition with fellow-mortals, frequent forgetfulness of hereafter? If there be not; if their admiration of the beautiful image of Christian excellence in the abstract carry them away from all consciousness of what is unlike it in themselves, it is quite time to come down to a strain that shall turn their thoughts homeward, and bring them into a consideration of what they are virtually doing in admiring such a model; shall excite them to reflect, if they so admire one and another feature of it, what they should think of this and the other circumstance in their actual condition. It would be well to bring them to the questions of, What is the difference? and, Why such a difference? and, What would be the right feeling under the self-conviction of such a difference? Let them not be suffered to regard this bright model merely as the ideal representation of something so unattainable on earth, that they are absolved from any serious consideration whether, and how, they have formed a judgment of what is attainable and must be attained; what they are really wishing to attain; what they think they have attained; why it is no more; what are the conscious evils yet unsubdued; what they deem the proportion of those evils to be to the better part; how they measure that proportion, and ascertain the predominance of the good; and whether they be disposed to content themselves with that state of the case.

But if, on the contrary, this bright exhibition of the Christian character, instead of playing harmlessly over them like an aurora borealis, has sent his rays deeply into their souls, and is bringing more plainly to their own view the evils working there, the sinful propensities, the spiritual disorders of whatever class, with the addition of the moral and practical ones resulting externally, in what manner are they adjusting that very serious contrast, so as to maintain a confidence that, nevertheless, on the whole the case is safe! No doubt it must be, by making very large allowances for the sad imperfection of our nature. But would it not be well for the Christian instructor to endeavour to take that somewhat hazardous process out of the hands of their self-love, by interfering himself in the adjudication of what may be conceded to a fallen nature, on such conditions as shall not essentially invalidate the demands of religion?

As the last observation I would take the liberty to make, I may note the same prevailing inadvertence to the realities of life in Mr Hall's manner of representing the happiness conferred by religion; premising, as a thing somewhat of a piece with this particular, that he would sometimes indulge in language hardly consonant to either theory or experience in what, undesignedly, it seemed to imply of the facility of entering, by a transition of spirit and action, on the Christian life. I will confess he did appear to me, in reference to this matter, to lose sight too much, when he surrendered himself to the animated current of his sentiments, of the desperate and obstinate alienation of the human soul from its Creator. It was not that he did not most fully believe this to be the condition of our nature, on the evidence of both Scripture and notorious fact; or that he did not hold, according to the strictest Calvinistic construction, the doctrine of the necessity of a special divine agency for men's conversion to a new spiritual state; but that, when his mind was kindled at the attractions and glories of religion, he would forget, for the time, both how lost are those attractions on a corrupt nature, and what a dreadful combination of influences there is to retain it in its aversion.

But to revert to the specified topic, the representation of the happiness of the Christian character. He would describe with a prolonged effusion of beautiful sentiment and language, the delightful confidence in the divine favour, the harmony and communion of the pious spirit with its God and Saviour, the independence on sublunary things, the superiority to the cares and distractions of life, the serenity of trust in Providence under the greatest trials or most menacing presages, the cordial invariable acquiescence in the divine dispensations, the victory over the fear of death, the unclouded prospect into eternity. Now it needs not to be said that such would be the felicities of a condition exalted to the absolute perfection of Christianity; or that the religious instructor should point to these elevations, as the eminence toward which it is the tendency of religion to draw the human spirit, and toward which a Christian is to aspire, however remote his utmost ascent may be from reaching it. He may do well to cite from the memorials of good men, some of the examples most remarkably approaching to a practical evidence, that such is the felicity which it is in the nature of religion to impart. And he will have at once to reprove those who, regarding such a privileged existence as something like a visionary scene suspended in the sky, rather than a state partially attainable by mortals, are resting with a dull acquiescence in the poverty of religious enjoyment; and to console and animate those whose earnest aspirations are repressed by the consciousness how little they attain. But if, in describing the happiness of a Christian, he take it at its highest degree, to which the experience of the most devout men has risen only at some favoured seasons (at least if they had much to do with the world's concerns), and spread out the representation in imagery all formed of the finest elements, omitting to advert to the actual state of good men, so beset and overrun with things which deny them to be so happy, it would be inevitable for the supposed cool-minded hearer to have his thoughts once more looking off to matters of fact. He would say to himself, "It may be taken as certain, that many among the sincere Christians in this assembly are in circumstances which must make them listen to this unqualified representation with pain or with incredulity. Some of them are harassed, without the possibility of escape, by the state of their worldly affairs; perhaps suffering or dreading disasters beyond the reach of prudence to prevent; anxiously awaiting a critical turn to events; vexed beyond the patience of Job by the untowardness, selfishness, or dishonesty encountered in their transactions. Some are enduring the cares and hardships of poverty. Some are distressed by bad dispositions among their nearest kindred; perhaps by anticipations, grievous in proportion to their piety, of the conduct and ultimate destiny of their children. Some may have come here for an hour who are fixed in the sad situation of witnessing the slow but certain progress of persons, whose life is on all accounts most important to them, in a descent toward the grave. Some are experiencing, while strenuously maintaining, a severe conflict between the good and evil in their own minds. Some may be in mortifying recollection of lapses into which they have been betrayed. Some are of melancholic temperament; and while striving to keep hold of their faith and hope, are apt to see whatever concerns their welfare in an unfavourable view in every direction, and especially in looking forward to death. Some, of contemplative disposition, are often oppressed, even to a degree of danger to their piety, by the gloom which involves the economy of the world, where moral evil has been predominant through all the course of time. In short, it is probable that the much larger proportion of the religious persons now present are in no condition to allow a possibility of their yielding themselves in sympathy with the spirit of this celebration of the happiness of religion. Would it not, then, be a more useful manner of illustrating this subject, to carry it into a trial on the actual circumstances of the Christian life; to place it, with appropriate discriminations, by the side of real situations of good men; to show that, notwithstanding all, religion can insure a preponderance of happiness; to demonstrate how it can do so; to point out the most efficacious means, in each case respectively, and urge their diligent use; to suggest consolations for deficient success, with a note of admonition respecting such of its causes as require that reproof be mixed with encouragement; all the while keeping in view that condition of our existence on earth, which renders it inevitable that the happiness created even by religion, for the men most faithfully devoted to it, should not be otherwise than greatly incomplete?"

[*] I recollect the instance of a gentleman expressing, at the conclusion of the public service, the highest admiration of the preacher, and adding, "What pity Mr Hall's great talents had not been destined to the bar or the House of Commons, where he would have made so capital a figure."

These observations have grown to a length beyond my intention or expectation; and I should have been better pleased if I could have felt assured, that a far less protracted criticism might suffice for an intelligible description of the nature and operation of certain things, in the character of Mr Hall's ministration, which I had presumed to think not adopted, in the proportion of its eminent intellectual superiority, to practical effect.

It is not to be exacted of the greatest talents that they have an equal aptitude to two widely different modes of operation. Nor is any invidious comparison to be made between the respective merits of excelling in the one and in the other. But, indeed, it were impossible to make any comparative estimate that should be invidious to Mr Hall, if the question were of intellect, considered purely as a general element of strength. To attain high excellence in the manner of preaching, which I have indicated as what might be more useful than his, though it require a clear-sighted faculty, disciplined in vigilant and various exercise, is within the competence of a mind of much more limited energy and reach than Mr Hall's power and range of speculative thought.

At the same time it is not to be denied, that such a mode of conducting the minstration, whatever were the talents employed, were they even of the highest order, would demand a much more laborious and complicated process than it cost our great preacher to produce his luminous expositions of Christian doctrine, with those eloquent, but too general, practical applications into which the discussion changed toward the close. Indeed, there is reason to believe that, besides the circumstances which I have noted as indisposing and partly unfitting him to adapt his preaching discriminatively to the states and characters of men as they are, another preventing cause was, a repugnance to the kind and degree of labour required in such an operation. For some passages found in his writings appear to prove that his conception of the most effective manner of preaching was very considerably different from his general practice. I repeat, his general practice; for it would be wrong to dismiss these comments without observing that he did, sometimes, discuss and illustrate a topic in a special and continued application to circumstances in the plain reality of men's condition. And when he did so it was with striking and valuable effect. I shall, for instance, never forget the admiration with which I heard a sermon, chiefly addressed to the young, from the text, "For every thing there is a time." Nothing could exceed the accuracy of delineation, and the felicitous management of language, with which he marked the circumstances, conjunctures and temptations of real life: the specific interests, duties, dangers, vices; the consequences in futurity of early wisdom or folly; and the inseparable relation of every temporal and moral interest to religion; with an inculcation of which, conceived in faithful appropriateness to the preceding topics, he closed in a strain of what merited to be irresistible pathos. Sermons of a tenor to class them with this, were heard at intervals, not so wide but that the number might be somewhat considerable within the space of two or three years. It should be observed, however, that their construction was still not wholly diverse from his general manner. The style of address was not marked by rises and falls; did not alternate between familiarity and magisterial dignity; was not modified by varying impulses into a strain which, as was said of Chatham's eloquence, was of every kind by turns. It was sustained, unintermitted, of unrelaxing gravity, in one order of language, and after a short progress from the commencement, constantly rapid in delivery. But still those sermons were cast in the best imaginable compromise between, on the one hand, the theoretic speculation and high-pitched rhetoric to which he was addicted, and, on the other, that recognition of what men actually are in situation and character, to which his mind did not so easily descend. They were the sermons which the serious and intelligent hearers regretted that people of every class, in many times the number of the actual congregation, should not have the benefit of hearing; and which it is now their deep and unavailing regret that he could not be induced to render a lasting, I might say a perennial, source of utility to the public.

I cannot be aware whether the opinions, or feelings less definite than opinions, of readers who have had the advantage of hearing Mr Hall, will coincide with the observations ventured in these latter pages. Those who have heard him but very occasionally, will be incompetent judges of their propriety. I remember that at a time very long since, when I had not heard more perhaps than three or four of his sermons, I did not apprehend the justness, or, indeed, very clearly the import, of a remark on that characteristic of his preaching which I have attempted to describe, when made to me by his warm friend, and most animated admirer, Dr Ryland; who said that Mr Hall's preaching had, with an excellence in some respects unrivalled, the fault of being too general; and he contrasted it with that of Mr Hall's father, who had erred, he thought, on the side of a too minute particularity.—But whether these strictures be admitted or questioned, I will confidently take credit with every candid reader, for having, as in the character of historian, and disclaiming the futile office of panegyrist, deliberately aimed at a faithful description of this memorable preacher, as he appeared during that latter period of his public ministrations, to which my opportunity of frequent attendance on them has unfortunately been confined.

I can hardly think it should be necessary to protest against such a misunderstanding of these latter pages as should take them to imply, that Mr Hall's preaching was not eminently useful, notwithstanding those qualities of it which tended to prevent its being so in full proportion to the mighty force of mind which it displayed. Its beneficial effects is testified by the experience of a multitude of persons, of various orders of character. Intelligent, cultivated, and inquiring young persons, some of them favourably inclined to religion, but repelled by the uncouth phraseology, and the meanness and trite commonplace illustration, in which they had unfortunately seen it presented; some of them under temptations to scepticism, and others to a rejection of some essential principle of Christianity, were attracted and arrested by a lucid and convincing exhibition of divine truth. Men of literature and talents, and men of the world who were not utterly abandoned to impiety and profligacy, beheld religion set forth with a vigour and a lustre, and with an earnest sincerity infinitely foreign to all mere professional display, which once more showed religion worthy to command, and fitted to elevate, the most powerful minds; which augmented the zeal of the faithful among those superior spirits, and sometimes constrained the others to say, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." Men of sectarian spirit were cheated of a portion of their bigotry, or forced into a consciousness that they ought to be ashamed of it. And, as a good of a more diffusive kind, numbers of people of the common order were held under a habitual impression of the importance of religion; and the enumeration would, I believe, be very considerable if it could be made, of individuals indebted to his ministry for those effectual convictions which have resulted in their devotement to God, and their happiness in life and death.

It is very possible, that those parts which I have so much dilated on, with the view of representing how a different manner might have been more useful, will, by some persons, be acknowledged to be correctly described as matter of fact, without agreeing with my opinion as to the degree in which they were defective for usefulness. But at all events, and whatever the just exception may be to an unqualified eulogy, it is exactly by those whose discernment the least permitted them to be undiscriminating in their admiration, that the deepest regret is felt for the departure of that great and enlightened spirit. The crude admiration which can make no distinctions, never renders justice to what is really great. The colossal form is seen through a mist, dilated perhaps, but obscured and undefined, instead of standing forth conspicuous in its massive solidity and determinate lineaments and dimensions. The less confused apprehension of the object verifies its magnitude while perceiving its clear line of circumscription. The persons who could see where Mr Hall's rare excellence had a limit short of the ideal perfection of a preacher, would, by the same judgment, form the justest and the highest estimate of the offerings which, in his person, reason and genius consecrated to religion—of the force of evidence with which he maintained its doctrines, of the solemn energy with which he urged its obligations, and of the sublimity with which he displayed its relations and prospects.

By those persons, the loss is reflected on with a sentiment peculiar to the event, never experienced before, nor to be expected in any future instance. The removal of any worthy minister, while in full possession and activity of his faculties, is a mournful occurrence ; but there is the consideration that many such remain, and that perhaps an equal may follow where the esteemed instructor is withdrawn. But the feeling in the present instance is of a loss altogether irreparable. The cultivated portion of the hearers have a sense of privation partaking of desolateness. An animating influence that pervaded, and enlarged, and raised their minds is extinct While ready to give due honour to all valuable preachers, and knowing that the lights of religious instruction will still shine with useful lustre, and new ones continually rise, they involuntarily and pensively turn to look at the last fading colours in the distance where the greater luminary has set.

THE REFORMED RELIGION IN FRANCE.

BY

THE REV. EDWARD SMEDLEY, M.A.

LATE FELLOW OF SIDNEY SUSSEX COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

CHAPTER I.

Causes of the early Progress of the Reformation in France—Influence of the Vaudois—Corruption of the Gallican Church—Indifference of the Public Authorities to Religious purity—Luther refers his Controversy with Eckius to the Judgment of the Sorbonne—Its Determination against him—Reformed Preaching in the Diocese of Meaux—Punishment of the Offenders—Cruel Martyrdom of Jean Le Clerc—Singular Theatrical Representation before Francis I.—Martyrdom of Louis Berquin—The German Protestants communicate the League of Smalcalde to Francis I.—Monkish Fraud at Orleans—Hopes of the French Reformed—The Year of Placards—Expiatory Procession—Fierce Edict and cruel Executions—Francis temporizes with the German Protestants—His Duplicity—Sketch of Calvin's History.

The Annals of an oppressed and struggling Church are far more likely to afford events of powerful interest than those of a dominant Hierarchy; for it is in seasons of distress and suffering, of privation, contumely and persecution, that the loftier passions of our nature are most strongly elicited. No portion of Christendom has undergone severer trials for the sake of Truth than Protestant France; and none, therefore, may reward our inquiries with a richer harvest of varied and attractive incident.

It is little necessary to ask what few gleams of faint and scattered light preluded, in that country, the glorious day-spring which burst upon all Europe at the commencement of the XVIth century. Some glimmerings, but scarcely of so great brightness as has occasionally been asserted, may have broken in upon the darkness of the plains below, through the passes of the Alpine valleys. But it must be remembered that the Vaudois, who dwelt apart in that secluded Goshen, were confined to the narrow limits of their own fastnesses; that they possessed little ability, and probably much less wish, of adding proselytes to a Faith which, if better known and more widely extended, might attract more frequent and more cruel persecutions than those from which they had occasionally suffered. The influence of those remote shepherds, therefore, could be but slight and local; and we may trace the causes of the early admission into France of the Reformed Doctrine and its rapid subsequent diffusion, to the deep sense with which great part of the nation was impressed, of the gross corruption of its existing Church, rather than to any previous acquaintance with a better Creed. The disease was acutely felt, and a remedy, therefore, when proffered, was eagerly accepted; not with a direct knowledge of its medicinal qualities, nor of the specific virtues of the salutary herbs from which it was extracted, but with a confident belief that God was the physician who administered the cup, and therefore that it must be mighty to save—Speak the word only, and thy servant shall be healed.

This feeling, however, was not general; nor did it exist, for the most part, among the powerful of the land. Louis XII. indeed, some time before the epoch at which our narrative will commence, had paid a distinguished tribute to the moral excellence of the Vaudois; when, having been stimulated to their extermination by the bigotry of Pius III., he wisely and generously first instituted an inquiry into the habits of the accused. The result of that investigation demonstrated the pureness and inoffensiveness of the mountaineers; and the King swore by all the saints that, notwithstanding their Heresy, they were far better men than either himself or any of his other subjects. The same Prince at one time also had been forward in expressing detestation of the tyranny of the Pontificate, and a fixed resolve that it should be overthrown; and Perdam Babylonis nomen was the legend of a golden coin which he struck at Naples, in the heat of his contest with Julius II. But they were Civil interests and secular rights alone which he regarded; and no doubts as to Religious Truth can be discovered in either of these transactions. The Vaudois might be guileless and virtuous after their fashion; but nevertheless they were Heretics: the Pope was a monster of temporal ambition, whom, as such, it was the policy of the Kings of the Earth to restrain; but the Babylon which Louis vowed to destroy was not the Spiritual Babylon, Babylon the great, the mother of harlots and abominations, drunken with the blood of the Saints and the blood of the Martyrs of Jesus. The Monarch of France was fully prepared to strip Rome of her fine linen, and purple and scarlet decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls, but he was not equally prepared to come out of her himself, and to invite his people also to come out of her, that they be not partakers of her sins, and that they receive not of her plagues.

It was in a similarly worldly spirit that the Parliament of France remonstrated so vigorously, not many years afterwards, when Francis I., soon after his accession, had consented to an abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction. That Treaty, into the obscure origin of which this is not the fitting place to inquire, had preserved to France, even from the XIIIth century, the free election of her own Prelates: and had thus averted from her the simoniacal collations of the Papacy, and the long train of abuses incident to foreign patronage. The young King, however, allured by the specious hope of establishment in Italy, through alliance with Leo X., rashly agreed to purchase his aid by the surrender of those most important privileges, Dec. 14, 1515. When the Concordat of Bologna, by which the new Spiritual relations with the Holy See were arranged, had been read in the Council of Lateran, avowed by Francis, and presented by him to his Parliament of Paris for registration, the proposal was met by an indignant remonstrance and appeal. Bitter, however, as is the language employed in that Memorial against the "damnable ambition" and the "detestable avarice" of the Romish See, the violence which it was ever insatiably offering against all human rights, its exactions, its usurpations, its pestiferous nominations of unfitting ministers to the destruction of souls, and its plague-spot of simony; not one syllable is addressed against its far more crying perversion of Scripture, its abandonment of the sincerity of the Gospel, and its apostacy from the true institution of Christ.

Again, when Tetzel, by dint of frontless assurance and false Latin, was replenishing the Treasury of the Vatican, and cheating simple-hearted sinners into a fancied barter of Salvation for gold, it was not against the flagitious doctrine of Indulgences in general that the Faculty of Paris lifted its cry (1518); but against a single proposition, which affected the balance of accounts, and the value received in this retail huckstery of souls. "Whoever," says an ancient Canon revived for the immediate purpose, "whoever drops a teston into the coffer for the Crusade, in behalf of a soul now in Purgatory, delivers that soul, so that it infallibly proceeds at that very moment to Paradise. Therefore, by paying ten testons for ten souls, or a thousand testons for a thousand souls, all those souls respectively, without doubt, pass directly to Paradise." This proposition said the assembled Doctors, is false, scandalous, rashly asserted, and to be rejected for peace of conscience sake. But mark the rule which they substituted in its stead. "It is not infallibly certain that all souls indifferently which are in Purgatory, upon the payment of ten sols sterling into the coffer for the Crusade, immediately, and without doubt, pass into Paradise. The question must be referred to God, who accepts according to pleasure, the treasure of the Church, applied to the aforesaid souls." This proposition we are assured, is true, consonant with the opinions of all Doctors of Law, both human and divine, and affording encouragement to the piety of the faithful. The object here, then, was to check the lavish contributions diverted into foreign channels by the fears of Purgatory and the hopes of Paradise; not by any means to deny the inexhaustible treasure of superabundant merits, of which the Pope asserted that he held the keys. These he was at liberty to enjoy, and even to sell in moderation; but he was not to establish a monoply, nor to exclude all other traders from the market. No one, it was thought, would grudge a penny for the redemption of his grandsire's soul from the pain of cleansing fires, provided that after the disbursement he was quite certain of receiving his pennyworth; and thus all the pence in France would in time find their way to Rome. But once raise a shadow of suspicion, a misgiving, however faint, a doubt, however slender, that the money is not quite safely invested; that there may be some flaw in the title of the estate purchased; that there is no absolute warranty, no downright pledge of assurance; but that after all it is an adventure, a lottery, a game of chance, and a speculation in which they are engaged; and those chapmen who before would have paid down on the nail, will look twice at their penny, consider the value of ready money, and perhaps walk away with it still in their pockets. It was in this manner, on questions affecting their power and their purses, and not on any others, that the spiritual and Lay Authorities of France, at the season of Luther's appearance, raised opposition to the extravagant pretensions of Rome.

Slight, however, as was the preparation which had been made for their growth and culture, two years had scarcely elapsed from the public avowal of his principles, before Luther submitted them to the solemn cognizance of the French Divines; and the result, as might be expected, was a peremptory and unequivocal condemnation. In the dispute which the Saxon Reformer maintained with the Romanist champion, Eckius, at Leipsic, the controversy consumed twenty days (July 1519); during which the points agitated concerned the Papal Supremacy, Purgatory and Indulgences, regarding which last question Eckius himself, we are told, was jocose. Hoffman, Rector of the University of Leipsic, who presided as Moderator, having declined to pass judgment between the disputants, a reference was mutually agreed upon to the Universities of Erfurt and of Paris. To this arrangement Luther willingly consented; induced, as it appears, by a declaration which the Sorbonne had published two years before, affirming Councils to be superior to the Pope; and perhaps tempted also by some rumours which had been conveyed to him, and which were perfectly true, that he was not destitute of admirers among the French Ecclesiastics. Great then must have been his surprise and disappointment, when, after a gestation of one-and-twenty-months (April 15, 1521), the Parisian Faculty was delivered of a fierce denunciation of his opinions. "Many impious men and liars," said the Divines, "arose during the youth of the Church, such as Hermogenes, Philetus, and Hymenæus: after them appeared Ebion, Marcius and Apelles; then Sabellius, Manichæus and Arius; and in its more advanced age, and nearer our own times, Waldo, Wiclif and John Huss. In the present days also, has sprung from that generation of vipers certain sons of evil, born of the handmaiden and illegitimate, yea, children, of the Devil; among whom one of the principal is Martin Luther, if we may trust that it is a real name which appears on the titles of many writings attributed to him. He, indeed, like Hiel, who laid again the foundations of Jericho, in spite of the curse of Joshua, has revived several ancient Heresies, and added others which are new. He also elevates his own judgment above that of all Universities; he despises the opinions of the holy Doctors of the Church; and, as the summit of impiety, he endeavours to weaken the decision of Councils: as if God, reserving truths necessary to Salvation for Luther alone, had concealed them hitherto from the Church! as if Christ had left his spouse even till these times in the darkness and blindness of error! What impious and shameless arrogance, not so much deserving to be refuted by argument as to be repressed by bonds, censures, fire and flames!" The Determination (as it is called) then enumerates the various Heretics whom Luther has followed in the several Works which pass under his name, for the doubt respecting their genuineness is gravely maintained throughout the Instrument. The last of these Works, De Captivitate Babylonica, is affirmed to rival the Koran in falsehood. "Whoever may be its author, he is assuredly a pernicious enemy of the Church of Christ, an execrable awakener of sleeping blasphemies, approving, commending and extolling in that single volume every insane monster of Heresy who has preceded him." In conclusion, the Sorbonne avows, that "having carefully examined, and fully discussed the whole mass of doctrine attributed to Luther, it declares and adjudges it to abound with detestable errors, pernicious both to Faith and Morals. All he has written is so couched as to seduce the unlearned and to injure the wise; it impiously derogates from the authority of the Church, and of the Priestly Order; it is avowedly schismatical, opposed to Holy Scripture, and blasphemous against the Holy Spirit. Therefore, as highly mischievous to the Christian commonwealth, it should be exterminated and openly committed to the flames, and the author should be compelled by every possible judicial means to a public abjuration."

The decree which we have thus abridged, was attacked by Melancthon, and not with his customary gentleness. In an Apology for Luther, he characterizes the judgment of the Sorbonne as abounding with the fury of women and the impotence of Monks; and he attributes its composition to some hired scribbler. That not all, however, of the Ecclesiastics in France assented to Luther's condemnation, was soon evident by some occurrences in the Diocese of Meaux. Briconnet, Bishop of that see was among the few exemplary Prelates of his day. Zealously alive to the Spiritual interests of his flock, he not only personally laboured among them without ceasing, but he invited also, as public teachers, many of the most devout and learned graduates of the neighbouring University of Paris. Several of these colonists of his Diocese were already deeply imbued with the New Learning; and the chief were Faber and Farel, who contributed by their preaching to scatter abroad the good seed recently vivified in their own bosoms. The Cordeliers whose profits and congregations were sensibly diminished by the settlers whom Briconnet had imported, vigilantly observed and harshly represented both the conduct and the teaching of those Ministers; and when the Bishop supported his Clergy with somewhat of incautious warmth, and represented the Friars to be cheats, hypocrites and Pharisees, the Friars in return, denounced the Ministers to the Parliament of Paris as Heretics, and the Bishop himself as their fosterer. The Parliament took serious cognizance of the complaint (1525); arrested such of the Ministers as had not seasonably withdrawn from the approaching storm, together with the most zealous of their followers, and cited the Bishop to a personal appearance. The orthodoxy of the latter was readily established; and he was dismissed, after a gentle admonition to observe greater discretion for the future, and the payment of a sum of money equivalent to the expense of prosecuting the less fortunate prisoners.

Clear proofs of their Heresy were adduced; most of them were scourged through the public thoroughfares of Paris, branded with a hot iron at Meaux, and afterwards banished.

The venerable Faber, then in his eighty-fifth year, sought an asylum with the King's sister, Margaret Queen of Navarre, ever a beneficent patroness of men of letters, and an early convert to the Sacramentarian doctrine.[*] He survived under her protection at Nerac till his hundredth year. Farel escaped to Geneva, where he afterwards became well known as the chief friend and colleague of Calvin. Jaques Povent, a disciple of Faber, having relapsed after abjuration, was burned alive on the Greve, and perhaps may be considered the Protomartyr of the French Reformation.

Jean le Clerc, a woolcomber, who had affixed a paper to the gate of the Cathedral at Meaux, reviling Indulgences, and calling the Pope Antichrist, was among those who were whipped and branded. When his mother, no less zealous than himself, perceived the wound seared upon his forehead by the burning iron, she exclaimed, "Christ and his marks for ever!" Her son retired to Metz, where an illjudged act of iconoclastic zeal soon exposed him to a barbarous and most disproportionate punishment. One evening, seizing a dead man's bone in the Cemetry of St Louis, he shattered the nose of an image of the Virgin, the diadem with which she was crowned, the head of the infant Jesus in her arms, the head and hands of a canonized Prebendary of the Cathedral, and the arm of a wooden image of St Fiacre. These offences are thus particularized because his Judges professed in some manner to assimilate their sentence to his crime, when they condemned him to the most savage mutilations. His nose and right hand were first cut off, two or three circles of red-hot iron were placed round his temples, and he was finally burned alive.

Notwithstanding these severe punishments inflicted on the heretics at Meaux, it by no means appears that the French government, immediately before that explosion, regarded the progress of the reformers with a very serious eye; and indeed, the perplexity of the Vatican furnished materials for the amusement of the court of the reigning monarch, Francis I. In 1524 the king himself was present, and did not refuse to smile at a light interlude represented in one of the saloons of his own palace; the plot of which, as it has been handed down to us, could scarcely be agreeable to any very zealous Romanist. In this tragedy, as it is strangely termed, when the curtain drew up, the Pope appeared seated on a lofty throne, crowned with his tiara, and encircled with a throng of cardinals, bishops and mendicant friars. In the middle of the hall was a huge pile of charcoal, smouldering, and scarcely betraying any sign of the flame which lurked beneath, till it was approached by a venerable gray-haired man with a mask imitating the features of Reuchlin. At first he appeared as if alarmed at the unexpected sight of the large and brilliant company of ecclesiastics; but speedily recovering himself, he addressed them on church abuses, and the necessity of reform; and then, approaching the embers, he roused them with his staff, and revealed the glowing charcoal underneath. As Reuchlin withdrew, Erasmus entered, and was immediately recognized by the cardinals, with whom he seemed on terms of old acquaintance. In his speech on the diseased condition of the church, he did not probe the wound to its core, but soothed and mitigated its virulence by mild and lenitive applications; not declaring himself avowedly for either party, deprecating any sudden change in matters of so deep a moment, and strenuously recommending time as the most able physician. When he sat down behind the cardinals they paid him distinguished attention, evidently dreading his opposition no less than they coveted his support. Next appeared a true counterpart of the Talus of Spenser, a man all iron both in body and soul. He was intended for Hutten, and bursting out into a furious declamation, he taxed the conclave, which he set at nought, as the authors of all corruption in religion; and openly denounced the Pope as Antichrist, the ravager and destroyer of Christendom. Seizing a pair of bellows, he hurried to the embers and blew them violently into a flame so fierce as to terrify the holy college. While, however, he was still blowing and fuming, he fell down dead on the spot; and the cardinals, suppressing all marks, either of grief or joy, carried him away without any funeral service. Lastly, entered one in motley, whose monkish garb declared him to be Luther. Like a second Isaac, he bore a pile of logs upon his shoulder, and cried out, "I will make this little fire shine through the whole world, so that Christ, who has well nigh perished by your devices, shall be restored to life in spite of you!" Then, tossing the logs upon the charcoal, he kindled them into a blaze, which illuminated the whole chamber, and seemed to shine to the very uttermost ends of the earth. Thereat the monster of a monk (monstrosus cœnobites) broke hastily away, and the Pope and cardinals, quaking with fear, thronged together in close deliberation.

Then the Pope, with many tears, demanded assistance and advice in a short and piteous speech. When he had concluded, up rose one of the mendicants, a round, big-bellied, and sleek-headed little brother, who proffered ready aid to the pontiff. The holy father's diploma, heretofore, he said, had constituted the members of his order defenders of the true faith, and inquisitors into heretical pravity. If St Peter would but a second time rely upon them, and place all the burden upon their shoulders, they would pledge themselves to carry the matter through to his entire satisfaction. The cardinals hailed this proposal with acclamations, and urged upon his holiness that those men who had dealt so well with John Huss at Constance, were of all other the most fit agents whom he could select for the present dangerous crisis. "Brethren," said the Pope, addressing the mendicants, "if indeed you will repeat your great work as at Constance, boundless are the rewards which you may expect. Your fourfold order shall no longer wear rags, but be richly dressed, ride on horses and in litters, throw purple robes on their shoulders, carry mitres on their brows, and be fed moreover with the fattest bishopricks. Go and prosper; stay our falling dominion, and for the safety of us all first extinguish this fire, kindled the Lord knows how." The friars, at the word, hurried to the flames, and pouring on them a vast quantity of neat wine, raised them at once to so fearful a height that the whole conclave was stupified, and the mendicants themselves fled with terror. When the cardinals had recovered a little, they addressed a supplication to the Pope. "Most holy father, to thee is given authority both in earth and heaven; quench the fire with thy malediction that it may not overpower us. We know that there is not any element in creation which must not subside at thy word. Heaven and earth obey thee; at thy bidding even purgatory absolves or retains the souls of the departed. Wherefore, by thy saintly office, attack this fire with sound anathemas, lest we become a byeword and a reproach." "Cursed be he," was the Pope's apostrophe, in consequence, to the fire, "who lighted thee! Darkness come over thee; night surround thee, that thou mayest no longer burn! May he who piled thee with fuel be stricken with the sores of Egypt, incurably in his lower bowels. May God strike him with darkness, and blindness and madness, so that he may fumble in noon-day, even as a blind man fumbles in his night!" When the hapless Pope discovered that the fire was insensible to his curses, and that he was powerless against the elements, he expired in a paroxysm of rage, and at the sight the whole assembly broke up, convulsed with laughter. Would that the many hours of religious persecution which marked the reign of Francis I. had been devoted instead to equally harmless buffoonery! But the wish is as idle in this instance, as that which was similarly breathed by the Roman satirist. We approach a real tragedy.

Louis Berquin, a gentleman of Picardy, employed in the honourable office of king's advocate, had been convicted some time back of having translated into French certain writings of Luther; and as he obstinately declined to retract his adherence to the obnoxious doctrines, he would even then have been led to the stake, but for the intercession of powerful friends. Arrested a second time, about the season of the disturbance at Meaux, it seemed as if he must encounter certain destruction. Nevertheless, so energetic were the representations offered in his behalf by Queen Margaret of Navarre, to her brother, Francis I., at that moment prisoner in Madrid, that the king exercised from his distant confinement the length of arm for which royalty is proverbial, and commanded a suspension of the process. It was not, however, till the return of the monarch from his captivity, and even then with a sullen and reluctant obedience, that the parliament allowed Berquin to be discharged from the Conciergerie. When Francis sent the provost of Paris to demand his release, and in case of refusal to force the gates of his dungeon, the magistrate was denied all positive answer, and coldly informed that he might execute his commission. A few years later, when the king was closely occupied by the troubles of Italy, and the ambitious schemes projected in the League of Cambrai, he forgot or abandoned his former client; and the long protracted and persevering vengeance of the parliament was then fully gratified.

[*] The student of Ecclesiastical History need not be informed that Lutheran and Sacramentarian are designations of two parties strongly opposed to each other on the doctrine of Consubstantiation; but the terms appear to have been used indiscriminately for the early French Reformed, till both were superseded by that of Huguenot. It might be that the Romanists were ignorant to which of the two parties the Heretics belonged; or it might be also that the first French converts were divided between Luther and Zuinglius.

1529. Of the charges upon which Berquin was condemned, few particulars have reached us; for Erasmus, from whom we derive a minute account of his behaviour at the stake, professes his own unacquaintance with them; and on one point alone declares his confidence—that whatever might be his imputed errors, Berquin was convinced in his heart that he maintained the truth. The victim was about forty years of age; so pure and blameless in life that scandal had never rested on his name; towards his friends he exhibited singular gentleness of affectation; towards the poor and needy unbounded charity. To the external ordinances of the church he paid all due observance, attending regularly to days of fasting or of festival, to Mass and sermons, and to whatever else might contribute to edification. Free from guile, liberal in disposition, upright in principles, he neither inflicted nor provoked injury; neither was there any thing in his whole life unbecoming of true Christian piety. His friends were probably mistaken when they declared him to be most alien from the doctrines of Luther; they were right, doubtless, when they added, that his chief crime was the ingenuous avowal of dislike to certain troublesome Divines, and Monks not less savage than stupid. Some of the heterodox propositions noted in one of his publications were, a declaration that the scriptures ought to be read to the people at large in the vernacular tongue; a remonstrance against the invocation of the Virgin Mary, often substituted in sermons in lieu of that of the Holy Ghost; a denial that she was the fountain of all Grace; and a wish that certain expressions which in the Vesper service, contrary to the unvarying tenor of scripture, designated her as "our life and hope," should be restricted to the Son, to whom they properly appertained.

The process against Berquin was submitted to the decision of twelve Judges, who, as the day of sentence approached, committed him to prison, an evil omen of their intended severity. He was condemned in the first instance, after public abjuration of his heresy and the burning of his books by the executioner, to be bored through the tongue and committed to perpetual imprisonment. Astonished at a sentence thus harsh and unmerited, he spoke of an appeal to the king and to the Pope; and his persecutors, indignant at the menace, informed him that since he declined their original award, they would effectually prevent his power of appeal by condemning him at once to the flames. Six hundred armed men surrounded the Place de Greve on the day of his execution. A bystander, close to the stake when Berquin approached it, perceived in him no change of countenance, no gesture betraying agitation. "You would have said," are the strong words employed, "that he was meditating in his library upon his studies, or in the church upon his God." Not even when the executioner read aloud, in a hoarse voice, his accusation and sentence, did he show one symptom of diminished fortitude. When ordered to dismount from the cart, he descended cheerfully without a moment's delay. His bearing, however, by no means indicated that stony want of feeling which brutal hardihood sometimes generates in atrocious criminals, but was rather the effect of a tranquil spirit, at peace with God and with itself. The few words which he attempted to utter to the people, were rendered wholly inaudible by the shouts of the soldiery, instructed to drown his last speech if he should attempt to deliver one; and so effectually had the representations of the priests steeled the hearts of the ignorant spectators, that when he was strangled at the stake, (the only mercy accorded to him), not a single "Jesu!" was heard from the populace; ready as they always were to bestow such aspirations on murderers and parricides. "Thus much," says the bearer of that "great injured name," from whom we have borrowed the above narrative,—who never failed in wisdom to detect folly and iniquity, or in honesty to visit them with the ridicule which he thought their best corrective,—"Thus much have I to relate to you concerning Berquin;—if he died with a sound conscience, as I verily hope he did die, tell me in return whose end could be happier*!"

Great as was the discouragement which the German Protestants, (the name recently assumed by the Lutherans), must have received from these acts of the French Government, nevertheless the declaration of Charles V., by which he secured the election of his brother Ferdinand as King of the Romans, seemed to present an opportunity of uniting at least their political interests with those of Francis I. 1531. On the formation of the celebrated League of Smalcalde, Envoys were accordingly despatched to Paris, who represented the covert design of Austria to transform the Empire into an hereditary Monarchy; and the crafty policy by which she was arraying the Catholics and the Protestants against each other, in order, by the common weakness resulting from their dissensions, to disqualify both parties from opposing her own schemes of immeasurable ambition. "Argument," said the zealous Deputies, not arms, must persuade to unity in Religion: we have long demanded a General Council; for even the staunchest supporters of Rome admit that she needs some reform; nor are we so bigoted to our own particular system, but that we will cheerfully abandon it if another be shown to us more accordant with the gospel and with the usages of the Primitive Church. All that we solicit is, that you will close your ears to the calumnies by which we are defamed; that you will regard with suspicion the representations of the Pope, ever interested in the maintenance of abuses; and the insidious blandishments of the Emperor, who seeks your destruction no less than our own. If you reject us, we may perish; but the hour will not long be delayed in which you will regret the loss of allies, almost pointed out by nature for your benefit." These were bold words, but it was the policy of Francis not to disapprove them. He answered in general terms, carefully avoiding any mention of religious controversy; cordially united with the Protestants in a refusal to acknowledge Ferdinand's election; applauded their intention of submitting to a General Council, the assembling of which he would not cease to urge upon the Pope; and excused himself from sending immediate succour, on account of the strict alliance in which he was engaged with the King of England, whose previous consent it was necessary to obtain; but promised so soon as that approval should be granted, an event of which he felt no doubt, that he would despatch an Ambassador to Smalcalde, with full powers to negotiate a close union.

This reply of Francis I. was held as a good omen by the German Protestants. It seemed also, by an occurrence which took place about the same time, that the French reformed were not wholly excluded from the pale and protection of the law; and a nefarious fraud practised in relation to their sect, at Orleans, was almost visited with severe punishment upon its contrivers. One midnight, while the brethren of a Monastery in that city were assembled at Nocturns, their devotion was interrupted by an unusual and inexplicable noise. The immediate and general conjecture resolved the sounds into the work of an evil spirit; and the Exorcist of the convent was accordingly called upon to employ his adjurations; but there was no voice, neither did any one answer in return. At last when the spirit was asked whether it was dumb? a loud noise was renewed and accepted as a token of its powers of communication. The marvel was too astounding to be concealed; but the fathers, anxious, as it would seem, for an impartial confirmation of their own belief in the diabolical agency, stated to many of the chief citizens of Orleans that a singular event had occurred in their Monastery, and, without entering into its particulars, invited them to be fellow witnesses of it at the following midnight. The ghost was no less punctual in attendance at the appointed hour than were the citizens; and when it again disturbed the service, it was required to answer "yes" or "no" to the catechism of the Exorcist, by a prescribed number of knockings. Was it the soul of any person buried in the church beneath?—Affirmed. After the recitation of many names, was it the soul of the wife of the Mayor?—Affirmed. Was it damned, and for what sins? for avarice, uncleanness, pride, lack of charity, or, finally, for Lutheranism? All these offences but the last were denied; and the charge of Heresy being fully admitted, and a wish expressed to have the body disinterred from consecrated ground, the Monks required the lay witnesses to sign a testimonial to the confession of Lutheranism and damnation. The citizens demurred, out of respect for their Mayor; but the Monks, without waiting for the certificate, conveyed the Host and all their relics elsewhere, and resolved not to perform Mass any longer in a place thus profaned. The ordinary, as was usual, took cognizance of these proceedings; visited the Convent; ordered exorcisms to be performed in his own presence; and with no inconsiderable penetration, notwithstanding the opposition of those best acquainted with the ghost, stationed persons in the roofing of the church to seize it if it should appear. No traces, however, of the Evil Spirit were to be discovered.

Notwithstanding this failure in immediate detection, the Mayor of Orleans had strong reason to believe that revenge had prompted the Monks to concert some juggling trick by which they hoped to destroy his reputation. His wife, when on her death-bed, had given strict injunctions that her funeral should be privately performed, in order to avoid the throng of begging Friars who traded in attendance upon those solemnities. The widower had conformed to the request of the deceased; and moreover had presented the Franciscans, in whose church she was buried, with no more than six pieces of gold. These causes of offence were increased yet farther, by a refusal to permit the monks to appropriate a large portion of fuel from a wood which the mayor had recently felled in the neighbourhood; and their indignation at these repeated disappointments had not by any means been dissembled. The mayor framed a memorial grounded upon these facts, and laid it at the foot of the throne, praying for examination of the reputed ghost. But the Monks protested against the royal jurisdiction; and a commission of delegates from the Parliament of Paris was appointed to determine their cause. For a long time no insight could be obtained into the case; till some incautious expressions, dropped by a novice, excited suspicion; and the desired avowal was obtained upon his receiving assurances of immunity, and of removal beyond the power of his guilty employers, who had threatened him with speedy death if he should betray their secret. Two of the Friars, it appeared, one of whom was the exorcist himself, had tutored this youth how to enact the ghost by noises and knockings, and then, having concealed him in the vaultings of the church roof, they easily executed the remainder of their stratagem. Even when thus convicted, the Franciscans persisted in denying the authority of the tribunal by which they had been condemned; and when conveyed to Orleans, in order to undergo a punishment far too light for their crime, the troublous season which ensued prevented its infliction. They were sentenced to do penance in the Cathedral, and to make a public confession of their guilt at the place of common execution. During their previous imprisonment, they were daily visited, cherished, comforted, and supported, by numerous partizans; especially by women, who followed them from Paris to Orleans with plentiful tears and cordial marks of sympathy. The great outcry raised against the Lutherans in the year which followed, increased the favour of the populace towards these pitiful jugglers; and although it is said that the king had fully determined upon razing their monastery to the ground, the feeling of the times manifested itself so strongly in their behalf, that it was thought better in the end to remit all farther penalty and to release them from confinement.

* Erasmus, Epist. clx.

This willingness of the Parliament to do justice even against Monks; the favourable reception of the Protestant deputies, joined to the intercourse which, during the years immediately following, Francis avowedly maintained with them; his intimate alliance with Henry VIII., now a declared schismatic from Rome; and the general tone of his court, in which his sister Queen Margaret, and the ruling favourite, the Duchess d'Etampes, took no pains to conceal their partiality to the Sacramentarians, had encouraged an ardent hope in that sect, that the king himself was at least tolerant; and they attributed the occasional punishment of their brethren, solely to the zeal and importunity of the Bishops and chief magistrates. Ere long, however, the indiscretion of perhaps a few heated individuals, fatally undeceived them. [Oct. 18, 1534.] On one and the same night, were affixed in the streets of Paris, and of various other chief towns of France, and on the gates of the very Palace at Blois, at that time the residence of the court, numerous violent and ill-judged placards, reflecting upon the mass and the doctrine of the Real Presence. Francis might be careless respecting the ostensible object of attack; but his Councillors persuaded him that a movement thus simultaneous, in many different parts of the kingdom, betokened a combination which it was necessary should be suppressed. Four-and-twenty known Sacramentarians were accordingly arrested in Paris; and pains were taken to spread abroad an absurd rumour, (which, on account of that very absurdity, was doubtless more readily admitted by the gaping rabble,) that these miserable men had plotted to surprise the Catholic population during Mass, and to put men, women, and children, indiscriminately, to the sword. In order to increase the effect of a coup d'etat, by which the king resolved to convince his own subjects, his Italian allies, and, above all, the Pontiff, whose confidence it was most important that he should secure, how great was his attachment to the true faith, how rooted was his abhorrence of heresy, he hastened to the capital in the depth of a severe winter. [Jan. 19, 1535.] There, he arranged an expiatory procession; in which himself, his Queen, the Princes of the blood, the Peers of France, the great officers of the crown, and the resident ambassadors of foreign courts, personally assisted. An image of St. Genevieve, the patroness of the city, never exhibited unless in seasons of heaviest public calamity, was committed to the guardianship of the town butchers, who, from time immemorial, had asserted the privilege of that holy custody. Three days' prayer and fasting prepared them for their sacred charge; and when they appeared abroad, their path was cleared by apparitors, but not without difficulty, from the eager throng which pressed upon their steps; for happy was he among the spectators who could touch the propitious idol with the tip of his finger, with his cap, or even with his handkerchief. The costly shrine of St. Margaret, the precious reliquaries of the Saincte Chapelle and of the other Parisian churches, were carried abroad by bearers who walked with naked feet, and wore no other clothing than long shirts. The archbishop of Paris held the consecrated Host, the canopy over which was borne by three sons of Francis, and by the Duke de Vendome. Next appeared the king himself, carrying a torch in his hand, and supported by the cardinals of Bourbon and of Lorrain; to the latter of whom he delivered the torch, at every halt of the procession, while he clasped his hands, knelt humbly on the ground, and implored the mercy of Heaven upon his people.

In a nearly contemporary ecclesiastical history may be found a very curious and picturesque account of this solemnity. The patience of the reader might be exhausted, if we were to marshal before him the unnumbered personages who figured in the procession generalissime, as it is called; if we were to particularize the interminable heads, bodies, and members of canonized mediators, which, for the first time since they had been deposited in the Saincte Chapelle, were now exhibited to popular gaze in the streets; but we cannot refrain from enriching our pages with a single passage in which the music of the King's Swiss Guards is described as follows: "Their drums and fifes called to remembrance not the war of man with man, but that waged by man against God himself; so that they excited a piteous and Christian shuddering in all hearts. To these fearful drums succeeded the dulcet tones of hautboys, violins, cornets, and other musical instruments, distinct from the trumpets which flourished right melodiously. Joined with these were the choristers of the Royal Chapel on the right, and of La Saincte Chapelle on the left, fulfilling their duty to the utmost, by praising God in motets, artfully composed in honour of the holy sacrament. It seemed as if the good king had wished to assemble in one all kinds of music, in order to recreate and console the spirits of Christians greatly troubled (ennuyez) on account of the dishonour wherewithal God had been visited, and to give them hope of His speedy assistance."

At the conclusion of this solemn puppet-show Francis dined with the archbishop; and after the banquet, addressed the assembly in a speech expressive of the acute anguish which he felt at the outrage offered to the King of Kings by perverse men, unworthy of the name of men, who had blasphemed the Supreme Being, and publicly outraged the most august of His mysteries, His true body, and true blood. While his words were interrupted by the frequent sobs and groans of his auditors, he urged them in continuation, to denounce, without pity, all whom they knew to be heretics. "Before God," he exclaimed, kindling with devotion, "if my right arm were gangrened I would cheerfully cut it off and cast it from me; and if my own sons were unhappy enough to be seduced by these detestable novelties, I myself would be the first to furnish proofs of their guilt." On the moment, a proclamation was drawn up, and issued, commanding all French subjects, on pain of being considered accomplices, to lay informations against every heretic whom they could discover, his harbourers and concealers. The reward, on conviction of any of these criminals, was a fourth part of the property of the condemned; and finally, as the press had been the great engine of recent offence, its operations for the present were declared to be entirely suspended. Nor was this tyrannical edict considered sufficient; the day of mummery was to conclude with a spectacle of unparalleled horror. Francis, the most chivalrous knight and accomplished prince of his days, (fertile as those days were in valour and in magnificence,) stopped at six different places of execution, in which an equal number of victims of fanaticism were tarrying his arrival, in all the bitterness of preparation for an agonizing death. As if the ordinary terrors of the stake were inadequate for the punishment now required, these martyrs, bound to the extremity of long poles were alternately lowered to, and withdrawn from the blazing pile, till the ropes by which they were fastened caught fire, snapped asunder, and plunged their already half-burned limbs into the devouring flame.*

A few weeks only, however, elapsed before Francis discovered the full extent, not of the moral guilt, but of the great political fault which he had committed. Many Germans who had taken up their abode in Paris, terrified at the savage executions which they had witnessed, and at the encouragement offered to informers, hastily quitted the kingdom, and on their return home, communicated their fears to their astonished countrymen. The emperor quickly perceived that a panic thus seasonably propagated might be used with advantage in dissolving the connection between Paris and the leaguers of Smalcalde. He insinuated that the professions of amity advanced by Francis had been employed solely as a blind; that his implacable enmity to the German name had wreaked itself, by punishments unheard of among the most barbarous heathens, upon such natives as he had decoyed within his power; that the Protestants might readily determine how far a prince could be sincere in Christian faith, who in the same hour leagued himself with the infidel Turk (as the king of France had recently done), and committed to death of unequalled torture, those who differing from him on a few points of doctrine, still were brethren confessing the same gospel, and worshipping the same Redeemer. Thus astutely, when it served his purpose, could Charles extenuate the great disruption from Rome, which, at other seasons, he was equally well skilled to portray in its fullest ruggedness and separation.

No sooner had Francis learned the consternation which his severe measures had produced in Germany, than he sought to counteract their ill effects. A new edict restrained the magistrates from admitting fresh denunciations, and restored the press to its former activity. In an Apology addressed to the Protestant cities and princes of the empire, he represented his alliance with the Turk as a mere commercial treaty, authorized from time immemorial by the precedent of Venice. He affirmed that the few fanatics whom he had punished, had endeavoured to excite a sedition in his capital, and that public safety had demanded a rigorous example; that in permitting the law to take its extreme course, he had only trodden in the steps of the German princes themselves, who, in like manner, had suppressed the ana-baptists, when they were scattering the seeds of revolt under the cloak of religion; that not a single German had been included among the criminals; and that it was not possible that any true Protestant should feel less abhorrence against the impious blasphemers who reviled the Body and Blood of their common Saviour, than had been excited in himself. These representations were followed up by a special mission to the confederates at Smalcalde. William of Bellay, the envoy selected, was personally intimate with many of the deputies, and he adroitly depicted his master as a skilful and by no means an intolerant theologian. He assured them that the Sacramentarians who had been put to death, were enthusiasts not to be honoured with the name of Protestants; that the king had profoundly examined the recent confession of Augsburg, in which (although not coinciding in every point) he admitted that there was much sound thinking and acute reasoning on matters of the greatest import. For instance, that regarding papal supremacy, purgatory, the celibacy of the priesthood, monastic vows, and the administration of the Sacrament in both kinds, his views so far coincided with those of the reformers, that there could be little doubt of a final good understanding. In conclusion, Bellay invited them either to admit certain French divines to a conference at Smalcalde, or else to allow some of their own body to return with him for a like purpose to France. Melancthon and many others earnestly wished to embrace the latter proposition; but the elector of Saxony, from a prudent misgiving that Francis looked far more anxiously for a temporal than a spiritual union, repressed the ardour of his confiding and unsuspicious friends. Nor was he deceived in his anticipations; for Bellay, ere he departed, manifested the true object of his diplomacy by proposing a formal alliance against the emperor. The offer was received coldly, and the ambassador retired disconcerted.

Little indeed was Francis to be trusted. At the same moment at which Bellay was thus negotiating with the Protestants at Smalcalde, his brother, the archbishop of Paris, was engaged on a mission to the Vatican; in which, with a hope of rendering Paul III. favourable to the views of the king of France for the recovery of Milan, the envoy was instructed to represent in the strongest possible colours the signal mark of attachment which his master had so lately exhibited to the true and ancient church. In this attempt, also, the king was frustrated; and, in order that no part of these transactions might be without its share of duplicity, the archbishop, who in secret if not absolutely favourable, was most unusually indulgent to the New Learning, was recompensed by the Pope for the disappointment of his mission by the presentation of a cardinal's hat.

Meantime, while the followers* of Luther continued to acquire strength and numbers in Germany, they almost disappeared in France under the superior influence of a native reformer. John Calvin was born at Noyon, in Picardy, in 1509, and imbibed or increased a strong attachment to Protestantism in the college of Forteret at Paris. A speech, replete with Lutheran maxims, pronounced on one occasion by the rector of that college, was traced, at least in part, to the pen of Calvin; who, in order to escape a threatened arrest, fled to Angouleme. During his concealment in that town, he found sufficient access to books to compose the most elaborate and methodical work which had hitherto been written illustrative of the reformed principles, his Christianæ Religionis Institutio; that bold treatise appeared in print for the first time at Basle, in 1536, prefaced with a long, fearless, learned, and eloquent remonstrance to Francis I., whose hands were yet reeking with the blood of martyrs to Protestantism.

The early travels and various residences of Calvin are much disputed; and their adjustment matters but little in this place, since his historical and ecclesiastical importance depends altogether upon his final settlement at Geneva. That city, long struggling against the encroachments of the dukes of Savoy and of its own bishops, to whom the emperors had given a large share of temporal power under the title of princes of Geneva and its environs, was roused to new exertions for liberty at the epoch of the reformation. Its inhabitants uniting themselves in a solemn compact with those of Friburg and Basle, assumed the title of Eidgenossen or Sworn Confederates; one of the conjectural sources of the better known party name Huguenot, applied afterwards to the Protestants of France. So powerful had the Genevese rendered themselves in the year 1526, that the duke of Savoy abandoned his pretensions to sovereignty. Within nine years from that date, the reformed doctrine also had become so entirely naturalized among them, that it was proclaimed the religion of the state; the popish bishop was excluded, and Calvin, by that time notorious for his zeal, his talents, and his intrepidity, received an invitation to fix his residence in the city as a public teacher of religion. The earnest adjuration of William Farel (whom we have already seen at Meaux, and who had been one of the most ardent promoters of the late revolution at Geneva), was not likely to be without effect upon a disposition so fitted to receive strong impressions as that of Calvin; and, when he was solemnly warned that unless he became a fellow-labourer in the vineyard of Geneva, the curse of God would attend him whithersoever he went, it was but natural that his kindled imagination should accept the fervid wish of his friend as a special call from heaven. But the city was at that moment feverish and unsettled, in its first subsidence after a great religious and political change. Factious and fiery spirits were found in it, not yet prepared to bow down to discipline; strong passions roamed abroad unwilling to be controlled, and the stern and uncompromising temper of the new pastor was ill adapted to soothe them into repose and submission. Scarcely a year had passed from his first settlement before the inflexible severity with which Calvin pressed certain indifferent matters, as if they were essential, and the ill-judged pertinacity with which he sought to feed with strong meat that infant church which required the milk of babes for its sustenance, occasioned his forcible ejection. The points in controversy speak for themselves. In opposition to a decree of the synod of Lausanne, he refused to allow the observance of any holidays excepting Sundays, to admit baptismal founts to be placed within his churches, and to administer the Sacrament with unleavened bread. Resistance to these harmless customs, wholly uninfluential as was their admission or rejection, upon purity either of faith or practice, appeared to Calvin of sufficient moment to justify the sacrifice of his newly embraced spiritual charge; and, in obedience to a decree of the Syndics, he retired in banishment to Strasburg.*

* Gerdesius ut supra, where we learn that the horrible practice of cutting out the tongues of the heretics, before they were led to execution, in order to prevent them from addressing the spectators, was first introduced during this persecution. Felibien very calmly describes these horrors, as if they formed a part of the dessert at the royal banquet; apres le diner on brusla les Heretiques condamnez. Hist. de Paris, liv. xx. vol. ii. p. 1033.

During his absence, men's thoughts and opinions grew calmer; the heat generated by sudden and rapid transitions had time to abate; and the want of a commanding and presiding mind which might arrange, fashion, and consolidate the hitherto jarring elements of their Ecclesiastical Polity, directed the wishes of the Genevese once again to Calvin. On his side, it was not likely that difficulty should arise. A restoration sought for by his disciples ensured him unlimited dominion; the spiritual government of a distinguished and now independent City, was in itself a most honourable charge; and the prospect of future success in the labour of holiness, of pouring the full light of the Reformation over France, immediately adjoining and as yet but partially illuminated, might awaken in Calvin's bosom, a glorious hope that he was set apart as the chosen Apostle of his native Country. He accepted the proffered charge accordingly, and his brilliant visions were in great part realized. Never was more despotic sway established over men's wills and consciences than that which he erected in Geneva; and, although he failed to introduce his scheme as the dominant Religion of France, it became the real model, as himself was the virtual High Priest, of every separate Reformed congregation within the limits of that Kingdom.

An examination of the differences in Religious Faith between Calvin and his brother Reformers would be misplaced in these pages; and it is not here that we need enter into the subtle and interminable mazes of doctrinal controversy. His Creed, which differs widely in many respects from some opinions frequently inculcated in his name, may be most accurately learned from the Christian Institution which we have already mentioned; and, for his Discipline, it is more our object to state what he did, than to inquire whether it was the best which might have been done.

For the maintenance of his own personal authority, no system assuredly could be better calculated than that which he arranged; nor would it be just on that account to condemn him as labouring chiefly for his own aggrandizement. That Calvin was influenced in part by ambition it would be idle to deny, for what man has ever produced great effects upon his species, if wholly devoid of that passion? a passion, when purified and defæcated, amongst the noblest engrafted on our nature. And Calvin's ambition was thus sublimed. The work which he took in hand was not his own work, but that of his Master; in order to perform it to the utmost, an extraordinary measure of power was necessary, and he, therefore, omitted no effort to obtain, no vigilance to preserve his supremacy. That he did not mistrust his own use of that power can never be a matter of surprise; that he saw its danger if transmitted to others, is evident from his not having recommended a successor, and from Beza's immediate advice after his friend's death, that the office of President should be allowed to expire with him. The infallibility, in all but name, which he maintained while alive, was too precious and too perilous a legacy to be bequeathed to a successor.

The chief distinction of Calvin's ritual worship from that of Luther was found in its extreme plainness; a simplicity in too many instances degenerating into absolute nakedness. Not only were images and pictures excluded from his sacred edifices, as idols and abominations, but the decent majesty of devotion was violated by the rejection of almost every outward adjunct. The peculiar vestments which discriminated the Priest from the Layman were torn away; the soul-awakening tones of the organ were silenced; a frugal meal eaten at a plain table was substituted for the more ceremonious administration of the Sacrament of the body and blood of the Saviour. It seemed as if Calvin believed that the senses were no longer the channels through which the Mind received its knowledge and exhibited its operations; and that to omit paying the homage of the body was the genuine mode of worshipping God in spirit. The flight of her Bishop prevented the continuance of Episcopacy in the Church of Geneva, although it by no means appears that Calvin himself was an enemy to that institution; and it would be difficult to establish a necessary connection between his polity, from which it was excluded by compulsion, and later voluntary Presbyterianism. The caprice of the Congregation was allowed to regulate the salaries of the Ministers, who were thus placed under the control of the very persons whom it was their duty to teach and to reprove, in season and out of season, through good report and evil report; and upon whom, if it were only on that account, they ought to be wholly independent. Besides the Minister, each Church appointed Deacons, who acted as treasurers and almoners; and Elders, who filled the office of censors and guardians of public morals. Auricular confession indeed was abolished, but the inquisition of the Consistory formed by the union of the above three authorities, the Ministers, the Deacons, and the Elders, might prove equally dangerous, and was certainly far more tyrannical than the Romish custom. Once in every month this formidable band assembled; received the denunciations of the Elders; summoned their erring brethren before their bar; took cognizance of their frailties; sentenced them to public penances; and enrolled their shame in everduring registers. A synod composed of deputies from the several consistories met annually to decide on matters of general interest; and in cases of extreme necessity, an appeal lay to a council to which representatives were furnished by all the provinces embracing Calvinism.

One, and that an important part of the Genevan worship, was supplied from France; and details, more copious than our limits permit us to borrow, of the origin of congregational Psalmody, and its adoption by the Calvinists, are very amusingly given by Warton.* Clement Marot, who held a post about the royal household of France, had hitherto dedicated his facile powers of elegant versification to subjects always light, frequently licentious. Notwithstanding the freedom both of his life and writings, he early embraced the reformed religion; was imprisoned for heresy during the captivity of Francis I. in Madrid, and twice afterwards was compelled to take refuge in Geneva to escape similar arrest. It was about the year 1540 that, renouncing his former themes, he put forth a metrical French version of the first fifty Psalms; and in the dedication to Francis I., after drawing a parallel between that king and David, which, it may be thought, must have cost him no slight struggle with conscience to compose, he very strikingly exhibited the grotesque mixture of Ethnical and Christian images, at that time present to his fancy. God, he says, was the Apollo who tuned David's harp; the Holy Spirit was his Calliope; his two-forked Parnassus was the summit of the crystalline heaven; and his Hippocrene was the deep fountain of grace. But, alas! the vein of Marot flowed quite diversely from that of the Hebrew poet-king, and when he ceased to sing of earthly love he ceased also to sing melodiously. The model which he furnished was faithfully copied, not many years afterwards, by the framers of our English Psalmody; and the merits of the French bard may be accurately estimated, when we add, that, in his devotional strains, Marot was the Apollo, the Calliope, the Parnassus, and the Hippocrene of Sternhold and Hopkins.

* Farel retired together with Calvin. We hear much of him afterwards from Meurisse. On one occasion, when a Cordelier was preaching on "the perpetual virginity of the mother of God," and that which the bishop of Madaura, with a singular choice of epithets, terms l'amoureuse incarnation of our Saviour, Farel having interrupted the sermon and denied the assertion, lost his hair and beard under the nails of the women present, who would have killed him but for the seasonable appearance of a detachment of soldiers.—Hist. de l'Hérésie dans Metz, p. 67.

* History of English Poetry, § xiv.

Nevertheless, bald as was Marot's version, it was the work of a popular court-poet; it was in rhyme easily adapted to the vaudevilles and ballad-tunes of the day; and the translator, perhaps, was not a little surprised to hear every chamber of the palace, and every street in Paris, re-echoing with his sacred songs, frequently accompanied by the fiddle, soon after their publication. As no attempt was made to introduce them into the ritual of the Church, the Sorbonne approved their orthodoxy, and thus unwittingly gave additional keenness to a weapon soon to be turned against themselves.

Calvin, as we have before stated, had banished the ancient Ecclesiastical music, and it is probable that he soon perceived the necessity of a substitute, which might impart some warmth to the general frigidity of his service. Marot's version appeared most seasonably for his purpose. It was so plain and prosaic that every peasant might easily understand, and commit it to memory. All resemblance to the Romish antiphonal chant, which Calvin rejected as superstitious and unedifying, was carefully avoided, by setting the words to simple and monotonous tunes, equally removed from science and from sweetness, but in which every individual of the Congregation might take a part. Beza completed the task which Marot had begun; their joint Psalms were appended to the Catechism of Geneva; passed from the lips of the gallants of France to those of the herdsmen of Swisserland and the citizens of Flanders; became one of the most distinguishing characters of Calvinism; and called down a severe Interdict from the Faculty of Paris, by which they had not long since been as formally sanctioned.

Among other alliances by which Calvin had strengthened his rising Church was a union with the Vaudois, those forerunners of the Reformation who from time immemorial had preserved the Faith and usages of primitive Christianity, in the depth of their tranquil valleys in Piedmont. Already, more than once during the XVth century, had these inoffensive mountaineers been denounced by Rome, and subjected to persecution by the Dukes of Savoy; but when the rashness of Charles V., in 1536, subjected the larger part of the dominion of those Princes to the sway of France, the Vaudois for a season enjoyed repose. Their chief safety, however, depended upon their obscurity; and could they have been content to be forgotten, they might have remained unharmed. But proud of connexion with the new and flourishing Church of Geneva, and perhaps over-estimating its power of temporal aid, they soon abandoned their cautious policy of concealment, and for the first time printed and published a Confession of Faith and a Liturgy. A rejection of the doctrine of human merits, of traditions, of the infallibility of the Pope, of prayers for the dead, and of many other Romish practices stigmatized as superstitious and idolatrous, was little likely to pass uncensured by the French Prelacy; and, accordingly, in 1540, the Archbishop of Aix denounced to the Parliament of Provence certain portions of his Diocese as heretical. Beyond their valleys, the Vaudois had extended themselves through some districts of Provence, in which they had colonized the large town of Merindol, and about thirty villages, the chief of which was Cabrieres. Eighteen of the inhabitants of the first-named place, having neglected a summons of the Parliament, were declared contumacious, and sentenced to perpetual banishment; and a Decree of extermination was pronounced against their place of abode. "Whereas," so recites this barbarous Edict, "the town of Merindol is a notorious retreat and receptacle of all those who profess the doctrines of certain damnable Sects, the Court orders that it shall be rendered desert and uninhabitable; that every house in it shall be burned or demolished; and that all buildings, coverts, and woods, within two hundred paces of its circuit, shall be razed to the ground."

The Governor of Provence refused to execute this savage ordinance without express authority from the king; and Francis, when applied to, before sanctioning the cruelty, directed inquiry to be made into the habits and manners of those whom he was requested to destroy. It might be thought that the report drawn up by William de Bellay, his former envoy to Smalcalde, and now governor of Provence, would have ensured protection on grounds not less of policy than of humanity. "The Vaudois," replied that high officer, "differ from our communion in many parts of their creed, but they are irreproachable in their morals, laborious, sober, benevolent, and of unshaken loyalty. Agriculture is their pride and sole occupation; and so marvellous is their industry, that, in numerous cases in which landed proprietors have been contented with a small quit-rent, or have granted renewable leases on long terms, estates formerly rated at four crowns per annum have produced three hundred and fifty; the tenants all the while having cheerfully and regularly paid their dues both to the crown and to the landholder. Hospitality is one of their proverbial virtues, and not a beggar is ever known in their settlements. It must be confessed, however, that they rarely enter our churches; and if they do so, they pray with their eyes fixed on the ground, casting no regard on any of the Saints; they do not use holy water, nor do they acknowledge the benefit derived from pilgrimages and neuvaines,[*] nor say Mass either for the living or the dead." The utmost indulgence obtained from Francis, in consequence of this simple and touching relation of patriarchal manners, was a short respite. The villagers were commanded to appear before the Archbishop of Aix within three months, and to solicit from him reconciliation with the Church. In default of such obedience, the Parliament of Provence was authorized to proceed against them with the utmost rigour; and all civil and military officers were enjoined to afford co-operation. "I do not burn heretics in France," said the king, "in order that they may be nourished in the Alps."[†] The given period elapsed without the required submission of the Vaudois; and years rolled on, and yet the royal ordinance for their destruction remained unfulfilled. The cause of that forbearance, although ludicrous, is too illustrative of the follies which the Romish Church occasionally mingled with its cruelties to be altogether omitted.

Chaussonnée, first president of the Parliament of Provence, was the author of a large work, Catalogus Gloriæ Mundi, in which he relates, that in early life, while he practised as an advocate at the bar of Autun, so fearful was the devastation produced in the neighbourhood of that city by swarms of rats, that a general famine was reasonably apprehended. Every human means for the destruction of the marauders having failed, appeal was made to the power of the Church; and the grand vicar of the diocese was instructed to promulgate the ordinary form of excommunication, provided against noisome beasts and reptiles. Certain preliminary steps were necessary before the issue of this final decree; and in stating them we beseech our readers to suppress their smiles, and to remember that we are placing before them serious facts. First, the rats were cited to appear in the ecclesiastical court; secondly, on their contumacy, the grand vicar appointed a day on which the defendants might be heard by their proctor, in appeal against the prosecutor, who claimed definitive sentence; and Chaussonnée was appointed to the honourable office of advocate for the rats. His clients were largely indebted to his ingenuity. He pleaded that the rats were too widely dispersed to admit of general assembly under a single citation, and that the writs ought therefore to be read after Mass in each separate parish. This demurrer occasioned considerable delay; and after the form, which was strictly legal, had been complied with, and the accused still continued to decline the summons, their able advocate resorted to a new defence. The journey, he urged, was long and incommodious; the roads were beset with cats; and, above all, any general proscription which involved in one mass parents together with their children, the innocent no less than the guilty, was opposed to the first natural principles of justice. We are ignorant of the issue of this cause, but upon its dexterous conduct were reared the fame and fortune of Chaussonnée, who always attributed to the reputation which he then obtained, his subsequent high professional advancement. At the moment at which he was preparing to execute the edict issued against the Vaudois by the parliament over which he presided, a Provencal gentleman waited upon him; turned the conversation upon his book; opened it at the passage in which the above incident was narrated; and asked whether a society of men deserved less regard than a herd of rats? Chaussonnée, struck by the justice of the reproof, had the merit of suspending any farther steps towards persecution during the remainder of his life.

Unhappily, on Chaussonnée's death, a president of widely different temper succeeded; and to his extensive civil power, Meinier, Baron d'Oppeda, united the military command of the province in the absence of its governor. Personal motives are said to have stimulated his enmity against the Vaudois. One of his tenants, who had robbed him, found an asylum in their fastnesses; and his hand had been disdainfully refused by a neighbouring countess, who liberally extended protection to those industrious husbandmen from whom her chief wealth was derived. D'Oppeda vowed their destruction, and commenced his design by forwarding to the royal council incessant reports of disaffection among the mountaineers, and of their evident desire to erect themselves into independent Cantons, on the model of their Swiss neighbours. Arsenals and magazines, he said, were forming; their difficult passes were entrenched; their commanding heights were crowned with batteries; at a word, 16,000 native troops, and an equal number of auxiliaries, could be gathered in the field; and unless formidable preparations were seasonably anticipated, the whole force of the kingdom might hereafter be demanded for their subjugation. Having thus artfully awakened the king's fears, and received the instructions which he so much desired, his next care was to prevent suspicion among his victims; and he called out the extraordinary militia of Provence, under the ostensible pretext of joining an armament at Marseilles, destined to cooperate in a descent upon England. It was not till they were almost surrounded that the villagers perceived their danger; and a great proportion, availing themselves of the only chance of safety, now left open, retired in hasty flight to the mountains. As the troops advanced to Merindol, only one peasant youth was found within its precincts, who stipulated for his ransom with the soldier who arrested him by the promise of two crowns. But D'Oppeda, unwilling to permit the escape of a single prisoner, paid the price of blood to his captor, tied the victim, thus purchased, to an olive-tree, and shot him to death, while the town was pillaged and burned. Sixty men, capable of bearing arms, remained in the village of Cabrieres, and to them the savage, not knowing the scantiness of their numbers, granted a capitulation. No sooner, however, had he discovered his mistake, than the terms were violated; and the prisoners, many of them accompanied by their wives, about to become mothers, were driven to a neighbouring meadow, where the whole body was put to the sword in cold blood. Meantime, the churches in which some of the miserable women hoped to find sanctuary, afforded no protection against death preceded by dishonour. Other females, in whom, either from too tender or too advanced age, the soldiery were disappointed of brutal gratification, were enclosed in a barn, and driven back by pikes, when they attempted escape from the flames in which they were eventually consumed. Similar horrors were enacted in the pursuit of that band which had sought the mountains; for of these also the greater part, the aged and infirm, the women and children, drooping under fatigue, were readily overtaken. Two-and-twenty villages were levelled with the ground; 4000 of their inhabitants were massacred; and 700 of the most able-bodied peasants were reserved for galley-slaves.

[†] Introduction to Henry Arnaud's Recovery of the Vaudois, by H. D. Acland, lvi.; to the Prolegomena of which interesting and most elegant volume every inquirer into the history of the Vaudois is bound to express obligation.

The temper of the French nation was not yet prepared for this wholesale and atrocious butchery on account of difference of faith, and the intelligence of D'Oppeda's great wickedness was received with execrations. The king refused to admit him to his presence, but content with this single mark of displeasure, forbade any judicial inquiry into his conduct. The last year of this reign was again sullied with numerous brutal executions at Meaux; and the death of Francis, therefore, whom the reformed now justly esteemed a confirmed persecutor, was far from occasioning regret; especially since in his son and successor, Henry II., a prince of less active habits, they expected a more lenient master. But the hands to which Henry, from his very accession, committed the administration of his power, were most hostile to the reformed principles.

Few houses in Europe were more illustrious than that of Lorraine. Drawing their remote origin from times beyond memorial, they numbered, among their ancestors in the paternal line, Godfrey, the first king of Jerusalem; and, by the mother's side, they were descended from a daughter of Charlemagne. Claude, a younger brother of that family, having passed into the service of Louis XII., so far ingratiated himself with that monarch, and afterwards with his son, Francis I., that he obtained the erection of his estate of Guise into a Duchy; but the favour of the second reign was not of long endurance, and the latter days of Claude were passed in disgrace. His son Francis, a gallant and accomplished prince, bold, enterprising and ambitious, had won the affections of Henry by his skill in bodily exercises, and his agreeable talents for companionship. The marriage of one of his brothers, the duke d'Elbœuf, to a daughter of the royal mistress, Diana, duchess of Valentinois, materially strengthened the interests of this aspiring family; and when the bond became more strongly knit by the admission into the royal councils of Charles, cardinal of Lorraine, the most crafty and politic spirit of his time, the threefold cord was in truth not easily to be broken. An alliance with the royal house itself, within a few years from the point at which we have now arrived, was to give increased consolidation to a power already too swollen for that of subjects: and when their niece, Mary, queen of Scots, bestowed her hand upon the Dauphin Francis, the brothers of Guise might be deemed virtual kings of France. There can be little doubt that all their sagacity and vigilance were thenceforward directed to the discovery of some favourable moment, at which the narrow line, still separating them from titular royalty, might be safely over-leaped. But the reformed, deeply suffering from the bitterness of persecution with which they had been visited, especially by the cardinal of Lorraine, watched their course with a keenly jealous observance; and to the political hatred which soon mingled itself with religious differences, may be traced the ultimate failure of the Guises, no less than the long train of bitter calamities which France was doomed to suffer from intestine discord.

The hopes of the Calvinists, perhaps, were not wholly dissipated, till the new king celebrated a public entry into his capital two years after his accession. The ceremonial was conducted with extraordinary pomp and magnificence, and attended by the principal nobles of the kingdom. Heralds had been previously despatched to the emperor at Brussels, where they proclaimed, that jousts would be held during fifteen days in Paris. Thither, in the names of the challengers, amongst whom it was announced, that Henry himself would appear both on foot and on horseback, they invited all knights desirous of honour, to proceed and seek it at the appointed season. At the time of this solemnity, when the coronation also of the queen was celebrated, and a mock naval fight exhibited on the Seine, the king, surrounded by a brilliant cortege, held a bed of justice in his parliament; and a few days afterwards, assisted at a splendid religious procession; assembled the notables in one of the saloons of the palace, to take cognizance of the state of religion; and ordered the Conciergerie to be cleared that very night of all the miserable victims long since condemned for heresy, but whose execution had been specially deferred, in order that it might add another spectacle to these days of royal festivity. Four scaffolds were accordingly erected in different public places of the city; one on the Greve, one in the Place Maubert, a third in front of the porch of Notre Dame, and the last on the spot recently dedicated to scenes of chivalrous pleasure in the tournaments at the Rue St. Antoine. As darkness fell, the piles blazed on high; and the king, who visited them in succession, distinguished, not without compunction, among the cries of the wretched sufferers expiring in agony, the voice of a favourite attendant of his bedchamber.

A more general blow against the reformed was inflicted, when Henry, jealous of the designs of Charles V. upon the Duchy of Parma, espoused the cause of Octavio Farnese against the emperor and pope Julius III. The king of France then not only protested against the re-assembling of the Council of Trent, at the opening of its new session, but marched a body of troops to ravage the ecclesiastical territories; and willing to counteract any impression that he was hostile to the church itself, which might arise from these ambiguous acts, he issued an ordinance, the Edict of Chateaubriand, visiting the Sacramentarians with peculiar and unprecedented severity. By that mandate, the civil and ecclesiastical courts were instructed to co-operate for the extirpation of heresy. In order to prevent the admission of any secret favourer of the reformed opinions to stations of authority in the law, every person applying for such appointments, was to exhibit testimonials, not only of his correct morals, but also of his undoubted orthodoxy; and, in like manner, to purge the magistracy, even in its lowest grades, from any suspected officers, secret inquiries were to be made by the chiefs into the conduct of all their inferiors, the seneschals, baillies, provosts, and their respective lieutenants, as to their strict performance of the edict; and the higher counsellors were compelled to answer interrogatories concerning their faith, whenever proposed to them at the quarterly meetings. The most rigid examination on religious points was instituted before bestowal of academical appointments on rectors of colleges and schoolmasters; and, if in corporate towns, the mayors and aldermen were incautiously chosen, the electors exposed themselves to a process as fosterers of heresy. Under that most extensive denomination were now included not only those who should give an asylum to the reformed, or assist in any manner their escape from justice, but whoever, also, after an arrest, should venture to intercede or to present the slightest petition in behalf of a prisoner. The property of all fugitives to Protestant states was to be seized and confiscated; and any person who had been engaged in collusive transfers by which they nominally held the estates of absent heretics, and transmitted to them the rents, were subjected to like confiscation and an additional heavy fine. The informer who could prove that any subject of France had forwarded money to Geneva, was entitled to a clear third both of the penalties and of the property. The final clause was directed against the press, that mighty engine upon which the progress of knowledge must at all times depend, and without whose aid, the zeal, courage, piety, sufferings, activity, and talents of the reformers might ultimately have proved ineffectual. Books and pamphlets written in every vein of literature, didactic, controversial, or satirical; gravely illustrative of Protestant doctrines, or mercilessly ridiculing the abuses of popery, had long been forwarded from Geneva to Lyons as a central magazine. Their subsequent dispersion through the distant provinces was easily effected; and a hope of gain from the general excitement of public curiosity, induced the booksellers of Paris, of Poitiers, and of Bordeaux, to circulate and even to reprint this attractive ware. By the edict of Chateaubriand, the importation of every book of every sort from Geneva, or from any other town separated from the Romish communion, was prohibited under pain of fine and corporal punishment. The police of Lyons was ordered to pay frequent visits to booksellers' shops and printing offices. Printers were forbidden from working, unless on their own premises; from issuing abroad any work without their own name and that of the author on its title page; from receiving any MS. of the holy Scriptures, or connected with theology, unless attested by a certificate under the hands of two doctors of divinity; from selling any publication not registered in a catalogue which they were bound to present to the magistrates; from opening any packet of books on its arrival from a foreign country, unless in the presence of two ecclesiastics; and from selling by auction any library without the previous inspection of authorized censors. Human ingenuity might tax itself in vain to frame a law more odious than this edict; more oppressive or more tyrannically opposed to intellectual advancement, and therefore to the best interests of mankind.

The plague was now raging in Paris, and it seemed as if it were believed that the wrath of heaven might be deprecated by human victims, so numerous were the daily offerings of heretics delivered to the stake. In other parts of the kingdom, persecution was equally active. When the duke of Guise compelled Charles V., hitherto unaccustomed to reverse, to raise the siege of Metz, after the fruitless loss of the flower of his troops, perhaps the triumph of the victorious commander derived no small addition from a committal to the flames, by the common executioner, of every Lutheran book which he found within the walls of the city after its relief. At Lyons far more barbarous fires were kindled, and numerous missionaries who were despatched by the Bernese for the conversion of that city were adjudged to the stake. Among these was a brave gentleman, Louis de Marsac, whose youth had been passed, not without distinction, in arms, and whose later years found consolation in the perusal of the Scriptures, a crime deemed worthy of capital punishment. When led out to execution, the prisoner observed that each of his fellow sufferers carried a halter round his neck; an ignominy which had been spared himself, in consideration of the respect due to his military rank and services. Jealous, however, of his honour, and reluctant to surrender any portion, however small, of the glory of martyrdom, the undaunted veteran turned to the attendant magistrates, and asked of them, if there was any distinction between his own offence and that of his comrades? "If there be not," he added, "give me also a like collar, and enrol me in a similar order of knighthood."

The numerous abuses existing in the Gallican church at the commencement of the reformation had eminently assisted its progress in France. The crown had by degrees assumed to itself the patronage of almost all the great ecclesiastical preferments; and by its corrupt disposal of bishopricks and abbeys, had rendered them prizes of court favouritism instead of rewards of piety and learning. Persons most remote from spiritual habits frequently thus obtained benefices either for themselves or for their connexions; and even if they did not give occasion for scandal by open licentiousness, they deeply injured the credit of the church by total ignorance or neglect of its duties. The privilege of commendam was one of the most fruitful sources of disorder. In the earlier Christian church, whenever a hostile irruption, a famine, or any other public calamity, had so far diminished the revenues of an episcopal see, or a religious house, as to render them insufficient for the support of its ordinary head, the metropolitan recommended the pastoral charge to some neighbouring ecclesiastic, who accepted the additional burden gratuitously, till a more favourable season permitted a re-establishment of the suspended dignity. It is easy to perceive how this charitable custom, at first so praiseworthy, degenerated in times less pure into abuse. The chief revenues of the cardinals, whom the duties of the sacred college detained in permanent abode at Rome, were at first derived from prebends or other benefices without cure of souls; but ambition and avarice gradually fostered the desire of exalted station and overflowing coffers, and by the perversion of commendams, the richest sees were often accumulated in plurality upon ecclesiastics by whom they could never be visited. The convenient license thus assumed by the court of Rome was not likely to be long unimitated by secular princes; and, in France, the wealthiest benefices were abundantly showered down upon those, whose connexion with the blood royal, or whose cabinet duties as ministers of state, attached them to the court; even women were admitted as Eveques Laiz, and either sold their bishoprics or provided substitutes, or Custodines, as they were termed, to perform the clerical offices for the least possible stipend. Similar abuses prevailed among the inferior clergy; and dispensations were so readily accorded, that, unless in rare instances, the population at large lived either without any pastors at all, or with curates unworthy of the name. Religion, therefore, was sought for in vain, and its place was usurped by ignorance and superstition.

A reform of these grievous temporal abuses, preached boldly by men who announced also a more enlightened spiritual doctrine, which they asserted in despite of bonds, persecution and death, and who maintained their purity of teaching by a correspondent purity of life, was certain to obtain zealous partizans; especially when it was opposed, not by argument but by arms; combated only by the sword of the law and the terror of punishment. In vain was the scaffold deluged with the blood of unnumbered martyrs! It became, as has been powerfully said elsewhere, the seed of the church, springing up to abundant harvest, and bearing a return, some sixty, some a hundred-fold. In vain were the tongues of confessors torn out before they were dragged to execution, in order to prevent their dying words from awakening sympathy! They being dead yet spake; and their speech was as the voice of a trumpet. Day by day the reformation embedded itself more firmly in France, and secretly or openly a very large proportion of the population embraced its doctrines.

Hitherto, nevertheless, the Calvinists, as we must for the present call them, were but isolated individuals, without a focus and point of union; but their power, even while thus disjointed, had been sufficiently revealed in many separate struggles, especially in those occurring at Metz; and they could not long remain blind to the great benefit which would be derived from co-operation. It was in 1555 that the first avowed French church, on the principles of the reformation, was established at Paris, by a number of proselytes, for some time accustomed to assemble for worship in a house in an obscure quarter of the Fauxburg St. Germain. The chief of this little band was named Ferriere Maligni, a gentleman of ancient extraction and large possessions in Maine. His anxiety to obtain baptism, administered otherwise than after the ritual of that communion which he had abandoned, for an infant of which his wife was pregnant, induced him to organize a body approaching to the model of Geneva, and consisting of a minister, deacons, and elders. The example was followed during the same year at Meaux, at Poitiers, at Angiers, and at L'Isle d'Alvert in Saintonge; and so rapidly were these religious associations multiplied in other places—partly, indeed, by the connivance of magistrates who in secret were their friends—that in the single district of Orleans, six churches were founded before the expiration of the two following years. Great was the stability derived from these fixed and permanent institutions; for hitherto spiritual duties had been administered only by casual pastors; by itinerant missionaries from Geneva, ranging in small numbers over a large circuit, hastily disappearing at the first alarm, and leaving their flocks untended in moments of terror and of peril. The churches now erected, although wholly independent upon each other, maintained a cordial and uninterrupted mutual communication; ramified widely on all sides; and by deputing from themselves a fitting minister to every congregation which had the will and the ability to support one, ensured new strength to the parent stock by every fresh branch which germinated from its bosom.

Nor was it in France only that the French reformation hoped for establishment. Their sect, proscribed in the old world, sought for dominion in the new; and the brilliant hope might have been gratified but for the treachery of a hypocrite by whom they were deceived and betrayed. Nicholas Durand, of Villegagnon, a knight of Malta and vice-admiral of Britany, had been much employed in naval services on the coast of Brazil, with the localities of which he had thus become well acquainted; and stimulated equally by avarice and ambition, he thought to build his fortune on the patronage of one often to be mentioned with distinction in the following pages, Gaspard de Coligny, admiral of France. That nobleman's attachment to the reformed doctrines, although not yet publicly avowed, was a matter of sufficient notoriety; and Durand obtained his confidence by offering to plant a Protestant colony on the shores of South America. Coligny ardently embraced the project; and having represented to the king in general terms, with a careful avoidance of his particular object, the probable great commercial advantages which must result from an establishment in that country, he obtained both the royal permission and also funds sufficient for his purpose. Durand, in assembling his band of emigrants, took especial care to secure, so far as prudence allowed, a great majority of Protestants; and before the close of 1555 he disembarked 300 settlers on an island in the Rio de Janeiro. The first advices which he transmitted home announced success in glowing language; and his applications for more colonists, for marriageable women, and, above all, for two discreet and active ministers, were received with avidity by Calvin and the synod of Geneva. Missionaries cheerfully volunteered on a service so hopeful and alluring; and it was not until they landed on a barren and burning soil, which, although affording but scanty means of uncertain subsistence, and scarcely extending a mile in circumference, had been dignified by the vanity of the adventurers with the swollen title of Antarctic France, that their dreams of peace, liberty, and abundance, were dissipated: nor was it till they had experienced, first the carelessness and opposition, afterwards the cruelty and persecution of Durand, that they discovered his object to be unconnected with purity of religion. In his real design he had amply succeeded: the admiral's influence and money had given him footing in America, and for the rest, it was now his interest to espouse the opposite party. Harassed by his tyranny and intolerance, the disappointed ministers and many of their flock asked permission to return to Europe. It was readily accorded; but the vessel provided for their passage was so little sea-worthy, that part of them feared to sail in her, and those who confided more willingly in the mercy of the elements than in that of their oppressor, nearly perished by famine from want of sufficient stores. At length, on touching at Hennebon, in Britany, they delivered to the magistrates of that town a sealed packet, which Durand had informed them would ensure protection and hospitality at whatever French port they might first land. These Litteræ Bellerophontæ, however, in truth denounced the bearers as heretics, and commended them to the secular arm. Fortunately for the unsuspecting messengers of their own destruction, the authorities at Hennebon favoured the reformation, and disclosed the perfidy of Durand to the miserable and exhausted fugitives. Ere the lapse of many years his wickedness encountered just retribution. His numbers, greatly weakened both by the departure of this persecuted band, and by his rule of blood over those who remained, were insufficient to withstand the attacks of the jealous Portuguese. During his absence in quest of reinforcements, the island was captured, the fort which he had erected was destroyed; and Rio de Janeiro, which, to adopt the opinion of the modern historian of Brazil, but for the treachery of Villegagnon to his own party, would probably have been at this day the capital of a French colony, was wrested from its undeserving possessors shortly after its attainment.

Meantime, the embarrassed political state of France, under the weak sway of Henry II., and the alarm and distraction which succeeded the memorable defeat of St. Quentin, removed the public attention for a short period from the increasing strength of Protestantism, and enabled its now organized church to strike root deeply and with firmness. It was not until two years after the establishment of a congregation in a meeting-house so publicly situated as to be immediately fronting the Sorbonne, that its frequenters, amounting to more than 400 persons, attracted any marked popular attention. During the panic, however, arising from the recent loss of the great battle just mentioned, the concourse of this large assembly of both sexes and of all classes, one evening at an unusual hour, to hear a sermon and to celebrate the Lord's Supper, excited suspicion in the neighbourhood. The inhabitants of that quarter of the city rose in arms, beset the meeting-house, and when the Calvinists opened its doors, at the close of their worship, in order to retire, attacked them with volleys of stones. A general tumult ensued; a few of the reformed, drawing their swords, cut their way through the infuriated rabble; and the remainder, less courageous, endeavoured to defend themselves within the meeting-house, which they barricaded, till the arrival of the police freed them for awhile from danger. The officers took possession of a large and well-lighted apartment, down the centre of which were arranged some wooden benches round a long table covered with linen cloths; and close to the side walls were spread a few mattresses, as an accommodation for those persons who resided too distantly to permit them to return home at an advanced hour of night. But great indeed was the astonishment of the directing magistrate, when amid the congregation he perceived numerous persons of distinction, and, especially, certain ladies of the palace and maids of honour to the queen. Willing to spare his female prisoners the shame and, perhaps, the danger of open exposure to a fierce and licentious mob, he took all the precautions in his power for their safety. But his escort proved too weak; and it was not until after the endurance of grievous insults and great violence, so that the hoods of the women were rudely torn from their faces, and all suffered indiscriminately from blows and showers of mud, that they were lodged in the Chatelet. Pains were taken, during their imprisonment before trial, to spread abroad the most atrocious calumnies respecting the objects of their meeting. The nameless crimes which, from the first ages of the church, have been imputed to those whom peril has compelled to employ secrecy in their assemblies, were again revived; and the innocent mattresses found in the meeting-house were cited even from the pulpit as damning proofs of the unspeakable guilt of the prisoners. A judge, of broken character, Musnier by name, concealing himself at the moment from a process of subornation and perjury, solicited the odious post of public accuser; and the suspension of the suit against him was the price which he was to receive for his labour of bitterness and hatred. In a few days he expedited the legal forms against the accused, and pursuing his task with the ardour of one who felt that his own immunity was to be purchased by their destruction, he succeeded in obtaining a sentence which brought five of his victims to the stake. The friends of the remaining prisoners, and of the few who had escaped, drew up a bold Apology, addressed to the king, but intended for the public. It received many answers from the zeal of the Sorbonne; and among them one not to be forgotten, of which the author was Cenalis, bishop of Avranches. That learned prelate entered into "a marvellous pleasant disputation" concerning the signs of the true church; presupposing that, even without the preaching of the gospel and the administration of the Sacraments, there were certain outward signs by which a true and false church might be distinguished from each other. The signs of our church, says this acute reasoner, are bells, by which we are summoned to mass; the signs of the heretics are pistols and muskets, which they discharge during their meetings. He then wantons and luxuriates through a protracted antithesis of the opposite qualities of these visible testimonies. Bells, he says, with a play upon the words which it is difficult to render, sound in unison, muskets in confusion; bells explode musically, muskets terrifically; the former open heaven, the latter hell; these disperse storms and lightning, those gather clouds and mimic thunder. In spite of this logic, the elector Palatine and the Protestant Cantons interceded for the prisoners; and since the state of his external relations was too dangerous to permit Henry to run the hazard of awakening new foreign enemies, he dissembled, and consented to their enlargement.

It was no longer then among the obscure or middle classes only that the spirit of the reformation was to be sought; it had reared its head in high places also; and the court and the nobles of France were beginning to be divided among themselves on the great question of religious faith. Of the two royal houses of Valois and Bourbon, both descended from St. Louis, the former was now in possession of the crown; the latter, although depressed by Francis I., in consequence of the well-known treason of its head, the constable, enjoyed all the privileges of princes of the blood; and its present representatives, Antony Duke of Vendome (who by marriage with Jeanne D'Albret had become titular king of Navarre) and his brother Louis Prince of Conde, may be named as the most illustrious of those who inclined to the Protestant doctrines. The king of Navarre was a man of easy temper and vacillating conduct, quickly alarmed, indolent, and devoted to pleasure. The prince of Conde, on the other hand, was bold, hardy, daring, and adventurous. His marriage with a niece of the Admiral Coligny cemented a union between the two families, and brought him in contact with the reformed: and while the king of Navarre, floating loosely on the tide of scepticism, was for ever tossed about by some new wave of doubt, and lived and died in suspense between the two creeds, the prince of Conde devoted all the influence of his exalted rank, all his physical energies, and all his great powers of intellect to the support of the holy cause which he ultimately adopted with his inmost heart.

The nuptials of the Dauphin Francis with Mary Queen of Scots had summoned a brilliant assembly to Paris, and the Bourbons, for a long time unused to bask in royal favour, and therefore, so far as the necessary obligations of their rank permitted, avoiding the chill atmosphere of the court whose sunshine was eclipsed to them, attended the festivities, much more in compliance with etiquette than from inclination. No sooner had the king withdrawn from his capital, after the conclusion of the spectacles, than these princes, with their consorts, resorted to the Protestant congregations. Urged by the fiery zeal of Calvin, who in frequent letters had reproached them with cowardice and pusillanimity, the reformed ministers were then preparing to astonish all France by a bold avowal of their proscribed and persecuted faith. The princes of the blood were prevailed upon to accompany a solemn procession through the Fauxbourg St. Germain, in which nearly four thousand of the reformed chanted, at the fullest pitch of voice, the Psalms of Marot, and paraded during several hours under the protection of a numerous escort of armed gentlemen. When intelligence of this singular exhibition was conveyed to the king, great pains were taken to impress upon him that it was but a part of a general conspiracy on the eve of explosion. But the high rank of the chief parties concerned deterred him from proceeding farther, at the moment, than ordering his parliament to prosecute inquiries and receive informations, and threatening capital punishment for any similar outrage.

One step indeed he took in his perplexity, little justified either by prudence or by the immediate circumstances. Francis de Coligny, Sieur d'Andelot, although more boldly avowing the principles of Calvinism than his brother the admiral, had not joined in this procession. On visiting his estate in Britany, however, a province as yet less imbued than any other with the reformed doctrines, he had been accompanied by a Protestant minister, who preached and administered the communion in the house of his patron, and assisted him in laying the foundation of more than one Calvinistic church. The king, unwilling wholly to overlook this open defiance of law, was equally unwilling to expose himself to a breach with the powerful family of Coligny; and perhaps, as a consequence, with that of Montmorency also; and he therefore mildly invited D'Andelot to court, in order that he might hear his justification, and thus silence his accusers. For that purpose he informed beforehand, both the Cardinal de Chastillon, another brother of D'Andelot, and a Montmorency, his cousin, of the precise questions which he designed to ask, in order that time might be afforded for the preparation of suitable replies; and he added, that without pursuing the investigation more deeply, he should be content with a simple disavowal. That disavowal, however, was not easily to be wrung from the singlehearted, spotless, and sincere D'Andelot; and it was in vain that his brother and his cousin exhausted their casuistry to persuade the gallant and high-minded soldier, who coveted the glorious title sans reproache, to violate his honour and offend his conscience. The king, during a familiar conversation at supper, reminded him of the long and sincere attachment subsisting between them; how numerous were the favours bestowed on the one hand, how great the services performed on the other. At the same time, he expressed a profound conviction, that one whom he so cordially loved, never could be found in the ranks of his enemies, lending himself to the rebellious stratagems of a turbulent and illegal sect. Still, he continued, as some strange reports to the contrary had been whispered, it would be advisable that he should make a declaration of his opinions concerning the Mass. To this request D'Andelot calmly replied, that the remembrance of the king's exceeding grace and bounty was so deeply impressed upon his heart that he could not sufficiently display his gratitude, even if he expended his last drop of blood in the royal service; to which he had vowed to devote his sword, his body, and his life. Nevertheless that his soul belonged to God, its giver; that having providentially been enlightened by the Gospel, and believing that he had discovered truth in that very creed which his majesty persecuted blindly and without inquiry, he should think himself unworthy to live if he lied before his conscience and his king. And, finally, that since he was compelled to explain himself concerning the Mass, he did not hesitate to declare that he considered it to be a horrible profanation. The king, little prepared for this uncompromising rejection of his overtures, and indignant at having lavished so much gentleness upon one who thus boldly defied his authority, hastily breaking up the table, seized a dish, and while intending to vent his anger by shattering it on the ground, unintentionally struck the dauphin, who sat next him, a severe blow. He then committed the offender to the prison of the Bishop of Meaux, and deprived him of his high office of colonel in chief of the French infantry.

A short period of reflection, however, convinced the king of the impolicy of these extreme measures; and he wrote with his own hand to the constable Montmorency an account of the provocation which he had received from his kinsman, entreating him at the same time to be at ease, for that all was pardoned; and in testimony of his intended mercy, he removed the prisoner from the Episcopal custody, in which he was in some measure exposed to the grasp of the inquisition, to a much less formidable confinement in the castle of Melun. During his imprisonment in that fortress, D'Andelot's hours were chiefly devoted to reading; and Brantome, from whom we derive this information, is greatly scandalized that he was permitted to receive all kinds of books indiscriminately without previous search. The Inquisition, he tells us, was by no means so strict as it proved afterwards, and every here and there people might learn the new religion. Then breaking out into that which we imagine is a denouncement of letters in general, "See," he exclaims, "what are the fruits of leisure and of idleness! how readily do they teach all evil matters, of which the wages is repentance."

It was in vain that Paul IV., who received with delight intelligence of the first vigorous commencement of this quarrel, extolled the king's piety, and the self-sacrifice which he had offered up. "What," said the pontiff, kindling with his theme, and snuffing the fumes of an approaching Holocaust, "what is fitting on such occasions but to leap on the neck of the criminal, and to burn him alive on the spot!" The royal ambassador, to whom these words were addressed, humbly represented that justice in France did not travel with footsteps thus rapid, especially when the fate of one so illustrious as D'Andelot was to be decided. Meantime, the wiles of the tempter were put in force, instead of the fires of the executioner. Ruse, confessor to the king, a doctor fully accomplished in the logic of the Sorbonne, (as his name might seem to imply, if we were inclined to play upon it,) was instructed to wind himself into the confidence of the prisoner, and to sap that firmness which despised all menace and repelled every open attack. The tears of a beloved wife and the remonstrances of the admiral, who earnestly adjured his brother to dissemble, after his own manner, till the arrival of a better season, at length prevailed, and D'Andelot so far yielded as to permit the celebration of Mass in his cell. The gates of the prison were thrown open to him immediately on the conclusion of that service; but never did his high-toned spirit cease to reproach itself with that which it regarded as a weak, guilty, and dishonourable compliance. This lenity of the king disconcerted and irritated the bigoted Romanists; and not long afterwards, when the parliament brought the suspended process against the corrupt Judge Musnier to conclusion, and condemned him on the clearest evidence to the pillory and to banishment, the populace, attributing his sentence to the zeal which he had recently testified in prosecuting the reformed unto death, rose in a body when he was brought out for punishment, and prevented its execution. Two similar tumults soon afterwards occurred; in one a thief was rescued from the gallows because he was a Romanist; in the other, a miserable Calvinist was, in like manner, torn from the hands of the magistrates—not that his life might be preserved, but that he might expire under the protracted agonies inflicted by a ferocious rabble.

Yet even in these moments of great peril, while the madness of the people was raging, while the kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers took counsel together against the reformed, the Calvinists of France had sufficient wisdom to provide for the unity of their church by drawing up a confession of faith and canons of discipline. Animated by holy courage, and confident in God, they convoked their first national synod for those purposes, in the metropolis of the kingdom, and at the very doors of the court. Over this memorable assembly, which commenced on the 20th of May, 1559, and continued its session till the 28th of the same month, Francis de Morel, Sieur de Callonges, presided, assisted by the deputies of eleven churches. A confession was promulgated, consisting of XV. distinct articles, in which the following particulars are some of the most important. The canon of the Scripture agrees with that admitted by the church of England, and the Apocryphal books, although not mentioned by name, are alluded to much after the manner of our own VIth article. (Art. IV.) The Apostles' creed, together with the Nicene and Athanasian creeds, are allowed "because they be agreeable to the word of God." (Art. V.) The Trinity in Unity, the distinction of the three Persons, the begetting of the Son, and the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son jointly, are declared to be taught by Scripture. (Art. VI.) The perplexed question of free will is discreetly avoided, and the doctrine of God's Providence is treated in cautious and sensible language. (Art. VIII.) An acknowledgment of the creation of Adam pure and upright, conformably to God's image; of his fall and consequent entire corruption (Art. IX.); of the burthen of original sin thus entailed upon his offspring (Art. X.); "so that even the choicest of God's Saints, although they do resist it, yet are they defiled with very many sins and offences so long as they live in this world" (Art. XI.); leads the way to the following account of election. "We believe that out of this general corruption and condemnation in which all men are plunged, God doth deliver them whom He hath in his eternal and unchangeable counsel chosen, of His mere goodness and mercy, through our Lord Jesus Christ, without any consideration of their works, leaving the rest in their sins and damnable estate, that He may show forth in them His justice, as in the elect He doth most illustriously declare the riches of His mercy. For one is no better than another until such time as God doth make the difference, according to His unchangeable purpose, which He hath determined in Jesus Christ before the creation of the world. Nor can any one by his own power procure unto himself so great a blessing; because we cannot by nature, nor of ourselves, excite in ourselves any one good motion, thought, or affection, until such time as God does prevent and incline us to it by His grace." (Art. XII.) Christ alone requisite to salvation (Art. XIII.); the union of God and man in His person in opposition to the diabolical imagination of Servetus (Art. XIV.); justification by faith; and the abandonment of all human merit, are next unequivocally professed (Art. XX.) All mediation but that of Christ is peremptorily rejected (Art. XXIV.); the nature of our Lord is examined (Arts. XXV., XXVI., XXVII.); and the claims of Rome to the title of a true church, are summarily dismissed; "yet nevertheless, because there is yet some small track of a church in the Papacy, and that baptism, as to its substance, hath been still continued; and because the efficacy of baptism doth not depend upon him who doth administer it, we confess that they which are there baptized do not need a second baptism. In the meanwhile, because of the corruptions which are mingled with the administration of that sacrament, no man can present his children to be baptized in that church without polluting of his conscience." (Art. XXVIII.) The Calvinistic platform is then affirmed to agree with "that discipline which the Lord Jesus has established." (Art. XXIX.) The equality of all churches is asserted (Art. XXX.); and, in the articles which succeed, a faint apology is offered for the breach of Apostolical succession into which Geneva is said to have been compulsorily driven. (Art. XXXI.) Then, after an explanation of the sacraments, the confession terminates with the following articles on political obedience;—articles which it might be thought would render any government, however suspicious, confident of the fidelity, the submissiveness, and the desire to seek peace which must have animated the breast of every one who subscribed the document in which they were contained.

"We believe that God will have the world to be ruled by laws and civil government, that there may be some sort of bridles by which the unruly lusts of the world may be restrained; and, that therefore, he appointed kingdoms, commonwealths, and other kinds of principalities, whether hereditary or otherwise. And not that alone, but also whatsoever pertaineth to the ministration of justice, whereof he avoucheth himself the Author; therefore, hath he even delivered the sword into the magistrate's hand, so that sins committed against both the tables of God's law, not only against the second but the first also, may be suppressed. And therefore, because God is the author of this order, we must not only suffer magistrates whom He hath set over us, but we must also give them all honour and reverence, as unto His officers and lieutenants, which have received their commission from Him to exercise so lawful and sacred a function." (Art. XXXIX.)

"Therefore, we affirm that obedience must be yielded unto their laws and statutes, that tribute must be paid to them, taxes and all other duties, and that we must bear the yoke of subjection with a free and willing mind, although the magistrates be infidels: so that the sovereign government of God be preserved entire. Wherefore we detest all those who do reject the higher powers, and would bring in a community and confusion of goods, and subvert the course of justice." (Art. XL.)

On the canons of discipline it is not requisite that we should dwell; they regulate the appointment of church officers according to the well-known general Calvinistic model: and, in those articles which regard the laity, they occasionally exhibit somewhat of that spirit of encroachment on private rights and personal liberty of action which distinguishes all sects derived from the fountain of Geneva. Thus ministers and all other members of the church are forbidden from "printing their own, or other works concerning religion, or in any wise publishing them till they have first communicated them unto two, or more, of the Gospel, of unspotted reputation." (Art. XXVIII.) "The faithful whose yoke-fellows are convict of adultery, shall be advised to reconcile themselves with them; but in case of refusal, that liberty they have by the word of God shall be declared to them. However none of the churches shall dissolve the marriage, lest they should intrench upon the authority of the civil magistrate." (Art. XXXVII.) "No person may contract marriage without the consent of parents; but in case parents should be so unreasonable as to refuse their consent to such a holy and needful ordinance, the consistory shall advise what is to be done herein." (Art. XXXVIII.) "Promises of marriage once made cannot be dissolved, no, not by mutual consent of the parties who have past those promises to each other; and the consistory of that church where those persons are members, shall judge of the lawfulness of those promises." (Art. XXXIX.)

In the decisions of the synod upon the cases of conscience submitted to it, we meet the same prudent and peaceable deference to rulers and the powers that be, which characterize the articles already cited. "Our brother of St. John D'Angley demanding, whether the faithful might lawfully suffer their children's names to be recorded in the registers of Popish priests? It was answered, that because it was a civil ordinance of his majesty, the ministers and consistories should specially observe the design and end of him that doth it, and admonish him that he be very careful lest thereby he be taken for a Papist." (Art. VIII.) "As to what was proposed by our brother of St. Lo, we answer, that notwithstanding the Popish priests do unjustly claim a right to tithes upon the account of their ministry, yet they must be paid, because of the king's commandment, as a matter in itself indifferent, and that sedition and scandal may be avoided." (Art. XVI.) Well would it be if the Quakers had profited by the lesson afforded them in this last decision of the wiser Calvinists, and had learned to avoid the silly and troublesome subterfuge by which they elude the direct payment of government dues!

CHAPTER III.

Dissensions in the Parliament of Paris—The Mercuriales—Presence of the King—Speeches of Dufaur and Dubourg—Their arrest—Process against Dubourg—His condemnation—Death of Henry II.—Supplication of the Reformed to Catherine de Medicis—Dubourg's appeal—His firmness—Denouncements of the Reformed—Assassination of Minart—Execution of Dubourg—Outrages in Paris—Weakness of the King of Navarre—The Prince of Condé avows his conversion—Calvinistic doctrine of Passive obedience—Its sophistical resolution—Condé becomes virtual Chief of the Reformed—La Renaudie—The King's journey to Blois—Frightful reports preceding it.

THIS solemn meeting of the reformed, and the provisions for organization which emanated from it, could not have occurred more seasonably; for a blow was about to be struck which, but for the strength derived from union, might have proved fatal. Among the several chambers of the parliament of Paris, little agreement existed relative to the punishment of heretics. The grand chamber invariably condemned to the flames the delinquents cited before its tribunal; the court called La Tournelle, on the other hand, was not less anxious to discover subterfuges by which means of escape might be opened. On one occasion, four students of irreproachable life and morals, but zealous Calvinists, having been condemned to death by the inferior courts, appealed to the Tournelle. The president, eager to avoid a confirmation of the horrible sentence, and having failed to procure from the culprits any disavowal of the charge, warned them to be cautious and reserved in answering the interrogatories which he was about to propose. He then questioned them on many doctrinal points in which but slight shades of difference existed between the Reformed and the Romanists; and, finally, as the most trying point of all, he inquired their opinion of the real presence in the eucharist. Placed on their guard by his previous advice, the prisoners contented themselves with replying that they admitted a real presence, without proceeding to explain the distinction between the corporal presence of the Papists and the symbolical presence of Calvin. The major part of the judges appeared satisfied; the court would have broken up, and the former sentence would have been reversed, if one member, more difficult than his brethren, had not asked whether the culprits were willing to assist at Mass. They answered unhesitatingly in the negative; and the president foreseeing that if they were called upon to state their reasons they must be utterly lost, demanded their explanation in writing, and gave them twenty-four hours to prepare it. Even this merciful artifice, however, was wholly unavailing. The accused, preferring integrity of conscience to life purchased by apostasy, shook off the proffered clemency as though it were pollution; and their answer when presented to the court at its next meeting was found to contain one of the bitterest invectives against the Mass which had hitherto appeared. Nevertheless, even with this unexpected document before them, the judges persevered in mercy. They decreed that the law had pronounced capital punishment against those Sacramentarians only who denied the real presence; that the pain of death therefore did not extend to the prisoners who had admitted that doctrine; and that their offence being no more than a want of reverence for the Mass, banishment would be a sufficient penalty.

The prisoners were accordingly released, happy in their exile; but the public voice loudly condemned this new interpretation of the law. The very existence of such a crime as heresy, it said, was abolished by the recent sentence; Zuinglius, Bucer, Œcolampadius, nay, even Calvin himself, might now propagate his blasphemies with impunity; all former executions on account of religion were rendered manifestly unjust; and the magistrates who had pronounced capital sentence must be stigmatized as murderers of the innocent. This dissension between the two chambers was represented to the king as utterly destructive of the foundations of all jurisprudence; if one judge pronounced that to be criminal which another affirmed to be innocent, of what avail was any code of law? Where was the security of either the government or the governed? or what man of any degree or condition possessed a sure rule of life whereby his course might be regulated? Some of the councillors, it was artfully stated, were themselves tainted with the heresy, the propagators of which they absolved; and the king, at the approaching assembly of the next Mercuriales, might have a favourable opportunity of receiving conviction to that effect by the testimony of his own ears. A censorship, it appears, had long existed, the members of which assembled on a Wednesday (Dies Mercurii) at an interval of every three months; when the presidents of the two chambers, and of the several courts emanating from them, and a deputation from the councillors, met together with the attorney-general and the king's advocate, to review the public and private conduct of the several magistrates; to bring it, if necessary, before the cognizance of the whole parliament, and there to institute legal proceedings against offending members. It was on the 10th of June that the sitting of the ensuing Mercuriales occurred; and a debate then commenced on the recent sentences, and on the general treatment of the reformed. In this discussion, much heat and violence were exhibited, and purposely fomented by the president Le Maistre, a zealous Romanist. At a moment in which the irritation of the conflicting speakers appeared at its height, the king, as had been preconcerted, accompanied by the Bourbon princes, the cardinals of Lorraine and Guise, the dukes of Guise and Montmorency, and a powerful armed escort, unexpectedly entered the hall of assembly; and having taken his seat, addressed the members. He had heard, he said, that his faithful councillors were occupied in debates upon the best means of suppressing religious troubles; and, wishing to profit by their deliberations, upon a subject on which he felt much doubt, he now commanded them to proceed.

If the first sudden apparition of royalty and the numerous guards who surrounded the chamber had alarmed the members favourable to the new doctrine, consciousness of integrity soon reassured them; and, for the most part, they continued to express their opinions with their customary freedom. Louis Dufaur, a distinguished advocate, argued that religious differences were assuredly the principal cause of the existing peril and calamity; but that the first step towards remedy ought to be a solemn inquiry as to the side to which the chief blame was attributable; lest the question of the Prophet to the unrighteous Ahab might be applied in this instance also, "Art Thou he that troublest Israel?"* Anne Dubourg, an ecclesiastic, next opened an elaborate apology for the general principles of the Reformation. Having first thanked the King for his resolution to probe this question to its core, and to act according to the rules of justice, he remarked that many crying sins, blasphemy, perjury, uncleanness, and adultery, stalked abroad in noon-day, unabashed and unpunished; while new and unheard-of penalties were devised against men who, guilty of no crime, raised the torch of Scripture, to discover by its light the corruptions of Rome. He then urged the necessity of a general council, which might purge the church of its manifold abuses; and he noticed the artifices by which each succeeding Pope had eluded the oath administered at his election, binding him immediately to convoke such an assembly. "While the pontiffs are thus faithless, and while kings occupied in projects of ambition are negligent of spiritual interests, a few courageous men," continued the fervid orator, "have taken this great work in hand; founding the goodly edifice which they seek to compact, on the word of God delivered in the holy volume, and on the discipline of the primitive fathers in the first three centuries of the church. How praiseworthy is the enterprise! how inappreciable the blessings to be derived from it if it be faithfully executed! and yet, Christendom, for the most part, has arrayed itself against this labour of love while yet in its cradle, by edicts, ordinances, and proscriptions; by terror of punishment and menaces of extermination; forgetful that the Father of all Truth has emancipated the soul of man from the sword of the tyrant, and that a well-grounded opinion can never be destroyed, except by the superior weight of an opposite opinion more consonant with reason. God forbid that France should persist in following the insane example of Germany! If she does so, the land will be fouled by massacre and carnage; defaced by butchery and scaffolds; blackened by the smoke of persecuting flames; and, after all these horrors, we shall be eager to retrace every step which we have trodden in blood." In conclusion, he advised the King to employ his utmost efforts for the convention of a general council; and if he failed in that attempt, at least to assemble within his own dominions the most pious and enlightened divines, who, by their joint labours, under his own vigilant control, might consummate a salutary Reform; meantime that all suits for religious offences should be suspended. This bold declaration was followed by some more cautious speeches from other members, who sought to extenuate the merciful decision of the courts on account of particular facts in the cases brought before them; and the debate was closed by a fiery harangue from the first president, Le Maistre, breathing the spirit of Torquemada himself; extolling the pious energy of Philippe Auguste, who, in a single day, ordered six hundred Albigenses to be burned in his own presence; and recommending the persecutions renewed from time to time against the Vaudois, as examples adapted to the existing state of religion in France.

At the end of the session, the King observed, with an angry tone, that he now clearly perceived the truth of those reports which informed him that his parliament contained members who despised both the regal and the pontifical authority. Few as they were, they disgraced the whole body to which they belonged; and they should find, to their cost, that they were heaping destruction on their own heads. Then turning to Montgomery, the commander of the Scotch guard, he ordered him to arrest Dufaur and Dubourg as the most obnoxious delinquents. Soldiers were also despatched to seize in their own houses six other members, three of whom, by a timely warning, escaped. This unprecedented act of despotism was variously received according to the bias of men's opinions; the Pope and the zealous Romanists extolled it as manifesting a holy vigour and a firm devotion to the cause of God, as worthy in all respects of the Most Christian King, and the Eldest Son of the Church. But the more sober-minded perceived in it a violation of liberty; a breach of the law by him who ought to be the law's principal guardian and conservator; a curtailment of freedom of debate; a degradation of the character of the parliament; a sullying of the royal dignity. All these great errors conjoined, were esteemed perilous and portentous auguries of future trouble.

* It need scarcely be remarked, that this is not the question of Elijah to Ahab, but of Ahab to Elijah, (1 Kings xviii. 17.) We give it, however, as it is reported in the Mém. de Condé, by De Thou, and afterwards by Garnier.

The King, nevertheless, pressed on judicial proceedings, and swore in his wrath that the criminals should be burned under his own eyes. The Protestant princes of Germany employed their intercession uselessly; their envoys were treated with cold civility, and dismissed with general expressions that their masters should receive abundant satisfaction. Within nine days from the arrest of Dubourg, against whom especial vengeance was meditated, his judges were named and his trial commenced. He demurred to the authority of the court, and asserted his privilege as a councillor, not to be tried for a capital offence unless by the whole assembled parliament. A fresh breach of law deprived him of this right, and the King appointed a commission, before which, if Dubourg persisted in his refusal to plead, he was to be reputed as already condemned. The prisoner, having first entered his protest against this new violation of liberty, answered the interrogatories concerning his faith so as to lead to full conviction that it was unsound. Without requiring farther evidence, the Archbishop of Paris pronounced him a heretic, degraded him from his order, and delivered him over to the secular arm. An appeal still lay to the Archbishop of Sens, and of this, Dubourg availed himself, with what success we shall perceive hereafter.

Two days after this judgment had been passed, the lance of Montgomery terminated Henry's designs of vengeance. De Thou mentions a report, (but without either sanctioning or contradicting it,) that the King, when raised from the fatal lists in order to be conveyed to the palace, looked back at the Bastile, and expressed a fear that he had wronged the innocent councillors then confined within its walls. But a voice was ready at his ear to dispel this salutary remorse; and the Cardinal of Lorraine, ill-concealing his anger, whispered that such a misgiving must be prompted by the Father of Lies, the enemy of the human race; and exhorted the dying Prince to be watchful against his seductions, and to persevere in faith unto the end. It was into the hands of the wily Prelate, who thus dried up the healing waters of charity when they first sought issue from the bosom of his dying sovereign, and into those of his brother, the Duke of Guise, the two bitterest enemies of the Reformed cause, that the new king, Francis II., implicitly resigned himself immediately on his accession.

The Commission instituted to take cognizance of the process against Dubourg had expired with Henry, and it was fondly hoped by the Reformed that it would not be renewed. Francis II., imbecile both in mind and body, seemed unlikely to assume the character of a persecutor; and a prince yet a novice to the sceptre, and but just folded in the mantle of royalty, might be thought reluctant to stain the festivities of his coronation by a deed of blood. It can little be wondered also, in the excited state of feeling which marked the times, that an impression had spread abroad, if not originating with the Sacramentarians, assuredly encouraged by them, that the disastrous fate of Henry had been the result of an especial interposition of Providence. It was to the charge of Montgomery that he had consigned Dubourg as prisoner; it was the spear of Montgomery which inflicted his death-wound; he had vowed that Dubourg should burn under his own eyes; it was in the eye that he had received the mortal thrust; and Dubourg, from the windows of the Bastile, might view the jousts celebrated in the Rue St. Antoine. Futile and frivolous as these petty coincidences appear to cooler minds in calmer moments, they were not without their weight when first remarked; and it was therefore with no slight surprise that the Protestants heard, on the third day after the accession of Francis, that the Cardinal of Lorraine had issued a new commission to the former judges; that the Archbishop of Sens had confirmed the sentence of his Brother Prelate of Paris; and that nothing more remained to the prisoner but to endeavour to obtain his right of submitting a last and most unpromising appeal to the whole assembled Parliament.

When we call to mind those events which have made the queen mother, Catherine de Medicis, a by-word and an abomination in history, we cannot learn without astonishment that she was the personage upon whom the Reformed Church of Paris placed hope in this their destitution. But Catherine had not yet displayed herself in those colours of blood by which she is "incarnadined" to all posterity. During the life of her husband, the late king, she had cultivated with seeming affection the society of the Dame de Roye (mother of the Princess de Condé) and that of the Admiral Coligny, both known supporters of the Reformed interests. She had even, it was said, apparently lent a favourable ear to some of the Calvinistic preachers; and it could not be doubted that, at the present moment, she felt little complacency towards the Guises, who sought to engross the whole powers of Government, to diminish her natural rights, and to frustrate her parental influence over a son whom she had hoped, on account of his weakness, to retain in perpetual minority. To the Queen Mother, therefore, the French Reformed addressed their supplication. "The pity and the good will," thus commenced the simple-hearted petitioners, "which your Majesty has ever deigned to manifest towards our cause, have long taught us to regard you as a second Esther."—Alas! there was another Queen, not in Shushan but in Israel, who threatened the lives of the Prophets of the Lord, and slew innocent men, and whose witchcrafts were many, to whom she might have been more fittingly likened! They then assured her that in their religious service, besides the customary prayer for the prosperity of the King, they had always used a particular one for herself, entreating that God would be pleased to preserve and to enlighten her by his law; they urged also that it was her privilege, as mother of the King, to rescue the guiltless from destruction, and to prevent her son from imitating, in the very outset of his reign, those atrocities which had recently called down the vengeance of Heaven upon her husband and his most unhappy kingdom. The tears of Catherine were ever ready at command, and they plenteously bedewed this memorial. She then returned it with an assurance that no exertions which might contribute to their object should be wanting on her part; and in the mean time she advised them to employ more than ordinary caution, and not to heighten the present irritation by publicly celebrating their worship, or by congregating in numerous assemblies. Furthermore, she commissioned the Admiral to procure for her a conference with the most discreet of the Parisian Reformed ministers; and named the day of the Sacre, at Rheims, as that on which it might take place with the least fear of attracting public notice. A minister was accordingly introduced to her closet at the appointed time, but other unexpected calls wore away the day, and the conference was postponed.

Dubourg himself, meanwhile, skilfully profited by every expedient which the law afforded to procure delay, and his demurrers were one by one examined and overruled. Unable to obtain a general assembly of the chambers, he shamed his enemies into granting permission that he might be heard by counsel, and might also challenge the judges of his final appeal. Two were named by him at the moment in court, the third he begged leave to mention in writing; and when pressed upon this point, and ordered to declare himself instantly, having first apologized for the discourtesy which he was thus most reluctantly obliged to commit, he boldly protested against the judgment of the Cardinal of Lorraine, his most grievous enemy, and the author and fountain of all his persecutions. This avowal was unexpected; but the Cardinal, far too experienced a politician to betray his mortification, mildly disclaimed enmity against the prisoner, and voluntarily withdrew. Merillac, the distinguished advocate assigned for the defence, was sufficiently acquainted with the temper of the court to know that, without some show of relaxation on the part of the accused from the severity of his principles, his cause was desperate. He first, therefore, arranged a written confession of faith, so generally and ambiguously expressed, that Dubourg might sign and the judges accept it with equally clear consciences. Then, obtaining a promise from his client, that he would remain silent, and surrender himself altogether to the line of defence selected by his advocate, after an exordium on the illustrious birth of the prisoner, who was nephew of a chancellor of France, his great acquirements, his rare modesty, his primitive virtues, and his excellence as a magistrate; he pointed out the numerous illegalities of the process from its very commencement, and when Dubourg naturally expected that in the peroration an annulment of all the proceedings would be demanded, he was astonished by hearing an appeal to the mercy of the King and the sympathy of the judges; an avowal of indiscretion in having too freely expressed opinions both in the Royal presence, and in his answers to the interrogatories of the Archbishop of Paris; and an admission that he had been deceived by some religious impostors pretending to extraordinary purity. "But the delusion," continued Merillac, "has passed away; the prisoner, sincerely attached to the laws of his country, and submitting to the powers authorized by God, acknowledges his fault, and throws himself on the indulgence of the tribunal." Then, on his making a private signal to those of the judges who were known to be favourable, and with whom the scheme had been preconcerted, the court rose; and Dubourg was reconducted to his cell without an opportunity of addressing it.

By this friendly stratagem Dubourg would have been saved, if his noble spirit could have brooked the preservation of life by tacit acquiescence in falsehood. Calling for ink and paper on his return to prison, he wrote a peremptory disavowal of Merillac's statement of his repentance, and transmitted it forthwith to the Parliament. He then addressed a Circular Letter to the Protestant Churches, in order to counteract the impression which he feared might be entertained that the frequency of his appeals was prompted by any weakness of the flesh, any clinging to life, any shrinking from the fiery trial that awaited him. The legal forms, he said, of which he had taken advantage, abuses as they were, were abuses authorized by the Constitution. Had he consulted his own feelings, he would long since have been at rest, and in the enjoyment of his Crown of Martrydom; but he owed it to himself, to his Brethren, to his Faith, and to his God, to seek time, in order to give every possible publicity to the doctrines which he maintained; and not by any rash act of over-fervid zeal, to encounter the guilt of accelerating that death which in good season he should confront without fear. His friends again addressed themselves to Catherine, stating that they had complied with her advice, and had either discontinued their meetings or had held them in secrecy, but that persecution, notwithstanding, had waxed fierce. For themselves, they could continue to promise obedience; but they warned the Queen that there was a numerous body of men, not absolutely professed Reformers, but inwardly disgusted with the tyranny of Rome, who, if this nefarious process were persisted in, would infallibly have recourse to dangerous extremities. · Catherine was too high-couraged to read a threat like this without indignation. "Do they menace me?" she exclaimed, "do they think to make me fear?—Patience, patience! matters have not yet come to such a point as they imagine." The Admiral and Madame de Roye pacified her anger; and she then declared, that whatever compassion she might have exhibited towards the Reformed when under suffering, was no more than womanly pity and natural sympathy for the unfortunate, and not to be interpreted as approbation of their tenets. How indeed could she decide respecting doctrines upon which she was wholly uninformed? Doubtless, when she heard of persons encountering an agonizing death with joy, and in the midst of torments blessing God for the testimony which He graciously permitted them to manifest, it was scarcely possible not to suspect that their doctrines were more than of men. On that account she wished much to converse with one of their teachers; and having heard reports of the great learning and piety of a certain Minister among them, Anthony de Chandieu, a young man of very ancient family, she earnestly desired the Admiral to bring him to her privately. Coligny was well versed in the real temper of the profound dissembler who thought to deceive him by this mockery; and far from endangering one of the chief hopes and most shining lights of the French Reformation by entanglement in her deadly coils, he prevailed upon Chandieu to withdraw from Paris; and in his stead he submitted a written Confession of Faith and Canons of Discipline to the examination of the Queen Mother.

The patience of the Sacramentarians was at length exhausted; they renewed their meetings with more than accustomed freedom; and with a pardonable indiscretion, they gave vent to irritated feelings by a deluge of satirical brochures, weapons now becoming of common use in this warfare. The Guises in return employed an engine less keen in edge perhaps, but far more weighty and powerful. They issued an Ordinance condemning every house proved to have harboured an assembly of Protestants to be razed to the ground, even if it belonged to an owner resident at a distance, or to a religious community; for every landlord, it was argued, ought to be responsible for the orderly conduct of his tenants. The Fauxbourg St. Germain, or as it was then called in derision, La petite Genève, was the chief resort of the Sacramentarians; and numerous acts of pillage and violence were then perpetrated under colour of this edict. Instant flight and abandonment of home and property were the only means by which the wretched inhabitants, if warned of the approach of the officers of justice, could hope to preserve liberty, perhaps life; and not the least piteous result of this cruel persecution were the throngs of children, too young to be removed, who, raising their little hands to the passers by, asked with tears for their parents, for food, for shelter, and protection. Alas! cold, hunger, and destitution for the most part terminated the sufferings of these innocents. No friendly hand dared to offer succour, lest suspicion of heresy should bring down on itself misery similar to that which it had ventured to relieve.

The rich harvest reaped by informers contributed not a little to increase the number of denouncements, and some apostates who had been dismissed from Protestant congregations for robbing the alms-chest, and who were well acquainted with the chief meeting-houses, betrayed them, Judas-like, to the police. This example was followed by two runaway apprentices, seeking revenge for some just chastisement inflicted by their masters. These youths, accurately instructed beforehand in their tale, laid hideous depositions before the President St. Andrè and his colleagues. They had been introduced by their masters, as they affirmed, to several Protestant Meetings in the house of an Advocate named Trouilles, in the Place Maubert. One of those assemblies was held on the eve of Good Friday, when after hearing a sermon, a large company of both sexes partook of a sucking pig, dressed in mockery of the Paschal Lamb. This supper being concluded, the lamps were extinguished, and orgies commenced under the foul veil of darkness, equally detestable with those which history has recorded of the Roman Bacchanalia, or which the dreams of a grotesque Fancy have invented in later times, as fitting accompaniments of the Satanic Sabbath on the Walpurgisnacht. The daughters of the host were personally recognized by the deponents as sharers in this scene of licentious horror; and although on cross-examination the witnesses betrayed inconsistencies sufficient to discredit their whole story, the magistrates affected belief, and took no small pains to publish the odious details of their confession. Even in the concealment into which the calumniated ladies had been driven, they were pursued by this utter blasting of their good fame; and feeling that life was nothing worth if honour were destroyed, they presented themselves before the magistrates, and demanded and underwent a test of purity, more satisfactory indeed in its appeal to reason than the ordeal of elder times, but one from which the sensitiveness of female delicacy must have recoiled with ten thousand-fold more apprehension than even from the glowing ploughshares. The imputation of dishonour was distinctly removed, but the deeper and more damning stain of heresy remained; and the maidens, notwithstanding their surrender had been voluntary, continued to be rigorously imprisoned, and were daily menaced with delivery to the flames.

Other circumstances, besides the increased irritation against the Reformed excited by these false rumours, contributed to accelerate the catastrophe of Dubourg. In the Bastile, he was used with extraordinary rigour, deprived of all intercourse with his friends, fed upon bread and water, and occasionally enclosed in one of those iron cages, the invention of which is attributed to the detestable ingenuity of a favourite of Louis XI. The sole recreation permitted to him was his lute, on which he accompanied himself while singing Marot's psalms. His friends, more anxious than himself for his preservation, arranged a plan for escape, which was discovered by an untoward accident; and the assassination of one who had distinguished himself greatly in forwarding his prosecution was affirmed to have been perpetrated with his privity. Minart, one of the presidents, a man of loose habits and factious principles, from which many causes of private enmity might arise, was shot in the streets, while returning in the evening from the Parliament to his own home. Robert Stuart, a Scotch adventurer, professing the Reformed principles, was suspected of the murder; and it was remembered that Dubourg had warned the deceased, not long before, that unless he voluntarily absented himself from the trial, he would assuredly be prevented by compulsion. The menace might be, and from Dubourg's character probably was, no more than a general assertion of God's justice; but its fulfilment convinced one party that he who delivered it was prophetically inspired, the other, that he was cognizant of the intended murder. Rumours of a general conspiracy soon floated abroad; a fate similar to that of Minart was said to be destined for the other obnoxious Judges; the city was to be fired in many quarters at once, and, during the general confusion, the Conciergerie was to be forced and the prisoners were to be released.

The obvious remedy for these dangers, if they were real, and the fittest sedative for the general panic, even if they were not so, seemed to be the speedy removal of the chief cause of popular excitement; and three days, therefore, after the assassination of Minart, Dubourg was brought into court and received sentence of immediate execution. He listened, says De Thou, who transcribes his very words from the public registers, without one sign of fear; pardoning his judges, whom he believed to have decided according to their consciences, although not according to knowledge and the true wisdom of God. Addressing himself in the end with somewhat more of emotion to the court, he added, "Quench at length the fires which you have kindled, and turn unto God with a penitent heart and mind, that your sins may be blotted out and forgiven. Let the wicked man turn away from his wickedness, and leave off to do perversely, and acquaint himself with the Lord, and the Lord will have mercy! For you, my brother councillors, farewell and prosper! and think without ceasing in God and of God. For myself, I go cheerfully to death." So fearful were the authorities of any attempted rescue, that besides stationing a large armed force in various parts of the city, they erected gibbets and piled faggots on each of the many spots on which their victims had heretofore suffered, in order by uncertainty to distract attention from the real scene of execution. Dubourg mounted the tumbril with alacrity, and was conducted under a strong escort to the Grêve; where, having warned the spectators that he did not die there ignominiously like a malefactor, but because he adhered to the Gospel, he calmly laid aside his cloak and doublet without assistance; and while the executioner prepared to strangle him before committal to the flames, the last words heard from his lips were, "Father abandon me not, neither will I abandon Thee!" Thus perished in his thirty-eighth year, Anne Dubourg, a man of rare talents, and yet rarer integrity; loved, wept, and honoured even by many of those who differed from him most widely in religion. His constancy in death, says the historian cited above, so embittered and so confirmed the adherents to his own creed, that from his ashes sprang that rank growth of revolts and conspiracies which long and heavily overran this once most flourishing kingdom.

Whether sated for awhile by the perpetration of this great crime, or whether, as is most likely, alarmed by the threatening aspect of the reformed on the one hand, and of the now unmanageable fury of the populace of the capital on the other, the government but languidly pursued the suits against the other councillors who had been arrested together with Dubourg; and they were released, after undergoing various degrees of lighter punishment. Meanwhile, the most frightful outrages disgraced the streets of Paris, and the search for heretics was made a pretext for almost general brigandage. In every public thoroughfare, and at the corners of the chief streets, small images of the Virgin, or of some Saint, were erected, beneath which lighted tapers were placed on a table dressed as an altar. The dregs of the canaille, the rabble-priests of these mock shrines, sang hymns and celebrated a profane worship before them; and fiercely besetting every careless or scornful passenger who neglected or refused to pay his devotions to their idol, dragged him before the magistrates as a Sacramentarian. To defray the expense of tapers, they carried about with them a small box called tire-lire; and bold indeed was any one who refused to contribute to its contents: blows, insults, and perhaps the most protracted and horrible of all deaths, that which is inflicted by the hands of a savage and desperate mob, were the price of his rashness. Nor were they the reformed only who were thus exposed to extortion; the soundest Romanist, provided he were known to be rich, was an equally attractive quarry with the most notorious heretic, and the fragrance of the odour of booty exhaled alike from both religions. The cry of Lutheran or Christandin when once raised, whether truly or falsely, drew thousands to the chase; and the denounced individual, hunted down like some dog whom the voice of the multitude has proclaimed to be rabid, was never quitted till his death and plunder glutted the ferocity and the avarice of his bloody pursuers.

The reformed, although constituting a large body in the state, had been regarded hitherto solely as religious dissidents; but they were now about to assume a more important and formidable political character. The king of Navarre, as first prince of the blood royal, had, without doubt, paramount claim to a principal share in the administration during the minority of Francis II.; and he accordingly made his appearance at court early after that monarch's accession; having first given out among the Protestants that one of his chief objects in visiting the capital, was to demand liberty of conscience on their behalf. But it was the policy of the Guises to estrange from the young king and probable competitor for that power which they wished to be exclusively their own; and the exalted station of the king of Navarre, weak and undecided as he was, might render him a dangerous rival. They so contrived, therefore, that his reception should be cold and bordering upon affront. Certain distinctions due to his rank were purposely withheld; no provision was made for lodging him within the palace; the king addressed only a few and distant words to his uncle, and did not summon him to the council-board. These slights, however, failed to disturb the placid spirit of this most easy prince; and, in order to remove him, at least for a time, from the circle of domestic politics, the Guises offered a charge which he could hardly refuse, without that open rupture which he sedulously avoided,—the conveyance of the reluctant Elizabeth of Valois to her Spanish bridegroom, afterwards Philip II. Little, however, was the profit which they derived from thus displaying to the reformed the pusillanimity, vacillation, and indecision of the prince whom they had hitherto considered as their virtual leader; for a successor of widely different qualities was now substituted in his place. Under a person but scantily indebted to nature for external advantages, and an appearance of carelessness and frivolity, Louis, prince of Condé, nourished an ardent, intrepid, lofty, and indomitable spirit. Schooled in war, although hitherto confined to subaltern appointments, he had exhibited talents for military combination not less brilliant than his personal courage; and without private revenues, and excluded from the favours of the court, he had learned those lessons of self-denial and active exertion, of which necessity is ever the great teacher. One cruel mortification to which the Guises had exposed him was a mission on an expensive embassy without adequate appointments; a second was the refusal of the government of Picardy, resigned by the admiral Coligny, with the express object of obtaining the succession for his friend and kinsman. These and many other affronts, the hopelessness of success in any public career, while the Guises retained power, the zealous urgency of his princess and her mother the Dame de Roye, the stings of disappointment, the hopes of ambition, the desire of revenge, decided him to embrace communion with a sect actuated indeed by motives widely different from his own, yet desirous, like himself, to effect a change in the government. Rapid in all his movements, resolute when he had decided, impatient of disguise, and prompt to action, he at once avowed his conversion to Protestantism; and named a place and day for conference with some of the chief delegates of the reformed, in order that he might offer himself for that supremacy among them which his brother had thrown away.

Notwithstanding their sufferings and persecutions, it was much rather a strong and nervous guidance of power which the reformed needed, than the elements of power itself. From Boulogne to Bayonne, from Brest to Metz, France now teemed with proselytes to the new doctrine; men accustomed to danger, bold, zealous, constant, and unshrinking, bound by strong ties among themselves, and maintaining unbroken correspondence with the Swiss cantons and the German princes. Give them but a competent chief, show them once but a fitting head, and the several members were fully prepared to unite in meeting force by force, and to demand, probably to extort, enfranchisement from the oppression under which they now chafed with impatience. One difficulty, indeed, interposed itself between them and the possession of their final object. How was the liberty which they coveted to be won, except by open resistance to government? and how was open resistance to be reconciled with that passive obedience which Calvin had preached, and themselves had adopted as a fundamental principle of their creed? The removal of this obstacle appears to have formed the chief subject of debate at Ferte, in Champagne, the spot on his own estate at which Condé first met the reformed deputies. By Condé himself—a soldier bred in camps, a recent proselyte, not so much to opinions as to a party, little knowing, and probably less regarding, those matters which he considered to be mere subtleties of polemical disputation—such an objection would have been easily resolved; he would have unsheathed the sword, and have cut the knot at a single stroke. But it was far otherwise with the personages whom he had chosen as associates. Whatever step they adopted must accord with the avowed doctrines of their church; and no certainty of advantage, no conviction of policy, could be allowed to supercede the solemn fiat of religion. They were not content to extricate themselves from scruples by some specious and cunning subterfuge, but they referred grave and weighty doubts to the decision of stern and unbending conscience. Their proceedings, therefore, were necessarily tardy and deliberate. They drew up hypothetical cases and submitted them to divines and civilians; and the result was, as in similar cases it ever will be, an example of, if we may so term it, the necessary continuity of error; a proof that if man once begins his course from a wrong starting place, he requires some new fallacy at every step of his progress. The infusion of a single false principle may stagnate the life-blood of truth for uncounted generations. South has somewhere said, "every great villainy is like a great absurdity, drawing after it a numerous train of homogeneous consequences."

Calvin had formally affirmed that no outrage upon human liberty, however grievous, if committed by rulers acting under divine right, might be forcibly resisted by a Christian man; in other words, he had preached up that extravagant doctrine with which our own English pulpits sometimes resounded before the principles of the revolution were understood and established. Were the reigning prince a second Nero, Domitian, or Caligula, the faithful, it was said, were bound to obey, even as the apostles had obeyed. It was not possible, therefore, that the French reformed could oppose the king; but they raised a question concerning the king's majority; they argued, that from his extreme youth he had no power of governing for himself—that the Guises had usurped all authority from him—and that against those tyrants, for the deliverance of the king, every means of attack was lawful. "Religion," says the writer of the Apologie Chrestienne, one of the tracts which this occasion produced, "Religion, and every received law of humanity, commands subjects to take up arms for their prince whenever he is oppressed; for the preservation of law, and for the protection of their country." It was useless to reply that the king had passed his 16th year; that the term of royal majority was unfixed by the French law; but that precedents, for the most part, had settled it at fourteen; that Francis had been considered old enough, even during his father's life-time, to enter into marriage; and that his nearest advisers, and those by whom his government was administered, were the queen dowager his mother, and the uncles of the queen his consort. These plain and unanswerable facts melted into air before the responses by which the Calvinistic pastors and lawyers sanctioned insurrection; and a large body of pure, upright, honest, sincere, and single-minded men (no men ever more fully deserved those epithets), either not having sufficient wisdom to descry, or sufficient moral courage to abandon their original error, sophistically reconciled themselves to its theoretical maintenance, together with its practical violation, gave the advantage in argument to their enemies, and supported the better cause on the worse principles.

The prince of Condé was unanimously recognized as chief of the enterprise now meditated, but policy required the concealment of his participation till the moment of execution. The open conduct of it was, therefore, entrusted to Geoffry du Barre, Sieur de la Renaudie or la Forêt; a gentleman of opulent and ancient family in Perigaud, who felt himself cruelly aggrieved by a decree of the courts in a suit concerning a patrimonial benefice. The Romanist historians tax him openly with perjury during this cause; but from the honesty of De Thou, we learn that he was far less to be blamed than pitied; that advantage had been taken of some mistake, for which he was subjected both to a heavy fine and to banishment; and that during a long exile he had contracted intimacy with many of his countrymen, seeking the free exercise of their religion at Lausanne and Geneva. Renaudie was able, daring and active; fired with resentment for the injustice which he had suffered, and panting to wash away by some great deed the stain of his unmerited condemnation. No man, therefore, was better qualified for the bold and difficult task which he undertook. It seems as if about this time he had obtained a remission of his sentence, which enabled him to re-appear in France, and he profited by this liberty to traverse the provinces and to secure co-operation.

The languishing state of the king's health had induced the court physicians to recommend Blois as his winter and spring residence, and the most frightful rumours preceded his arrival in that city. His disease was affirmed to be leprosy, and the remedy prescribed for it was said to be a daily bath of infants' blood. Accordingly, when he approached his palace, it seemed as if the population had been desolated and swept away by pestilence or some great convulsion of nature. Every house was closed and barred; and no individuals were visible excepting a few agonized women flying hastily across the fields, clasping their babes to their bosoms, and when overtaken, dropping on their knees and imploring mercy for the innocents, with shrieks of horror and despair. Pretended emissaries from the royal household had recently collected in all the neighbouring villages exact lists of the numbers and ages of the children whom they contained; and mysterious hints had been purposely dropped, at the same time, of the dark purpose for which this catalogue was designed. The Guises attributed these horrible reports to the malcontents, and they succeeded in arresting one of their presumed agents; but the culprit, when submitted to the question, unexpectedly retorted upon his accusers; declared that he had acted under the orders of the cardinal of Lorraine; and that he had been instructed to circulate accounts of corruption of blood in all the members of the reigning family, in order that the crown might pass back from the descendants of the usurper Hugh Capet to the legitimate Carlovingians represented by the Guises. It is not possible to decide by which party this detestable artifice was really practised; but the charge of revolutionary designs, and of a wish to transfer the sceptre to their own line, thus raised against the Guises, proved a most useful weapon in the hands of their adversaries. In what manner they employed it, we shall perceive by and by.

CHAPTER IV.

Discovery of the proposed Rising—The King retires to Amboise—Death of La Renaudie and overthrow of the Conspirators—Accusation of Condé—Execution of the Baron de Castelnau—Death of the Chancellor Olivier—He is succeeded by De L'Hôpital—Edict of Romorantin—The Baker of Tours—Origin of the term Huguenot—Flight of Condé—Council at Fontainebleau—Memorial presented by the admiral—Speech of Montluc, Bishop of Valence—Of the Cardinal of Lorraine—The States-General summoned to Orleans—Offers of the Reformed to the King of Navarre—His Arrival at Orleans with Condé—Arrest of Condé—His Condemnation and Fortitude—Reputed design to assassinate the King of Navarre—Death of Francis II.

The unusual excitement which prevailed among the French refugees in Swisserland had not altogether escaped notice. Among the many whom La Renaudie was compelled to trust, some might be faithless, more, doubtless, were imprudent; yet although the Guises from time to time received advises that some great enterprise was under contemplation, they never attained a sufficiently distinct clue to enable them to unravel the intricacies of its labyrinth. The day of rising was already fixed for the 10th of March; five hundred mounted gentlemen, and about twelve hundred armed men on foot, were to concentrate themselves in the vicinity of Blois; and arrangements were made for the simultaneous occupation of the chief towns, and for arming the disaffected inhabitants throughout the Provinces; when by the faithlessness of Renaudie's host in Paris, Government received information of the secret, so far, at least, as the traitor himself was acquainted with it. Not a moment was to be lost in placing the king's person in security; and under pretence of a hunting party, the Court was immediately transferred from the open and unfortified town of Blois, to a castle in the neighbouring village of Amboise. Troops were then hastily assembled, and summonses addressed to the chief nobility to repair thither for the immediate protection of their sovereign. The keen penetration of the Guises at once perceived that some far greater influence than that possessed by La Renaudie, was the prime mover of the engine by which they were to be overthrown; and the discovery of the hidden soul of the enterprise was their next object. Of the Admiral they entertained great suspicions, and, indeed, much fear; and Catherine, who still maintained a close intimacy with him, was employed to resolve their doubts. Little can it be imagined that the Chastillons, now avowed Sacramentarians, and bosom-friends of Condé, had been denied his confidence; but, perhaps, they had cautiously avoided all open participation in the Conspiracy, and awaited the result before they declared their full intentions. Confident therefore in his own security, Coligny repaired to the closet of the Queen Dowager; protested unequivocal adhesion to the Court; pointed out the extreme danger of reducing to desperation so large a body as the Reformed now constituted; and suggested the issue of an edict annulling all persecutions for heresy already commenced, and forbidding the institution of any new suit for the future till after the assembly of a general council.

This advice, although most unpalatable to the Guises, was not to be declined when backed by the influence of Catherine and the exigence of the moment. The edict, therefore, was prepared, with little intention of its being ultimately observed; and with an exception of all those who under pretext of religion had conspired against the King, the Queens, the brothers of the King, the Princes of the blood or the chief ministers; an exception which must have gone far to render the ordinance a dead letter among those whom it was chiefly intended to propitiate. The gathering accordingly took place, on the 17th of March, a week after the day originally proposed; and Condé, faithful to his engagement, was among the first who arrived at the trysting place. As he entered the gates of the Castle of Amboise, the unusual number of sentinels and certain precautions in his reception convinced him that the plot was discovered and himself suspected; but, inwardly assured that he had not been personally denounced, he affected great indignation on hearing that there were traitors who dared to menace the King; and requested to have some post allotted to him, in which he might assist in defending the castle. This offer of service could not be declined, but due care was taken, by placing him under vigilant observation, to frustrate any attempt at escape.

Disappointed in their hopes of surprise, it is no wonder that the conspirators failed. In the affray which ensued, La Renaudie was killed; most of his followers were gibbeted on the spot, or thrown into the Loire and drowned; and the Baron of Castelnau de Chalosse, and a few other of the chiefs who surrendered on an assurance of being permitted to offer a representation of their grievances at the foot of the throne, were detained close prisoners. Among the captured was La Bigne, La Renaudie's secretary; from whom torture wrung a key to the cypher in which his late master's papers were written, a revelation of the objects of the conspiracy, and an account of its details, perhaps greatly exaggerated. That the death of the Guises was intended can scarcely be doubted; but it requires more trust-worthy evidence than that of a renegade confessing under terror of death, to produce a belief that a prince of the blood, and that Prince Louis of Condé, could design the murder of the King, and of the King's brothers, and of the two Queens, the abolition of Monarchy, and the establishment of a republic on the Swiss model. Nevertheless, of a project thus atrocious La Bigne did not hesitate to declare that the Prince of Condé was leader.

Plain as was this denouncement, it was not thought sufficient to warrant any judicial proceeding of so grave a character as the capital arraignment of a prince of the blood. Even if La Bigne's accusation should be supported by La Renaudie's documents, the latter might have employed Condé's name without authority, in order to strengthen his party; and the Duke of Guise, therefore, discreetly recommended that unless much stronger evidence could be obtained all show of misgiving should be suppressed. The King, however, declared his suspicions openly to Condé's face, and forbad his departure from Amboise. The Prince in return demanded an inquiry; defended himself in full council; and at the conclusion of a speech marked with great vehemence, protested that if there were any man in the whole world bold enough to maintain an accusation against him, he would at that very moment lay aside all the privileges of his exalted rank, and meet him sword to sword in the lists, to prove him a liar and a recreant. The glance of defiance at the Duke of Guise which accompanied these last words could not be mistaken; and the whole assembly imagined that the challenge was about to be accepted when that nobleman rose to reply. On the contrary, however, he avowed with consummate dissimulation his conviction that the Prince was by no means called upon to rebut the charges of a few miserable criminals, seeking to extenuate their own guilt by the implication of illustrious names. "So firmly, indeed," he added, "am I convinced of the Prince of Condé's innocence, that if an accuser should appear, I tender my services as second to the challenger."

With the Baron de Castelnau, the most distinguished among the prisoners both by rank and personal merit, equal moderation was deemed unnecessary. He had surrendered on the faith of a compact for personal security, attested by the signature of the Duke de Nemours; and the perverted morals of the age are remarkably exhibited in that nobleman's subsequent conduct. When he learned that it was the intention of the court to put the prisoner on his trial, he expressed bitter regret. "The document," he exclaimed, "is signed; my name is affixed to it in writing; if there were no more than word of mouth against me, I might easily give the lie to any one who reproached me with its violation!" and this pseudo-principle of honour, which placed guilt not in the commission but in the discovery of wrong, has found an admirer in the writer by whom it is recorded!

In spite of the solemn agreement on which he had relied, Castelnau was subjected to an interrogatory, and threatened with the question. For a moment he hesitated and was silent, and the Duke of Guise taunted him with fear. "Fear!" were the noble words in answer, "I by no means deny it; what man is there among you, unless he be destitute of all feeling, who could be wholly free from such an emotion, if he found himself bound hand and foot, and tossed to the mercy of his most implacable enemies, thirsting to drink his blood! But give me back my sword, and then venture upon your taunt; or change places with me, and answer whether every limb in your body would not tremble! That natural feeling with which you reproach me, through God's aid, however, shall by no means impair the judgment and presence of mind which are necessary for my defence." And never, during a long and trying examination, was clearer self-possession or more tranquil courage manifested, than that which he continued to display. The Chancellor Olivier, the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal of Lorraine, each in turn was silenced by some keen and searching rebuke. When the first of these expressed somewhat of contemptuous surprise, that the prisoner, once a man of far different pursuits, should have become so profound a Theologian as he then exhibited himself, Castelnau reminded him of a conversation which had occurred between them not very long before. "When I visited you on my return from imprisonment in Flanders, and you inquired in what manner I had employed the tedious hours of my captivity, I replied that I had studied the Holy Scriptures, and acquainted myself with the controversies then agitating men's spirits. You approved my course, you dissipated what scruples I still retained, and we mutually agreed. How happens it that one of us since that time has so greatly changed his opinions that now we are unable to understand each other? I will supply your answer. Then you were in disgrace, and spoke in the sincerity of your heart; now you are the wretched eye-servant of court favour, and in order to please a man who probably despises you, you betray your God and your conscience." The Cardinal of Lorraine hastened to the assistance of his embarrassed colleague, and while claiming to himself the merit of having confirmed him in Romanism, he dropped some unguarded expression which made Castelnau appeal to the Duke of Guise. The Duke in reply disavowed all acquaintance with polemics. "Would that it were otherwise!" said the Baron in conclusion; "for so far do I esteem you, that I dare pledge myself that were you in possession of equal light with that which has fallen to the share of your brother, you would employ it to far better purpose."

Castelnau, and four other captains, were led to instant execution; the last who received the fatal stroke, Briquemont de Villemonges, dipped his hands in the blood of his slaughtered comrades before he kneeled at the block, and then raising them to Heaven, exclaimed, "Father, behold the blood of thy children! Thou wilt avenge it." The whole court witnessed the tragical spectacle. The King's brothers—yet children—the two queens and their attendant ladies, were stationed in a gallery of the castle which commanded a view of the scaffold; and the only person who shrank from the sight of horror was Anne d'Esté, mother of the Guises, who rushed to her own chamber, prophesying that vengeance must fall ere long on the heads of her own sons. The Prince of Condé, himself, was compelled to be present; and, notwithstanding the spies by whom he knew he was surrounded, expressions of pity and indignation burst from his lips. The Chancellor Olivier, who always inclined to mercy, but had shown himself timid and temporizing, overwhelmed with self-reproach at having shared in the destruction of these brave men, by his want of firmness in resisting the Guises, fell into a profound melancholy, which was succeeded by an acute fever. The Cardinal of Lorraine visited him while in his last agonies, but Olivier recoiled from the sight, turned his face to the wall, and expired.*

By the influence of queen Catherine, the high vacant dignity was filled by Michael de L'Hôpital, the greatest Chancellor ever known to France, as he is justly described by a contemporary. To his wise and humane opposition, the general voice of History attributes the failure of a project entertained at that moment, to establish the Inquisition in France. In order to counteract that nefarious design he was compelled to yield assent to the promulgation of a decree, known, from the place at which it was dated, as the Edict of Romorantin. This severe ordinance transferred all cognizance of heretics from the civil courts to the jurisdiction of the bishops; and by proposing large rewards, encouraged informers in their denunciations. All assemblies of the Reformed were prohibited, under penalties similar to those inflicted on high treason; and so assured did the president, Le Maître, feel of their inextricable entanglement in the net of law that he used to exclaim with delight, "We shall hang them for sedition and strangle them for heresy." The King, meanwhile, wrote a long account of the conspiracy to the King of Navarre,† denouncing the wretched heretics, who, under the cloak of religion and the pretence of succouring and delivering him, had attempted the overthow of his authority. He then noticed, that in the King of Navarre's own Government there were numerous preachers and ministers of Geneva wandering up and down; and among them two, named Boye Normande and David, who the prisoners had confessed were most active in the work of seduction. He felt assured that his good uncle would use all diligence to arrest those traitors, in order that they might no longer abuse the simplicity of the populace. A notice of the accusations against the Prince of Condé followed; and of these the King expressed his entire disbelief, asserting that he was never better pleased and satisfied with him. In an autograph postscript, he repeated his earnest desire for the seizure of the above named ministers; stating, that the King of Navarre could not do him a greater kindness than by confining them in some place of security till they might be delivered up to his own hands, in order to receive the punishment which they so justly merited. This request was instigated by the Guises, for the express purpose of creating embarrassment. They well knew that Boye Normande and David were the two most distinguished ministers of the South, who were constantly entertained at the court of the King of Navarre, and even travelled in his company; and they calculated that his refusal to arrest them must increase the bad impression already entertained against him. The King, however, replied, that he was unacquainted with the present haunts of the delinquents; that he had despatched couriers in pursuit of them; and that, if they re-appeared in his dominions, their escape wôuld be difficult.

Three contemporary accounts of the conspiracy of Amboise were offered to the public. One was contained in an oration which the constable Montmorency was officially instructed to deliver before the parliament of Paris, a task of little honour, and executed with intentional negligence. He spoke of the transaction as a movement (emeute) which, although Government had been advised of it many months beforehand, might have proved dangerous to the King and royal family, but for the accidental presence of a number of brave and loyal gentlemen at the time of the explosion; he expressed his surprise that persons of base condition should have been permitted to fire some fifty shots at the gates of Amboise; and he added, that one and all of the prisoners protested their design to be levelled at other persons, by no means at the King. The Guises were not a little offended at the numerous insinuations contained in this speech. First, the mention of their long foreknowledge implied that they had neglected taking precautionary measures; secondly, the Prince of Condé and his friends were intended by the brave gentlemen who defeated the enterprise; and lastly, they were themselves the other persons ostentatiously exhibited as the chief cause of disaffection. In order to dissipate the prejudice which might be thus excited, they published, in a letter from the King to his parliament, a narrative declared to be authentic, and they carefully circulated it not only in France but through all the courts of Europe. Some persons, said this letter, have endeavoured by a false colouring to excuse this damnable and detestable rebellion, but here we will display the truth. The guilt is then divided between certain exiles for other crimes, who desired the subversion of a Government by which they had been justly punished, and the heretics who aimed at the establishment of a new religion. These persons had the adroitness to persuade their deluded followers that even princes fostered their design, and would eventually avow themselves its leaders. But the mercy of God, as by a miracle, discovered this odious project but a few days before its execution. After an attempted extenuation of the blood already poured out like water, accompanied by somewhat inconsistent menaces of future punishment, the King concluded by announcing his design of assembling, within six months, a synod of the Gallican church, for the more rigid establishment of ecclesiastical discipline. The third and last narrative was put forth by the Reformed. Like the speech of the Constable, it designates the conspiracy by the light name of Le Tumulte d'Amboise, and openly taxes the Guises with a design upon the Crown. The reader, whose object is truth, is thus furnished with more than ordinary means of discovering it by a diligent comparison of these conflicting statements.

On the appearance of a pestilential disorder at Amboise, the court soon transferred itself to Tours, where a ludicrous circumstance occasioned no small alarm to the Guises. A baker in one of the suburbs was much importuned by his only child, a boy of six or seven years of age, to give him a sight of the King's public entry, which was to be conducted with more than ordinary magnificence. The man being a humourist, and intending to amuse his child, mounted him on an ass, which he took from his mill and decorated with some of his wife's petticoats for housings. The boy was nearly naked, had his eyes bandaged, and wore on his head a wooden helmet, on the crest of which was fixed the figure of a red-headed parroquet, continually pecking at the child's skull. The ass was led by too youths coloured and habited as Moors. In this silly masquerade the jealous eye of political suspicion discovered an allusion to matters of high State mystery. The blinded boy was said to be the King, the red-headed bird who pecked him was the Cardinal of Lorraine, the Moors who guided his course at will represented foreign princes; and this far-fetched interpretation of an innocent and unmeaning folly obtained so much belief, that it was with difficulty the Royal Guard was restrained from sacking and pillaging the city which dared thus openly to manifest its disaffection. It was during this residence of the court in Tours that the term Huguenot first received the preference which it has ever since maintained as the distinguishing title of the French Reformed. To the derivation which we have before incidentally mentioned, one other may be added; an ancient gate in Tours had been named after a certain king, or Count Hugo, a contemporary of Charlemagne; and popular superstition asserted that the ghost of that personage rode on horseback, nightly, through the quarter of the city in which the gate was situated, and rudely handled every hapless passenger whom it chanced to encounter. It was in vaults in the neighbourhood of that gate that the Reformed chiefly assembled, and the name, at first bestowed in mockery on that account, was afterwards proudly adopted by them, in testimony of their loyal adherence to the line of Hugh Capet.

On the departure of the court to Tours, the Prince of Condé obtained permission to pay a short visit to his own estates. During his absence, having received information that the cardinal of Lorraine had collected much scattered evidence against him, and was resolute in pressing the institution of an impeachment, he proceeded to seek asylum in his brother's residence at Nerac, notwithstanding an express recall by the king. But the disaffection of the Huguenots, and their league with Condé, were not the only perplexities under which the Guises laboured. Public credit was almost annihilated, commerce and agriculture were equally depressed, and it was important that some financial remedy should be discovered, in order to replenish a wholly exhausted treasury. An assembly of the States-general was always hazardous, and to be resorted to only in extremity; even from the Notables danger might be apprehended in the present general ferment of party spirit; and the Guises, therefore, at length determined to seek relief from an Extraordinary Council, over which they might retain at least some degree of control, and which might answer the double purpose of obtaining supplies, and of placing the chief leaders of the malcontents within their power.* Accordingly, the princes of the blood, the great officers of the crown, the councillors of state, and a few other persons of high rank and importance, were summoned to meet at Fontainebleau. The king of Navarre and the prince of Condé, however, suspecting a stratagem, declined attendance, and Coligny, assembling his friends and retainers, appeared with a formidable escort of eight hundred horsemen. Emboldened by this support, on the opening of the council, he stept forward to the foot of the throne, and bending one knee, presented a memorial to the king. It was a petition from the inhabitants of Normandy, into whose discontents the admiral had been instructed to inquire. They protested their loyalty and obedience, and their readiness to furnish extraordinary supplies, if demanded by public exigency. At the same time they strongly asserted the right of full liberty of conscience; and since public assemblies for their worship had been hitherto prohibited, and their being compelled to meet in secrecy had given a handle for atrocious imputations, they now humbly supplicated his majesty to allow them churches and freedom of religious service. "This document," said Coligny, "was unsigned, and I at first refused to present it. Gain us but leave to meet, was the answer which I received, and in a single day you shall have 50,000 signatures!" "And I," retorted the duke of Guise, "will find 100,000, whom I myself will head, who shall sign the contrary with their own blood!"

* In the Hist. du Tumulte d'Amboise, it is said that Olivier expressed deep remorse for the execution of Dubourg; and that when the Cardinal of Lorraine approached his bedside, he called out in accents of terror, "Ha, Cardinal! tu nous faits tous damner!"—p. 328.

The unexpected boldness of this demand, and the appearance of menace with which it was accompanied, excited no small emotion in the council. The sittings continued during several days, and the most remarkable speech delivered in their course was that with which Montluc, bishop of Valence, as junior member, opened the debate. It is too long for entire insertion in our pages, but we translate the following striking passage, as a proof that not all the Romish clergy of those times denounced the great change in religion as productive of unmixed evil; but that there were some prelates among them who, even in the presence of their sovereign, and yet more, of so bigoted a persecutor as the cardinal of Lorraine, had sufficient wisdom, virtue, and courage, to assert general principles of toleration, to unmask the manifest abuses of their own church, and to proclaim the necessity for ecclesiastical reform.

"The doctrine, sire, which so many of your subjects have embraced, is not the hasty produce of three or four short days, but it has been ripening gradually during the course of thirty years; it is preached by many hundred ministers, diligent in their calling, skilled in letters, apparently of modest, grave, and holy manners, professing a detestation of all vices, especially of avarice, fearlessly surrendering their lives for the support of their principles, and ever bearing in their mouths the blessed name of Jesus Christ; a name of power, sufficient to unseal the dullest ear, and to soften the hardest heart. These preachers, moreover, sire, having found your people as sheep without the guidance of any shepherds, have been received with joy and listened to with avidity. You ask, perhaps, by what methods this new learning has been opposed? I will begin by his holiness the Pope, concerning whom, let me protest, that I intend to speak with no less honour and reverence than is his just due. Nevertheless, my conscience obliges me to deplore the calamity of these our times, in which we have seen Christendom assailed from without, distracted within, and convulsed by diversity of opinions; in which the Popes, careless of church discipline, have turned their whole attention to war, and fomented the quarrels of princes; in which the kings, your predecessors, have enacted sharp penal laws, with too hasty zeal, thus thinking to eradicate these opinions and to bind your people together in unity of faith. But they have been deceived in their hopes and frustrated in their designs. The ministers of justice have greatly abused these ordinances, executing them with evil speed, to gratify informers who have denounced the accused for the sake only of sharing in confiscation. The bishops, for the most part, have been indolent, not calling to mind with salutary fear that they must one day render account to God of the flocks committed to their charge. In good truth, their chief care has been directed, first, to the collection of their revenue, and afterwards to its expenditure in foolish, vicious, and scandalous toys; so that while the flame was blazing in their dioceses, more than forty bishops at a time have been idling in Paris. Add to this, that sees have been conferred on children, and on persons wholly ignorant, neither willing nor indeed able to perform their sacred duties. Alas! the eyes of the church have been bandaged, her pillars have been bowed down and are fallen! Is it to be wondered at that the sectarian ministers should remonstrate with those who lend them their ears, and should tell them that their guides have ceased to offer instruction, and to look to the good of their souls; that their priests, for the most part, are ignorant and avaricious, and have purchased their benefices simoniacally! At this very moment, in which we so much need a supply of men of zeal, knowledge, and virtue, send but your ducats to Rome and you will have a proportionable stock of priests in return. Every cardinal will have some cook or steward, some valet, barber, or lacquey, ready and gaping for a benefice, and prepared by avarice, ignorance, and debauchery, to increase the evil repute of our priesthood. These are the excellent methods which have been chosen to promote peace and unity in our church!"

Again, separating those among the Reformed, who made religion an excuse for political designs, from those who were sincere in their profession, he pleaded thus eloquently for the latter: "Others there are, sire, who have admitted this doctrine, and who maintain it with the true fear of God, and with due reverence for your majesty, against whom they would on no account offend. Look to their lives and to their deaths if you would inquire concerning the motives by which they are actuated! Observe their holy zeal, their vehement desire to find the one true way of salvation, and having found it, to abide therein, and to set at nought in comparison with it all loss of worldly goods, all deaths under the most excruciating torture! Yea, often as I call to mind any of those confessors who die thus constantly for their faith, every hair bristles on my head, and I mourn over our own misery, untouched as we are by any sense of God or of His religion. Surely those whom I describe should be carefully set apart from others who abuse their name, and should never be counted among the seditious. Even if my order and profession did not bind me to protest against the effusion of blood and the severity of criminal punishments in matters concerning faith, I would humbly urge you to look to experience in confirmation of my opinion. When in the history of the world did penal laws ever restrain the progress of religious doctrine? when, on the contrary, did not the patience of those who suffer under them raise unnumbered partizans to their cause? Many who would never have heard of the doctrine itself, when they see men die for it, resolve to search whether it be good or evil; and many having so searched, are prepared to die for it themselves, and to follow in the train of the martyrs who have gone before them."

These were plain truths which the Guises probably little expected to hear from the lips of a prelate. The admiral, in a following sitting, continued to urge the prayer of the Normans; and the general sentiments of the assembly inclined towards the convocation of the States-General, and also of a national synod, if the Pope could not be induced to proclaim a general council. The cardinal of Lorraine undertook to reply to Coligny in particular. The petitioners, he said, called themselves faithful subjects and servants of the king. If they were indeed so, it was nevertheless under a condition, sufficiently implied, although perhaps not openly expressed: namely, that the king would enroll himself among their sect, or at least would cease to oppose it. That to grant them the use of churches and the public exercise of their religion, was manifestly to approve their doctrine; a step which the king could not take without hazarding his salvation, and violating the solemn oath by which he was pledged to maintain the Catholic and Apostolic religion throughout his dominions; that as to the assembling of a council, whether general or national, he perceived neither its advantage nor its necessity; the king and the bishops jointly possessed sufficient power for the reformation (if any such were needed) of church discipline, and church doctrine was already fixed by many former councils on a basis not to be shaken. Was there indeed the slightest hope or the least appearance that those who chiefly clamoured for a council would submit to its decision, if one were obtained? Did they not seek to model it after their own fashion? that is, contrary to every received precedent of antiquity. And if their absurd pretensions were rejected (as no one could doubt that they would be rejected), would they not immediately declare, according to their custom, that they were sentenced without being heard, and that the Bishops were both judges and parties in the suit? The docility, the meekness, and the charity which animated these perfect Christians, these new Evangelicals, might, he said, be measured by the flood of libels in which they poured out the venom of calumny against those who displeased them. That, for his own part, having collected no less than two-and-twenty scandalous writings against his single self, he carefully preserved them as so many precious tokens of honour; so many choice patents of nobility; for he could not but esteem it as the greatest of all possible eulogies to have encountered the hatred of wretches thus wicked and perverse. For those who were deceived by their own ignorance and credulity, he entertained the most cordial pity; and since harsh measures had failed, he did not object to treat them with gentleness. Deeply indeed did he regret that they had been so long confounded with the really guilty; willingly, if he could remove the blindness of their eyes and reconcile them to the church, would he shed for their sakes his last drop of blood. He then, in conclusion, urged the necessity of taking extreme measures against all persons who carried arms in the provinces without permission from the king; recommended residence to the Bishops; and agreed to a convocation of the States-General.

* Davilla, whose leading fault is an affectation of intimate knowledge of secret motives, attributes both the council at Fontainebleau and the subsequent meeting of the States-General, entirely to the wish of the Guises to secure the persons of their enemies; and he thinks also that the prince of Condé, whose single destruction would have done more harm than good to their cause, was permitted to escape from Amboise as a stale, by which his colleagues might afterwards be more readily enticed into the snare (lib. ii. ad init.) In this statement there is perhaps not a little too much refinement.

The States-General were accordingly summoned to assemble at Meaux on the 10th of December; and a synod of Bishops was convened at Paris for the 20th of January following, provided the Pope did not beforehand proclaim a general council. Pius IV., however, alarmed at this vigorous step which appeared to threaten the suppression of his Annates and the re-establishment of the Pragmatic sanction, if not a schism equally formidable with that which had rent England from the spiritual dominion of Rome, hastened to declare that the long-expected general council would meet at Trent during the ensuing Easter. It was a similarly overpowering necessity which had compelled the Guises to consent to the assembling of the States-General. The late council at Fontainebleau had proved nugatory as to the provision of supplies; and new intimations of the restlessness and pertinacity with which Condé was pursuing his hostile designs, obtained by the seizure of papers on one of his emissaries, made them more than ever anxious, at all hazards, to secure his person. An attempt to surprise Lyons was traced to the machinations of the Bourbons, and wherever discontent arose, their agents were visible. The Guises foresaw that without risking an open breach with the king, Condé could not be so far guilty of disrespect as to neglect his citation to the most solemn of all national meetings; and if he were once again within their grasp, it would be their own fault if he were ever disentangled.

The directly opposite qualities of the two Bourbon princes tended, under these circumstances, to produce in each a similar determination; and the king of Navarre, prompted by his moral timidity, the prince of Condé by his fearlessness, respectively notified an intention of obeying the summons of the court. His pensions, his government, his vast possessions in various provinces, his principality of Bearne once already exposed to seizure, the remnant of his kingdom of Navarre upon which Spain was ever on the watch to make a stealthy spring,—all these were strong links to bind Antony to peace. The Huguenots indeed made splendid proffers of support, but could they realize these large promises? they were almost untried; they might ignorantly miscalculate or wilfully exaggerate their power; they were widely scattered; were they able at a given moment to form a junction by which they might usefully co-operate? The king on the other hand had a large and efficient army ready to move at a word; and if he called in the alliance of Madrid, no fate short of destruction could be anticipated from his anger. The Prince of Condé, of widely different temper, unclouded by apprehension of dangers yet to come, unappalled by those which were real and present, above all, immeasurably confident in his illustrious rank, at first refused to admit that any hazard existed; and when in the end he was forced to acknowledge that the step was in truth perilous, he generously declared that his own single stake of life was of little value, if weighed against the loss of life, wealth, and crown which his brother might encounter; and he resolved to partake his fortune, and to accompany him to the assembly.

Orleans was substituted for Meaux, which swarmed with Huguenots, as the city at which the States were to assemble; and measures having been taken to disarm the inhabitants, the king, heading a large body of troops, made a public entry, more intended to strike terror than to display magnificence, about the middle of October. The Bourbons, meantime, journeyed slowly from Bearne, and their route was carefully watched at every step of its progress. Theodore Beza accompanied them to Nerac, and thence, travelling by night, and not without danger, returned home to Geneva. More than once the king of Navarre's resolution failed; and when arrived at Muerdon, in Perigaud, he counterfeited illness, and wrote excuses to Catherine. Ashamed, or reassured, he proceeded on to Limoges, where he found eight hundred gentlemen of distinction, each accompanied by an armed suite, who tendered their personal services; offered six thousand infantry, already raised in Poitou and la Santonge; the assurance of four thousand more from Provence and Languedoc; and of an equal number from Normandy. All these troops were to be subsidized by the Reformed churches for two months. Was it not more politic, they asked, at once to embrace the bolder part, by openly avowing himself their chief, than to place himself defenceless at the mercy of his enemies, with no other guarantee than the word of a faithless woman? But the blood of Antony flowed in too dull and equable a current to partake of the generous warmth which animated his suitors. He coldly promised that if the court thought to molest them for having thus contravened its last orders, by appearing in arms, he would make it his business to plead their cause. Human patience could scarcely be expected to endure a reply so little in accordance with their present excited feelings. "It is your cause, Monseigneur, not ours," was the parting remark of one of these brave gentlemen, "which will require your attention; you will soon enough have need of an advocate. For ourselves we have still our swords; and since our natural leaders abandon us, we must look elsewhere for others!"

But notwithstanding every warning, the princes moved on as if stricken with judicial blindness. The princess of Condé, tenderly attached to her husband, and warned from sources which did not admit of doubt, wrote with her own hand, by a confidential messenger, that he was lost if he entered Orleans. The brothers treated her alarm either as visionary, or as excited by a stratagem of the Guises, seeking to make them disobey the royal mandate. Soon afterwards they were met by an officer, who signified, with some rudeness, on the part of the king, that they must travel only on the high roads, and not enter any fortified town. They asked for his orders, but his instructions had been only verbal, and the king of Navarre, instead of resisting them, a second time feigned sickness, took to his bed, and remonstrated with Catherine, who, of course, disavowed the prohibition. Fresh warnings of intended treachery poured in from friends of the princess, who exhorted them to instant flight, and promised men, money and fortresses, if they would but hasten to Normandy. But it was now almost too late for the attempt—another day rendered escape impossible. Two hundred lances and six hundred foot soldiers awaited them at Poitiers, as a pretended guard of honour. Surrounded by this formidable escort, they were hurried on to Orleans, where the great gates of the palace remained barred and unopened at their approach. The king of Navarre was at length admitted on horseback, but the prince alighted in the street, and was compelled to gain entrance through a wicket. No attendant was waiting to receive them; as they traversed the royal apartments, sentinels met their eyes at every step; and few of the courtiers saluted or even recognized them. In the audience chamber, the king, attended by the duke of Guise and the cardinal of Lorraine, heard their compliments with a distant air, and motioned them to accompany him to the closet of the queen mother. Catherine uttered a shriek, and burst into tears at their entrance; and the king, sternly addressing Condé, stated that he was accused of treason, and must justify himself. When the prince, with an unmoved countenance, expressed his readiness to rebut every calumny which might be advanced against him. "It is right," said the king, "that you should be heard in your defence;" and then ordering two captains of his body-guard to place the prince under arrest, quitted the chamber. Condé was transferred to a house prepared beforehand for his confinement, in which the windows were strongly barred, and many of the doors had been walled up; in front, also, was a bastion planted with artillery, and commanding the three streets by which it was approached. All communication with his brother, and even with his wife, unless in the presence of witnesses, was strictly forbidden. Numerous arrests followed his own; and among them that of his mother-in-law, the dame du Roye, a woman of high spirit, who, in her confidential intercourse with the queen mother, had not concealed her aversion from the Guises, and who had consequently excited suspicion. The king of Navarre, although not formally arrested, was placed under the most vigilant surveillance; and he encountered the bitter mortification of being compelled to solicit the cardinal of Lorraine, and of finding his entreaties received with haughty coldness. The queen mother preserved a strict and ominous silence, and when the princess of Condé threw herself at the king's feet, she was sternly informed that justice must take its course.

Commissioners, selected from the parliament of Paris, were instructed to arrange Condé's accusation without delay; and their president was Christopher de Thou, father of the historian. Turning to him, on his first interrogatory, Condé expressed surprise that he, "the most knowing of all the round caps in the kingdom," should be ignorant that a prince of the blood could not be tried otherwise than by the king in person, assisted by the other princes, the peers of France, and the whole parliament; he therefore protested, in this and all following stages, against their proceedings. His objection was overruled; and by a threat that he should be condemned without farther process, if he persisted in refusing to plead, he was prevailed upon to commit his defence to the two bold and able counsellors who had before advocated the cause of the persecuted Dubourg. A few additional commissioners were named by the king to swell the ambiguous and illegal court before which the cause was to be heard. The prince, who confined himself to rebutting the charge of participation in the conspiracy of Amboise, and in the more recent attempt at Lyons, made an open admission of his religion: and upon evidence, which probably was distinct and clear, notwithstanding the general iniquity of the mock trial, he was pronounced guilty and adjudged to lose his head. De Thou states his belief,—upon the authority of his father, from whose lips, he says, he had often heard the fact,—that the judges, when compelled by the proofs before them to deliver this sentence, were nevertheless so conscious of their own want of legitimate authority, and so opposed to the bloody violence of the predominating faction, that they minuted, but never actually signed the decree. Unhappily, the registers of the parliament disprove this assertion, which it were to be wished had been true. It is believed, however, that the chancellor de l'Hôpital, and Guillard de Mortier, one of the councillors of state, delayed their signatures till the latest possible day, in the hope of gaining time and of reversing the sentence; and a single aged nobleman, Louis de Beuil, Comte de Sancerre, refused, even to the end, any attestation of his own disgrace. Although a sincere Romanist, and a personal friend of the Guises, he did not hesitate to speak plainly to the king when pressed to compliance. "Any other service which your majesty may command shall be performed while there is life in my body. But I will rather place my head beneath the axe of the executioner, than bequeath as a heritage to my children the infamy of reading their father's name subscribed to a capital sentence against a prince whose descendants may one day become their kings." The cardinal of Lorraine represented Sancerre as fallen into dotage; Francis himself was inexorable; and the 10th of December, the day on which the States-General were to be opened, was fixed for the execution.

The fortitude of Condé increased with his increasing peril; and the menace of approaching death seemed but to confirm his lofty spirit in its inflexibility. A priest was sent to his chamber to perform mass; and the prince dismissed him before he could commence the service, with a remark that he had come to Orleans for very different purposes. A gentleman of distinguished birth, long admitted to his familiarity, but latterly engaged under the Guises, basely permitted himself to be employed as their agent, to discover the real state of the prisoner's mind. Having expressed his deep sympathy and regret, he ventured to hint at accommodation with his great enemies, to which he offered himself as mediator. The prince listened without interruption till he had concluded, then taxed him with his preconcerted mission, and desired him to reply, that the sole accommodation to which he could ever consent must be made at the sword's point. The king of Navarre, on the contrary, lived in perpetual terror. Rumours of intended assassination were hourly poured into his ears; at one time he was to be poisoned at a banquet; at another to be shot during a hunting party; at a third to be stabbed by the hand of the king himself. It has been said, indeed, that he was absolutely enticed for that purpose to the king's bed-chamber; that having twice uselessly declined the treacherous summons, he went forewarned of his intended murder, and resolved to sell his life most dearly; that the Guises were in attendance; the cardinal of Lorraine barred the door immediately on his entrance, and the king addressed him rudely with the intention of provoking an indignant answer. The king of Navarre, however, replied with gentleness; and Francis, either unable to fasten upon him the blame of a quarrel, or staggered by his unexpected and meek demeanour, rose and quitted the chamber without fulfilling his bloody purpose; the duke of Guise, as he passed, remarking, "Never was there so great a poltroon!"[*]

November was fast approaching to its close, and the fate of Condé appeared irrevocably sealed, when the king was attacked with alarming symptoms, and his probable demise at once changed the whole position of the court. The Guises, indeed, would gladly have hurried Condé to the scaffold, and have commenced an impeachment of the king of Navarre while Francis was yet alive. But it was by no means the interest of the queen mother to strengthen their hands, already far too powerful; and if in the ensuing reign of her second and infant son Charles, she might hope to recover any of the influence which had been wrested from her in the present, her object could be compassed only by preserving a more equable balance of parties. The counsels also of the sincere and upright De L'Hôpital, upon which she fortunately threw herself in these difficulties, materially aided the cause of the princes. Temporizing, therefore, with that dissimulation of which she had so consummate a mastery, she assured the Guises that she considered their interests identified with her own, and that it was necessary for all their sakes that they should be reconciled to the Bourbons; while at the same time, she so far worked upon the fears of the king of Navarre as to prevail upon him to renounce his claim to the sole regency, during the approaching minority. Then, prompting his part also to her dying son, she obtained from his docility an avowal, in the presence of the yet hostile parties and of numerous witnesses, that whatever steps had been taken against the prince of Condé originated entirely from himself, and were pursued contrary to the advice of the duke of Guise and the cardinal of Lorraine. False as all parties must have believed or known that declaration to be, it was considered sufficient to warrant an exchange of professions of future amity between the late deadly enemies; and Francis, having witnessed this reconciliation, expired on the 5th of December, but five days before that morning which he had determined should be the last of Condé's existence.

Charles IX. was in his eleventh year when called to the throne by this unexpected demise of his brother; and the chief apprehension of Catherine, on succeeding to the full authority which she had thus dexterously obtained during his minority, arose from the approaching meeting of the States-General. Notwithstanding every precaution, a numerous body of Huguenots must be found among the deputies, and their proceedings before the conspiracy of Amboise had sufficiently evinced their determination to make the regency depend upon constitutional election. If they predominated, therefore, in the ensuing assembly, she foresaw that her power would be at an end, and that all authority would be transferred to the Bourbon brothers. When the Three Estates met on the appointed 13th of December, the cardinal of Lorraine earnestly wished, on many accounts, to be elected orator for the ecclesiastical chamber. At all times prompt to display the eloquence which he was conscious of possessing, he now more than ever desired to show that, although no longer minister, he still retained his former personal consideration. But in this hope he was disappointed. The nobles and the Tiers-Etat coldly declined the proposition of the clergy by fixing upon Jean Quentin, Professor of Canon Law and deputy from the University of Paris; and never was an important office less discreetly bestowed. Quentin's speech teemed with bitterness against the Reformed; he urged the King to exterminate by fire and sword "those rebellious inventors of novel and execrable Sacraments;" and among the historical precedents from which he said that salutary advice might be derived, he pointed especially to an incident in the reign of the Emperor Arcadius. Under that prince, Gairas, master General of the Forces, projected the overthrow of the Throne, and in order to compass his design, leagued with the Arians; "a sect," exclaimed the Professor, "truly identical with the modern pretended Reformed." One of the requests of Gairas was for permission to appropriate a Church in Constantinople, in which, together with his sectarian brethren, he might celebrate service; and when the patriarch Chrysostom peremptorily refused assent, the traitor threw off the masque and perished miserably in his rebellion.

[*] Garnier, xiv. 577, relates this story on the authority of La Planche, without, however, attaching much credit to it. The king of Navarre, before obeying the summons, instructed Ranti, one of his attendants, in whom he placed much confidence, to preserve his bloody shirt, if he should be murdered, and to request the queen, his consort, to show it to their son, whenever he was of sufficient age to become his avenger. De Thou, xxvi. 5, writes much to the same purpose, and dismisses the whole matter as doubtful: ut vera ac certa minimè affirmaverim.

This passage in Quentin's speech excited no small movement in the Chamber. It was scarcely possible to suppose that he had not intended to establish a parallel between the Byzantine insurgent and Coligny; and, indeed, the points of resemblance, as he had exhibited them, were confessedly numerous. Not to mention the similarity of sound between Gairas and Gaspard, the office of Master-general of the forces, was akin to that held by the Admiral; and the demand of a church in Constantinople brought to mind the petition which Coligny had presented at the Council of Fontainebleau, praying that the nobles might erect meeting-houses for the Reformed on their own estates. The attack was resented accordingly; the Admiral made strong representations of the personal affront which he had endured, and the Huguenot nobles demanded the erasure from the acts of the Assembly of all those offensive passages in which they had been stigmatized as Libertines, Gnostics, Montanists, or Arians, and their religion confounded with almost every former heresy by which Christendom had been distracted. After no small delay and discussion, it was agreed that, before the close of the sitting, Quentin should declare that in his first speech he had not meditated any personal allusion. The unhappy orator, overwhelmed by songs, satires, lampoons, and epigrams, and deeply suffering under the humiliation of offering a disavowal to which no one attached credit, died of chagrin, within a few months after he had filled the office most esteemed and coveted by his ecclesiastical brethren.

Before the last day's sitting, however, a memorial of unusual boldness was presented by a deputation of Huguenot ministers, whom the King of Navarre introduced to the young monarch in his council-chamber. It spoke of their disappointment at the course pursued by the States-General, in whose Assembly the wickedness of certain powerful individuals had, contrary to all equity, deprived them of their just hopes, by imposing silence on every matter which concerned religion. It characterized Quentin by the untranslatable title of "Ce beau Latiniseur du Clergé," who had imprudently prohibited the King from receiving, and the Lords of the Council from presenting any request in their behalf. It urged the King not to listen to calumnies against the best and soundest portion of his subjects; to suspend the processes to which they were daily exposed in courts of law; to consider the absurdity of persecuting Christians who acknowledged one gospel and one creed, while he tolerated Jews and Mohammedans; and to grant his brethren in the faith as much liberty in a Christian land as they would find in the dominions of the Sultan. After declaring the unalterable loyalty of the petitioners, it concluded with a prayer that they might be allowed to assemble, without arms, at whatever places and times the King might please to specify, under the inspection of any officers whom he might appoint to observe their transactions. The memorial was received, but it was stated that its heads required deliberation, and its discussion was therefore postponed to a more convenient season.

The disorders of the Revenue had by no means been corrected by this futile meeting of the States-General; and that body having been declared incompetent to its task, in consequence of the death of the late King, was summoned to assemble at Melun, after a fresh election of deputies, in the course of the ensuing May. Anterior to that meeting, the Huguenots held their second synod. Poitiers was the spot selected for their discussions; and there a strong memorial was drawn up to be laid before the Council of Deputies on their first sitting, urging the establishment of a legitimate regency, as the only means of obtaining a satisfactory answer to the requests tendered at Orleans, by the King of Navarre. The articles of discipline agreed upon by the first synod at Paris were corrected and enlarged in a few unimportant points; and in these canons the austere spirit of Calvinism once or twice exhibited itself in petulant hostility to innocent amusements. "All consistories," it is said, "shall be admonished by their ministers, that they do strictly forbid all dancing, mummeries, and tricks of jugglers" (Art. xi.); and among the "Particular matters" propounded as cases of conscience, "upon mature deliberation, it is decreed that whoso professeth a trade of dancing, and hath been divers times admonished, and doth not quit it, shall be excommunicated." We read with far greater pleasure an article conceived in a generous spirit of charity, that "all violent and injurious words against the Papists, as also against their chaplains, priests, and monks, shall not only be foreborne, but to the utmost of the church's power shall be suppressed" (General Matters, viii). Some delicate points relative to promises of marriage were discussed; and the nice scruples by which the Reformed allowed themselves to be perplexed are sufficiently evinced by the last question to which their pastors are entreated to reply. "May he be admitted to communicate in the bread only at the Lord's table who hath an antipathy to wine?"—"Yes he may, provided that he do his utmost to drink of the cup; but in case he cannot, he shall make a protestation of his antipathy." (xxxi).

The memorial concerning the Regency was plainly the chief object for which this otherwise unimportant synod had been convened; and coupled with the release of the Prince of Condé, which occurred about the same time, it occasioned some extraordinary political revolutions at court. On the moment of the demise of the late king, Catherine had announced to Condé that he was free; but the high-minded Prince considering it a point of honour not to owe his liberty to the accident of the King's dissolution, renewed his protest against the illegality of all the proceedings in his case; demanded a solemn arrêt in his favour, authenticated by the parliament of Paris; and until his innocence was thus formally established remained a voluntary prisoner. The arrêt was obtained after some formal and technical delays, and Condé, on his return to the capital, found his party very greatly strengthened. The Electoral States, composed principally of Huguenots, recommended the exclusion of the Guises, as being foreigners, from the royal councils; and Catherine found herself obliged, if she hoped to retain even partial authority, to proclaim the King of Navarre lieutenant-general of the kingdom. But the States had not confined their declaration to this single matter; they had adverted to the crown debts, and had urged the resumption of the extravagant donations which the prodigality of Henry II. had lavished on his favourites, among whom the Constable was particularized by name. This invidious denouncement completed the alienation of Montmorency from the Reformed; and the bitterness of spirit which the affront awakened, no less than a real community of interests, determined him to lay aside the jealousy which had long separated him from the Guises. Their union was completed by the mediatory influence of a third party, the Maréchal de St. André; who having tasted, perhaps more than any other, of the inconsiderate bounty of Henry, had stronger reasons also than others for opposing the projected restitution of plunder. St. André—"a true Lucullus," as he is elegantly termed by the accommodating charity of Brantome, or, as he is characterized by the more homely indignation of the Historian of the French Reformed Churches, "a man altogether surrendered to gluttony and to its consequent vices, and from the original poverty of his family not having wherewithal to furnish his pleasures"—had, by dint of talent, courage, and agreeable manners, risen, almost in youth, from the post of First Gentleman of the Bedchamber to the envied dignity of Maréchal of France. By Henry II., he had been employed on various important and honourable missions; and among them was one to England, when he conveyed to Edward VI. the collar of the Order of St. Michael, and was presented in return for his Royal Master and for himself with that of the Garter. For these and other services he had been enriched both by the private largesses of Henry, and also by numerous confiscations of the estates of persons banished on account of religion. The restitution of this wealth, indeed, if demanded, was impossible; it had been shared in part with the royal favourite, the Duchess de Valentinois, in part scattered in profuse and inordinate luxury; in the embellishments of a costly seat at Valéry surpassing in magnificence any of the royal palaces; and in the maintenance of a table, which, from its elaborate, and more than Apician science, appears to have been justly exposed to the sarcasm of Beza. But although unable to refund, St. André might be called to severe account for that which he had expended, and be stripped of all which he retained; and his most favourable chance of diverting the menaced storm appeared to be derived from an alliance of parties once violently opposed, but which now by his consummate knowledge of mankind he succeeded in uniting. This union of the Duke of Guise, the Constable, and the Maréchal de St. André is known in contemporary history by the name of the Triumvirate; a name probably bestowed by the Huguenots, in order to assimilate it both in character and in odium to the detestable confederacies so called in ancient Rome.

The reconciliation of the Constable with the Duke of Guise was soon a matter of notoriety, but it did not produce any immediate result. Both retired awhile from court; the former under the pretext of celebrating the nuptials of a son, the latter avowedly to disembarrass the Council from his presence. During their absence, an edict long in preparation was issued, containing some provisions very favourable to the Huguenots. The right of search in private houses on suspicion of heretical meetings was forbidden, on pain of death, to any but magistrates; all prisoners for religious offences were enlarged; and those in exile were permitted either to return and live unmolested within the kingdom, provided they avoided occasion of scandal; or to select their own place of retirement, after equitable disposal of their property. The Parliament of Paris, offended at the tolerant spirit of this ordinance, refused to register it; but the publicity which it had already received so far encouraged the Huguenots in the capital, that they ventured upon more than usual openness in their meetings, and even obtained the advantage in a tumult which their fearless conduct had excited, and in which several lives on both sides were sacrificed.

The pleasing hopes excited by this demonstration of the mild intentions of Government were not diminished by an unexpected proposition from the Cardinal of Lorraine, made immediately after the sacré of the young king, in a council of state, held at Rheims. He expressed his readiness as chief prelate of the Gallican church, to consent that, in the ensuing Assembly of the States-General, the clergy should meet separately from the two other orders, for the purpose of reviewing the existing condition of ecclesiastical discipline; that, to avoid misconstruction by the Pope and Catholic priests, their assembly should not be termed a national council; but that the King might permit the attendance of the most distinguished Reformed theologians, in order to discuss controverted points with the Catholic divines. The Reformed could then no longer bruit abroad that calumny which they had hitherto so widely propagated, that the Catholics had no other argument than the stake which they could oppose to reason and to truth. For his own part, so confident was he in the superiority of his cause, that he now publicly declared, that although less profoundly versed in polemics than a professed theologian, he would readily measure himself with any antagonist who might offer, were it even Calvin himself.

The Reformed accepted this defiance with alacrity, and the Council agreed to it unanimously; Poissy was the spot named for the ecclesiastical conference, Pontoise, for the assembly of the nobility and Tiers Etat; both of them towns in the immediate neighbourhood of St. Germain's. But the Council meantime adjourned to Paris, and there, leavened by a deputation of members from the Parliament, all bitterly hostile to the Reformed interests, deliberated twenty continuous days on the chief matters contained in the recent and as yet unregistered ordinance. The result was a new instrument, known from the month in which it was enacted as the Edict of July. It was carried by a majority of only three voices, and grievously were the Huguenots dismayed by its persecuting tenor. All assemblies, public or private, held by armed or unarmed persons, in which sermons were preached or the Lord's Supper administered, contrary to the forms of the Church of Rome, were forbidden, on pain of forfeiture of bodily liberty and confiscation of property; the Reformed ministers were proscribed; and the cognizance of heresy, in conformity with the edict of Romorantin, was assigned to the bishops only; with this single provision in favour of the offenders whom, on conviction, they should deliver to the secular arm, that their punishment was not to be extended beyond exile.*

It is not to be imagined, however, that this edict, intolerant as were its provisions, could silence those who, fearless of martyrdom, were prepared, under every hazard, to avow the truth; and an incident of lighter character, which agreeably relieves many a sickening tale of persecution, at once proves how little the fervour of the Reformed was diminished, and how anxiously the Romish priests called to their aid the mighty weight of public opinion as an assistant of the law. In the village of Montmorillon, on the borders of Poitou and Limosin, a church had been founded, chiefly by the zeal of Francis de la Ponge, who, after much exercise in the study of Scripture, resolved to devote his future years to the ministry. Before delivering his first sermon, he had mortified himself by a long preparatory course of fasting and abstinence; and when he mounted the pulpit, overcome by bodily weakness, and yet more by the solemnity of the holy duty in which he was about to engage, after the few opening words, he paused without being able to recover himself, and continued mute for a long time, with his hands clasped and his eyes raised to heaven. Breaking at length from this trance, as it were, and resuming self-possession, he defied Satan again to prevent his labour of love; bade him avaunt as one bound and chained by God, who would bestow his grace upon the pious work now commenced; and in proof of this assertion, he preached upon the spot for two good hours. Meantime, one of the enemy, on observing De la Ponge's nervous seizure, ran off to the neighbouring village, and announced that the minister had suddenly turned black in the face, and that the devil had wrung his neck. The priests, overjoyed at so seasonable a miracle, assembled in the church, carried about the Host in procession, and announced this righteous judgment of God; till, arriving at the Reformed Assembly, they were driven back with shame and confusion, upon discovering the preacher yet alive, and persevering in an animated discourse, little likely as yet to arrive at its conclusion.†

One event which occurred before the assembling of the States-General demands notice as intimately connected with the history of the great leader of the Huguenots. The Prince of Condé still continued to attribute his arrest and peril of death during the late King's reign to the machinations of the Duke of Guise, and earnestly looked for an opportunity of satisfying his resentment. Since his release from confinement, however, the Duke of Guise had been absent from Court; latterly employed in escorting to Calais his niece the unhappy Mary of Scotland, on her passage to her native dominions. When his duties as grand master of the palace recalled him to St. Germain's, in order that he might officiate at the approaching solemnity, the Prince of Condé summoned his friends, and made evident preparations for a hostile decision of the quarrel. To prevent so fatal an interruption of the public repose, and the probable effusion of illustrious blood even within the verge of the palace, Catherine interposed the mediation of the King, who having previously arranged the necessary forms with the Constable, summoned the rivals to his Chamber. There, in the presence of the most distinguished personages of the Court, he addressed the Queen as follows: "Madam, I have assembled this company in order to adjust the differences between the Prince of Condé and Monsieur de Guise, who, I trust, will not refuse a settlement for the good of my service and of the Kingdom. To the end, therefore, that the Prince may know what he ought to believe, M. de Guise will first tell him how matters have passed." The Duke replied, according to the Constable's dictation, "Sire, since you are pleased that I should give an explanation of past matters to M. le Prince, I will now do so. Monsieur, I have neither practised nor wished to practise against your honour, nor was I the author, mover, or instigator, of your imprisonment." To which the Prince replied, "Monsieur, I esteem as base and bad men any person or persons who occasioned it."—"I believe so," said the Duke, "and the remark in no wise affects me." Then the King bade them embrace, and be good friends. Such is the account of this remarkable scene, in which, while it is difficult to believe that the Duke of Guise acted a sincere part, it is quite evident, from the fierté of the Prince of Condé's reply, that he attached very little credit to his declaration.

The clergy, in general, viewed the Assembly at Poissy with suspicion, and of one hundred and thirty bishops who had been summoned, scarcely fifty were present when the King opened the sittings on the 30th of July. The Chancellor omitted all political matters in his speech, and so entirely considered the meeting as a national council, that the Cardinal de Tournon, who, as Dean of the Sacred College and Primate of France, was elected President, expressed great dissatisfaction. Considering how offensive to Rome must be any proceedings which should interfere with the proposed General Council at Trent, he declared that the present discussion should in nowise concern faith, but be strictly limited to discipline. A step taken by Catherine was less calculated to tranquillize the apprehensions of the Vatican. Having consulted, as is supposed, with Montluc, Bishop of Valence, she addressed to the Pope an explanatory letter, pointing out the necessity of the Conference to which she had agreed, on account of the great number of Separatists. Nevertheless, she assured the holy father, that through God's grace, France had not produced any Anabaptists, Libertines, deniers of the Apostles' creed or its interpretation by the Sacred Œcumenical Councils. She then insinuated that there were many points on which perhaps the church might think it prudent to relax, in order to conciliate those who, by such indulgence, might be restored to its communion. Was it not possible that the use of images, forbidden by God and condemned by St. Gregory, might be removed, so far at least as adoration was concerned? Might not exorcism and other unessential forms in Baptism be omitted; so that water alone should be employed according to the direction of the Scripture? The insertion of the Priest's saliva into the infant's mouth, it was added, not only appeared unnecessary, but in many cases was even dangerous. The administration of the eucharist to the laity in one kind only gave offence; and the decree of the Council of Constance, by which that practice was supported, ought not to be allowed to weigh against the Word of God. Many other particulars relative to the host, it was thought might be advantageously reformed; the Vernacular tongue might be substituted for Latin in the prayers; and psalmody might be admitted as a portion of the public service. These propositions, although made with a show of the humblest deference to pontifical authority, were little likely to be grateful to the ears of Pius IV. But he dissembled his anxiety, and replied with gentleness, that the unity of the church demanded the reference of matters so weighty as those upon which the Queen had touched, to a general council; that he relied upon her wisdom and piety not to permit the Conference to attempt more than a provisional reform of such particular abuses in discipline as might have crept into the Gallican church; and that even for the consideration of those matters, he wished her to await the arrival of a Legate, who was at that time on his journey.

The disputants, however, were already assembled at Poissy, and Catherine proceeded to array them against each other without delay. The Reformed band consisted of twelve ministers; each accompanied by two lay deputies, the most distinguished gentlemen of their respective provinces. Two of the most experienced controversialists of the day had been summoned as their leaders, Peter Martyr from Zurich, and Theodore Beza from Geneva. The former, who did not arrive in sufficient time for the opening of the Conference, was a Florentine by birth, and before his conversion from Romanism, had obtained more than one considerable preferment by his great learning and his celebrity as a preacher. On adopting the new doctrine, and settling on a professorship at Strasburg, he imitated the conduct of Luther by marrying a nun.* During the reign of Edward VI. he visited England at the especial request of the Protector Somerset and of Archbishop Cranmer, and was appointed first to the Divinity Professorship at Oxford, and afterwards to a canonry of Christ Church. From the persecution of the ensuing reign he was permitted to retire unharmed; and after some years of wandering in Germany, he received an invitation to Zurich as its chief pastor. Beza, a native of Vezelai, in Burgundy, was of noble parentage by both descents. He was educated in the principles of the reformation, and made a rapid progress in elegant literature; to the cultivation of which pursuit and to the pleasures of the capital, many of his early years were devoted. A dangerous illness awakened in him more serious feelings, and he determined that, if he were permitted to recover, he would embrace the ministry. With that design, he retired first to Lausanne and afterwards to Geneva; in which latter city he especially attached himself to Calvin, and in return was admitted into his entire confidence and became his official colleague. An intimate acquaintance which he formed with the Bourbon princes, during a residence at Nerac, in the court of the King of Navarre, had made him well known to the leading Huguenots; and whether we regard his piety, his learning, his eloquence, his ready presence of mind, his many personal accomplishments, his elegance of manners, or his accurate acquaintance with mankind, no more powerful advocate of their cause could have been selected.

A knowledge of the public transactions during this Conference is, as on similar occasions, readily accessible; but it is not often that we are so closely admitted to the privacy of the great actors in history, as we find ourselves in a minute account of a preliminary familiar conversation in the palace, given by Beza in a letter to Calvin, and repeated in The History of the French Reformed Churches. He arrived at St. Germain en Laye, where he was received with marks of esteem, on the 23d of August; preached on the following morning, in the saloon of the Prince of Condé, before a large and distinguished congregation, who heard him "without any tumult or scandal;" and in the evening was invited to the apartments of the King of Navarre, where were assembled the Queen Mother, the Prince of Condé, the Cardinals of Bourbon and Lorraine, the Duke d'Estampes and Madame de Crussol. Having made his reverences to the Queen, Beza shortly explained to her the occasion of his coming; and the deep anxiety felt both by his brethren and himself to serve God and her Majesty, in an enterprise so holy and so necessary as that which was in contemplation. The Queen listened graciously, expressed in return the consolation which she should derive from any attempt promising repose to the distracted kingdom, and then asked some particulars respecting Calvin's age and habits of life. The Cardinal of Lorraine here joined in the conversation, stating that he was already acquainted with Beza through his writings, and exhorting him to peace and unity. "You have," he said, "troubled this realm in your absence, let your presence be a signal for its pacification." Beza in reply declared, that after the service of his God, that of his King and country was most dear to him; that he had always in every way been far too unimportant to have the power of troubling so great a realm as France, and that on the other hand his inclination strongly prompted him to render her good offices; in testimony whereof, he appealed to his past writings, and to the demonstrations which, by God's help, he trusted to make in the approaching Conference. The Queen then inquired if he had ever written any work in French, to which he answered in the affirmative, naming his Translation of the Psalms, and a Reply to the late Duke of Northumberland's Confession of Faith. Catherine, as he tells us, asked that question, because she had heard that he was the author of certain libellous verses which had been circulated through France; an authorship which he most solemnly and earnestly denied.

The Cardinal next remarked that he had at that moment lying on his table at Poissy a Latin tract on the Eucharist, attributed to Beza, in which occurred a strange passage; namely, that "we ought now to look for Jesus Christ in the Eucharist, even as we looked for Him before He was born of the Virgin." "Again," said the Cardinal, "I hear that you have written in another book, which I have not seen, Christus est in Cœnâ sicut in cœno." The Queen and her company seemed greatly shocked at this latter statement, but Beza answered on the first point, that doubtless the words might appear strange, put nakedly as they had been cited by the Cardinal; that they ought to be considered together with the context; and that, moreover, the proposition which they contained was strictly true, when rightly understood. Respecting the second head, the words were so absurd and blasphemous, that he boldly pledged himself they did not exist either in his own writings, or in those of any other person who professed the reformed doctrines.* The Cardinal abandoning the second charge, pursued the first at considerable length. The sum of his argument was, that if the proposition were admitted, Christians possessed no advantage over those who lived previously to the advent; and, moreover, that the body of Christ could not be offered to any man, before it had been called into existence. Beza gently asked whether the Church had not existed from the very beginning of the world? Whether it had not always derived its nature as a church from a Mediator between God and man? and whether Jesus Christ, true God and true man, was not that Mediator? "Then," continued he, on receiving affirmative replies to each of these questions, "the communication of the faithful with Jesus Christ must not be restricted to the period which has elapsed since his divinity became really and actually conjoined with our nature; for although beforehand he was not sensibly present, yet he was always present, virtually and effectually, to the eye of faith. How else, indeed, could Abraham, "rejoice to see his day and be glad."† or how could our fathers "all eat the same spiritual meat, and all drink the same spiritual drink, which was Christ?"‡ The Cardinal agreed, adding readily and appropriately from the apocalypse, that Christ was also "the lamb slain from the foundation of the world;"§ but when Beza was proceeding in fuller exposition of the difference between the old and new covenant, he interrupted him on another point.—"This is my body:"—"how," said he, "are we to understand these words, which are most important, and on which we disagree?" "We do so," answered Beza; "and deeply as I must regret that so little harmony reigns among us who call ourselves Christians, I had far rather hear an avowal of disagreement, than a futile attempt to cheat us into belief that we accord on points wherein our difference is so marked."

* This lady, Catharine Cahie, died during Peter Martyr's residence at Oxford, and was buried in Christ Church Cathedral, near the shrine of St. Frideswyde. Under the reign of Mary "her carcass was cast out from ecclesiastical sepulture," by order of Cardinal Pole, and buried in a dunghill near the Dean's stable. Its re-interment took place after the accession of Elizabeth, when Dr. Calfhill, at that time subdean of Christ Church, placed in the same coffin with it the reliques of St. Frideswyde. He also published a tract, Hist. de Exhumatione Katharinæ nuper uxoris Petri Martyris, 1562.

"Well," said the Cardinal, "I teach the little children in my diocese, when they are asked what is the bread in the Lord's Supper, to answer, that it is the body of Jesus Christ. Do you object to that?" "Far from it," rejoined Beza, "they are the very words of our Lord; but the gist of the question lies in knowing after what manner the bread is called the body of Christ; for every thing that is of similar kind is not so in precisely similar manner." They then discussed the scriptural phraseology relating to the sacrament, upon which the Cardinal did not much rely in his own favour; except that when Beza cited "that rock was Christ," in proof of figurative applications, he met the text by a literal one, "the Word was made flesh:" but this objection, we are told, very speedily "slipped through his fingers." In the end, Beza said the matter might be reduced to four heads; the first, concerning the signs; the second, the things signified; the third, the union of the signs with the things signified; the fourth, our participation of the things signified together with the signs. "As to the first," he added, "we do not agree; for you do not include in the elements any other signs than certain accidents of the bread and wine, whereof we retain the substance, in conformity with the nature of a sacrament and with all scripture." "No, no," interrupted the Cardinal, "I am not afraid of being unable to maintain transubstantiation well enough; but it is not necessary that our divines should advance that tenet too forward; and for my part I do not think our churches ought to be at variance on that account." "On the second head," continued Beza, "we do not maintain that it is only the merit of the death and passion of Jesus Christ which is signified to us by the bread and wine, but that it is His true body which was crucified, and His true blood which was shed for us; in a word, that Jesus Christ himself, very God and very man, is signified to us by these visible signs, in order that our hearts may be exalted to contemplate Him spiritually through faith, in the heavens wherein He now abides; and to communicate with His treasures laid up there in eternal life, as truly and certainly as in the course of nature, we see, handle, eat, and drink, the outward and visible signs."

At hearing this declaration the Cardinal expressed great satisfaction, for he had been informed, he said, that the Reformed doctrine was widely different. "On the other hand," continued Beza, "we confess that there is a great difference between ordinary bread and wine and that of the eucharist; for ordinary bread and wine are no other than common exigencies, such as God has been pleased to form them; but in the eucharist they become visible signs and tokens of the precious body and blood of our Lord. But we affirm that the change by which these natural creatures become sacraments, is not in their substance, which remains entire, but only in that their signs are applied to a use altogether differing from their natural import. For naturally they are destined only for our bodily nourishment; but when made sacraments they represent our spiritual food. Moreover, we by no means attribute this change to the virtue of certain words pronounced over them, nor to the intention of him who pronounces them, but to the power of God, whose will and commandment is testified to us by His word. Thus, then, since the thing signified is offered and given to us by the Lord as truly as are the outward signs, it is in this manner, and not otherwise, that we ought to regard their union; namely, that the body and blood of Christ, which are truly administered to us, are also truly present in the elements; not that they are under, nor with, nor within the bread and wine, nor in any other place whatsoever, except in heaven, to which Jesus Christ has ascended, in order that He may dwell there, according to His human nature, till he comes again to judge both the quick and the dead.

The Cardinal here, after renewing his assurance that he was not inclined to press transubstantiation, said that undoubtedly we must look for Christ in heaven; and he then introduced something about absolute local presence and the opinions of certain Germans; alluding, no doubt, to the Lutherian doctrine of consubstantiation. "But to speak the truth," adds Beza, "this part of his discourse was in such sort as to show that he did not well understand the point; and, indeed, he himself admitted, that he had employed most of his time in other matters."—"I must confess, Monsieur," answered Beza, "that we do not agree with those Germans whom you mention, on this third head; but thanks be to God! we jointly with them affirm a true communion with the body and blood of our Lord."

"Do you then admit," inquired the Cardinal, "that we really and substantially communicate with the true body and blood of Christ in the eucharist?"—"That," answered Beza, "is the fourth head which remains to be touched upon. In brief, we say that we sensibly handle, eat, and drink, the visible signs; and that as for the things signified, to wit, the body and blood of Christ, they are truly and without any subterfuge offered to all partakers, but that they can be received no otherwise than spiritually by faith; not by the hand nor by the mouth. Yet, notwithstanding, we believe that this spiritual communion is no less certain than the certainty that we see with our eyes and handle with our hands the outward signs; albeit, the efficacy of the Holy Spirit and of faith is incomprehensible both by our senses and by our understanding." At these words the Cardinal strongly declared to the Queen his great satisfaction at the opinions which he had heard, and his confidence that the issue of the future discussions would be most happy if they were proceeded in with similar gentleness and reason. When the Queen and her company had retired, he turned to Beza with a gracious and winning air, and took his leave, saying, "I am delighted to have seen and heard you; and I call on you in God's name to confer with me, in order that we may mutually acquaint ourselves with each other's reasonings, and you will find that I am not so black as I have been painted."

In this trying interview, Beza exhibited great tact and knowledge of the world, as well as a ready acquaintance with controversy. Without receding one step from the position which he was bound in conscience to maintain, he so expressed himself as not only to avoid offending his opponent, but even fairly and honestly to conciliate his good will. The measure of the Cardinal's sincerity on the other hand, may be estimated by one little incident. As he was withdrawing, Madame de Crussol took him by the hand, and said, with her customary freedom, "You have shown yourself a good man this evening, but what will you be to-morrow?" The lady's doubt was prophetic; for the rumours of the court on the next morning were loud that Beza in the very outset had been attacked, confounded, abashed, and converted by the Cardinal. Nevertheless, when Montmorency congratulated the Queen while at dinner on this success, Catherine pointedly and openly replied, that she had been present at the whole conversation, and he was very ill informed as to its result.

The Reformed ministers continued to preach in the palace daily, and without interruption, till the morning on which the disputation was appointed to commence. It had been stipulated by the Calvinists, and verbally agreed to by Catherine, that since the bishops were parties in the dispute, they were not to be judges also; that the King, the royal family, and the great officers of state should be present; that the only standard of reference should be the canonical scriptures; and that the proceedings should be noted down by secretaries chosen on each side, and daily attested by the signatures of the disputants. The faculty of Paris, meantime, had protested against any discussion with heretics who denied the authority of bishops and prelates; and urged, that if they must be heard, at all events the hearing should not take place in the royal presence; such a course, it was said, would but little contribute to edification, and might awaken perilous doubts in the bosom of the youthful King. Catherine drily answered, that the mode of discussion was already arranged, and the divines quitted the palace in grievous discontent.

* Notwithstanding Beza's total rejection of these words from a reformed origin, they had really been employed, although very innocently, by the gentle Melancthon, in a controversy with Œcolampadius, from one of whose positions Melancthon affirmed they must be a necessary deduction. † John viii. 56. ‡ 1 Cor. x. 3, 4. § Rev. xiii. 8.

At noon, on the 9th of September, the court assembled in the refectory of a convent at Poissy. On the right of the King sate his brother, the Duke of Orleans and the King of Navarre; on his left, the Queen Mother and the Queen of Navarre; behind them were ranged a great number of princes and princesses, lords, knights, and gentlemen with their ladies. On each side of the chamber were seated three cardinals; below them thirty-six archbishops and bishops; and behind, a vast company of ecclesiastics, doctors, and deputies of the clergy. At the end of the hall and fronting the throne stood the Royal Guard, and a host of spectators of all classes. Silence having been proclaimed, the King opened the sitting in a few words, and commanded the chancellor to explain more at length the objects of the conference. L'Hôpital, in the speech which he delivered accordingly, took occasion to commend a national synod as better adapted to existing circumstances than a general council; and perhaps on that account the Cardinal de Tournon demanded a written copy of the speech; but his motion, after some slight discussion, was over-ruled. The Reformed ministers, assisted by the deputies from the provincial churches, were then introduced by the Duke of Guise, and Beza, who had been chosen their spokesman, immediately commenced his address.

He began with a short prayer appropriate to the circumstances in which he was placed; then, having congratulated himself upon the attainment of a privilege hitherto denied to those of his religious profession, namely, that of standing before his sovereign and pleading in his presence, he endeavoured to remove the prejudices which false reports and evil calumnies had created against the Reformed. "Think not," he said, "that we have come hither in the hope of propagating error; our object is rather to discover and to amend whatever may be faulty, either on your side or on our own. Esteem us not so bigoted as to entertain a desire to overthrow that which we know to be eternal, the church of God. Believe not that we would willingly reduce you to our own condition of lowliness and poverty; in which, nevertheless, thanks be to the Lord! we are not without singular contentment. We approach you with a sincere wish to repair the breaches in our Jerusalem; to re-edify our spiritual temple; to restore the house of God, built up of lively stones, to its former glory; to collect and gather again, within the unity of a single fold, the flock of the one and sovereign Shepherd; that flock which has been so widely scattered abroad by the just vengeance of Heaven, and the perverse carelessness of men."

Passing on to a review of the doctrines of his brethren, he touched rapidly on the main points of difference from the ancient religion; not impugning the principles maintained by others, so much as defending those asserted by himself. The one and plenary atonement of Christ; his single intercession and advocacy; the nature of good works, namely, that they proceed entirely from the Holy Spirit, are good only in so far as they are agreeable to the commandments of God, and by no means entitle us to that eternal life which is wholly His free gift; the canon of Scripture, as alone containing all that is necessary for salvation; the sacraments, as outward signs of inward grace;—all these points were affirmed; and the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, as distinguished both from transubstantiation and consubstantiation, was pointedly enunciated. "Should any one ask whether we assert that Jesus Christ is absent from the Eucharist, we unhesitatingly reply, no. But if we look to the distinction of places,—as we must do when the question of corporal presence is advanced—then we pronounce that his body is as remote from the bread and wine as the highest heaven is from the surface of the earth."

Hitherto the orator had been listened to with mute and profound attention; but as the last words were delivered, a hasty murmur ran along the benches, and numerous indignant voices exclaimed, "he has spoken blasphemy." Some of the ecclesiastics rose to quit the Assembly, and the Cardinal de Tournon besought the king and queen either to silence Beza, or to dissolve the sitting. The king contented himself with commanding order, and Beza proceeded without farther interruption. "We are on earth," he said, "the body of Christ is in heaven: yet if any one should thence conclude that we assert Jesus Christ to be absent from this holy supper, we maintain his conclusion to be false. For we so far honour God, that believing the body of Christ to be in heaven, and no where else, and knowing ourselves to be on earth, and no where else, still we affirm that spiritually and through faith, we are partakers of Christ's body and blood; even as certainly as we behold the sacrament with our eyes, touch it with our hands, place it within our lips, and feed bodily on its substance."

On baptism, he said, little difference existed between the two churches. The five other sacraments, as they were called by the Romanists, were admitted by the Reformed, in degree and as useful ceremonies. In church discipline so great was the confusion which prevailed, that the most skilful architect would find it difficult to recognise one vestige of the apostolic building, either in ordinances or in morals. Before God, he protested, that the sole design of the Reformed, was to approach, if possible, to primitive beauty and purity; to abolish superstitions; to retrench superfluities; to adopt any new ordinances which upon solemn consideration might be deemed agreeable to Scripture, and suitable to change of times and circumstances. He concluded by professions of obedience to the king, and of reliance upon the wisdom of his councillors; and then bending on his knees, he presented the Confession of Faith of the Reformed Churches of France, which the king received graciously and handed to the prelates. The Cardinal of Tournon immediately, with marks of anger and disturbance, entreated the king not to believe one syllable which had been uttered, but to abide firmly in the religion professed by his ancestors since the reign of Clovis, and in which he had been educated by his royal mother. He then demanded time, in order that an answer might be prepared; confidently trusting that when his majesty heard that reply, he would be brought back—not brought back, he said, correcting himself, but preserved in the path of orthodoxy. The king answered briefly, that, in the course he had hitherto adopted, he had been guided by the advice of his council; he then retired, and the assembly rose.

When the Romanist divines met after this first day's conference, to deliberate on their future proceedings, the Cardinal of Lorraine began by remarking that, if he could have had his will, either Beza should have been dumb, or his audience deaf. It was resolved that the cardinal himself should reply, but only to the two points of church discipline and the Eucharist; that a Confession of Faith opposed to that of the ministers should be framed and presented for their signature; and that if they declined its acceptance, their heresy should be solemnly condemned and the Conference dissolved. The ministers, apprized of these intentions, presented a Remonstrance; which, by the chancellor's mediation, was so favourably received, that the cardinal determined on an entire change of tactics; and while he prepared his answer, he dispatched an express to the Governor of Metz, enjoining him to send up to Poissy, as secretly as possible, three or four of the most sagacious, clear-sighted and firmly-principled Lutheran divines. By arraying the tenets of the Confession of Augsburg against the Calvinistic doctrine of the Lord's Supper, he trusted to perplex and divide the Reformers; and thus, to use his own expression, to escape like St. Paul between the Pharisees and Sadducees.

The Conference assembled on the 16th of September, in the same manner as before, when the cardinal delivered his reply. He first argued that on all matters connected with ecclesiastical doctrine and discipline the Church possessed absolute sovereignty, so that princes were but her sons and members; thus more than covertly disapproving and rebuking the arrangement by which the king had been appointed to preside. He then addressed himself with great learning and a most profuse display of authorities, to the two points which it had been determined should alone be treated; and it is remarkable that, in discussing the Real Presence, he again produced the miserable play of words on Cœna and Cœnam, which Beza in the first conversation had disavowed; and which the cardinal now protested he would not render into French, out of consideration for the weaker brethren. Before addressing himself to the king in his peroration, he made a spirited apostrophe to the Reformed, which very dexterously preluded the farther design he was meditating.—"If," he said, "in this most unjust and causeless quarrel, we have become so odious to you that you separate from us altogether; that you think us unworthy to live and to dwell in your society; that—horrible to say—you shrink from prayer and sacrifice to God, if performed in the same temples with us, why should you refuse to accept the Greek communion as an arbiter? And if you abhor the Universal Church, why will you not abide by the decision of one which is Particular? Why not appeal to Separatists like yourselves, and turn to the Confession of Augsburg? The ministers who profess that creed, one and all, will condemn you. But if you are rejected on the doctrine of the sacrament, even by dissentients from the Catholic Church, who agree with you in almost every thing else, what hope can we have that you will ever accord with us who differ with you, not only on that question, but on most other points also? If, therefore, you are thus besotted by self-complacency, and reduced to solitude in your opinions; if you will not approach our faith, absent yourselves also from our flocks. Leave to us the charge of those over whom you do not possess any authority, and whom you endeavour to seduce from their attachment to those legitimate pastors who derive their commission from God himself."

When the cardinal had finished his harangue, the prelates rose in a mass, and would have retired, saying, that after a display so eloquent, so argumentative, and so convincing, it was not possible there could be any more room for dispute. Beza, however, seized the moment with admirable promptness, and when he began, the members resumed their seats. Addressing the king, he offered either to reply on the instant, or to await any other day which his majesty might appoint as more seasonable, when, according to the previous stipulation, each party might adduce its authorities. The king expressed his assent to the latter proposal.

More than a week, however, was allowed to pass before a re-assembling of the divines took place; and the arrival of the papal legate during that interval produced an essential change in the form of the conference. Pius IV. recollecting the opposition which former legates to France, in much less tempestuous seasons, had encountered in the exercise of their functions, evinced considerable sagacity in the choice of a minister. Ippolito d'Este,[*] Cardinal of Ferrara, and brother of the reigning prince of that duchy, was closely allied, not only to the Guises, but even to the royal house of France; he possessed benefices within that kingdom exceeding sixty thousand crowns in annual value, and he was moreover a personage of pleasing and accomplished manners, and an acute and skilful diplomatist. Yet, notwithstanding his illustrious birth, his intimate connexion with France, and his accommodating personal qualities, he was insulted in his passage through Lyons; and on his arrival at St. Germain, the populace followed him with rude shouts—"The fox, the fox!"—till they compelled him to abandon the customary legatine privilege of being preceded by an apparitor bearing a crucifix. Even in higher places also, he had little cause to be satisfied with his reception. The Chancellor de L'Hôpital refused to affix the seals to his faculty as legate, notwithstanding a promise that the instrument should never be employed. When, after long denial, at the express command of the King, he did seal that paper, it was endorsed with a special protest under his own hand, "me non consentiente;" and, after all, when it was presented to the parliament, that body replied that they neither would nor could admit its registry. But "the fox," says Beza, in despite of these provocations, never showed any symptoms of anger, and by preserving unruffled calmness he ultimately triumphed. When the Conference was re-opened, on the 24th of September, neither the King nor his brother was present. The happy children were released from their former painful task of moderating in polemical divinity, not from any commisseration for their tender years, as unfitted for that grave purpose, but in order to deprive the Disputation of much of the publicity which it had hitherto enjoyed. The Queen Mother, the Queen of Navarre, the princes of the blood, the cardinals, and a scanty committee of ecclesiastics, were now the only persons confronted with the Reformed ministers; and the place of assembly was transferred from the spacious refectory to the smaller chamber of the prior. Books there were in plenty, with a show of fulfilling a promise made by the Cardinal of Lorraine, that he would confirm his doctrine of the sacrament by appeal to every father of the church who had written in the first five centuries; but, numerous as were the volumes produced, not one page of them was ever opened.

Beza recommenced by arguing at great length in favour of the validity of the Calvinistic church. It was, undoubtedly, his weakest point; and he resorted, perhaps, to over-subtle distinctions when he maintained—first, that the succession from the apostles, which he called doctrinal, was a surer mark of the true church than personal succession; and, secondly, that besides ordinary vocation to the ministry, another ought also to be admitted, which is extraordinary. Upon the purity of doctrinal succession, it is quite manifest that every sect will pronounce a verdict favourable to itself; and no enthusiast, however boldly he has leaped into the fold, has ever been backward in asserting his especial call to God's service. On the fallibility of particular churches and of councils, he was far more successful; and the paramount authority of scripture over the traditions and the canons of the church, was pointedly stated and proved. "To ask whether of the two is superior, scripture or the church, appears to be not less impertinent, than to ask if the child be above the parent, the wife above the husband, and man above his God. Grant that the church in one sense existed before the scripture; yet, nevertheless, paradoxical as it may appear, the scripture, in truth, is the most ancient, for by it the church itself was engendered, conceived, and born." Having apologized for the great extent at which he had treated matters relative to church discipline, (his speech had already occupied an hour and a half) he offered to continue, if the queen so pleased, on the remaining head, the Lord's Supper. But the Cardinal of Lorraine made a sign to one of the most learned Romanist doctors, Claude Despence, who began a reply.

Despence readily admitted the paramount authority of Scripture over the church; but he strongly objected the legality of the ministry of Beza and his companions, owing to the want of imposition of hands; and he farther argued that even those who might have been previously ordained by the Church of Rome, had forfeited their privilege by apostacy. Then, proceeding to the authority of traditions, he affirmed that certain doctrines had no other foundation; as that of the co-essentiality of the Son, and, so far as its name was concerned, the Trinity itself. In regard to Councils, he taxed Beza with an incorrect application of a passage in Tertullian, and of having advanced an historical fact on the authority of a writer so justly suspected as Socrates. Before Beza could explain, "a little white friar," named De Xaintes, uprose, and with great vehemence of speech drew a parallel between Beza and the Anabaptists; expressed astonishment at his having ventured to cite Chrysostom, a writer who he said had stated the existence of Scripture to be contrary to the intention of God; recommended him before he again quoted the fathers to read them three or four times over; and added to the doctrines which rested solely on tradition, Infant Baptism, and the perpetual virginity of Mary. When he had ceased, Beza, first calmly remonstrating on the irregularity of this interruption, and the confusion which it was likely to produce, addressed himself to the objection of Despence concerning the imposition of hands, maintaining that such a form was by no means essential: "For our part," he said, "we feel no interest in the matter. We have good testimony of our call in our examination and election by an elder, in the approval of our magistrates and people, and in reception into the ministry by solemn prayers and thanksgiving. And if you assert that the first builders of our church edified it without authority, as not being included in the Apostolical succession, I reply that many of them might have claimed that succession if they had so chosen; but in truth they preferred a voluntary renunciation of that mark of the Romish Church; not thereby despising ecclesiastical order and discipline, but because in your church, a prey to confusion and distraction, neither order nor discipline was to be found. Briefly, instead of amusing ourselves by a reference to this ceremony in support of our claims to true pastorship, let us come at once to substantial matters, and inquire concerning doctrine. Is that which we preach pure? Are our differences from your church just? If these things be so, then are we true ministers, despite the want of imposition of hands; a want not arising from our fault but from those who have overthrown that ecclesiastical polity which we are striving to restore." All this argument we need not observe is founded on a petitio principii.

He then denied that the doctrines of the Trinity, of the co-essentiality of the Son, and of infant baptism, rested on tradition only. Each was fairly deducible from Scripture; and as for the assertion of Mary's perpetual virginity, it was not an article of faith. Next adverting to the admonition of De Xaintes that he should read the Fathers three or four times over before he quoted them, he assured him in return that he had read his citation from Chrysostom more than twenty times; and moreover that he would pledge himself that neither De Xaintes nor any one else had ever read in that Father the blasphemous sentiment which his opponent had incorrectly attributed to him. To the charges of a mistaken application of Tertullian and of reliance upon the authority of Socrates, he answered not a word at the moment; and he afterwards justified his silence, when his companions inquired privately concerning it, by stating that his reply was directed to principal matters, and not to accessories; an excuse by no means likely to disarm his opponents, even if it satisfied his friends.

Some warm skirmishing ensued with De Xaintes, who appears to have been ignorant, presumptuous, hot-headed, and obstinate. The Cardinal of Lorraine perceived the danger arising from his incompetence, and interrupted a merciless display which Beza was exhibiting of the monk's ignorance and impudence, by an abrupt proposition upon which he relied for certain victory. In his hope of producing embarrassment by means of the Lutheran divines, he had altogether failed. One of them died immediately after his arrival at Paris, and his four brethren quarrelled among themselves, proved intractable, and returned to Germany without visiting Poissy. Accident, however, had thrown in the Cardinal's way two productions of the Reformers, from parts of which he hoped to derive great advantage; and he accordingly made another sign to Despence, who recalled Beza's attention to the doctrine of the sacrament, and then expressed his conviction that he would not refuse assent to a declaration concerning it made by one of his most eminent brethren. At the same time he read two passages from a volume which he produced, without avowing the name of their author. In one of them occurred the word substantialiter, in the other a statement that the presence of the Lord's Body was not to be denied, provided we abstracted all consideration of a local presence. Mutilated as were these sentences, Beza at once recognized them as the production of Calvin, and expressed his full concurrence in them when joined to their context. The cardinal himself then drew from his bosom a second document, which he affirmed to be a Confession of Faith, signed by thirty or forty German ministers, all of them, as he believed, acquaintances of Calvin. From that instrument he said he would extract but one article of three or four lines for Beza's signature, which by God's grace he trusted would be a sure preliminary to accommodation.

Beza demanded a copy of the proposed test, promising his answer on the morrow. When it was delivered to him he found it to be part of a confession of certain ministers in the Duchy of Wirtemburg, drawn up two years before; in which, although this single passage might appear to support the Romish doctrines, there were other articles expressly condemning transubstantiation, the adoration of the host, and all similar belief and practice. It was on that account that the cardinal rested content with one short and garbled extract; and in so doing his design was plain. If the ministers delayed their signature, he would make their reluctance a plea for breaking up the Conference, and for throwing the blame of the rupture upon their tardiness; if they refused signature altogether, he hoped to embroil them with the Lutherans; or finally, if they did sign, it would be easy to claim a triumph, to represent them to their own congregations as traitors and renegades, and to create a schism among the Reformed.

With whatever secrecy the Cardinal's projects were conceived, Beza appears to have been well-informed of their tendency. When the conference re-assembled on the next day but one after its last meeting, he placed in the Queen's hands a memorial signed by all the ministers. It protested against the inquiry which had been made into the legality of their ordination, and the attempt upon that account to cast odium upon their Church. It then pointed out numerous deviations from the original apostolic constitution in the present mode of Episcopal consecration in the Romish Church, adding boldly, "if we are not ministers because we have not received imposition of hands, you are not bishops because you have omitted numerous formalities required by the divine law." Then passing on to the Cardinal of Lorraine's demand of their signature to an isolated article of faith, shorn of many principal and essential accompaniments, it complained of the proposal, "sign that, or we terminate the conference," as a menace which would not have been offered even to prisoners upon their trial. Still Beza did not hesitate to avow his approbation of the passage which had been read to him from the Tract by Calvin. For the article selected from the confession, he wished to know whether it was presented in the single name of the Cardinal, or in that of all the prelates also? Whether if the Reformed ministers consented to sign it, the Cardinal would sign it jointly with them? and also, whether he was prepared to redeem his promise of supporting his assertions concerning the eucharist by authorities from the Holy Scriptures and the fathers?

The Cardinal at first showed symptoms of surprise and annoyance at these unexpected interrogatories; but quickly recovering himself, and having apologised for undertaking to reply at the moment to a premeditated and written remonstrance, he taxed Beza with an intention to degrade both royal and sacerdotal authority, by denying the validity of Romish ordination; and with utter ignorance of the nature of Episcopal consecration, proved by the manner in which he had described it. In return, Beza stigmatized the form of consecration as a farce; and the Cardinal, passing over that strong expression, reverted to the proposed signature. He was asked again whether it was his own individual proposition, or arising generally from the clergy? and whether he and they would sign the confession? "For myself," answered the cardinal, "I am Nullius addictus jurare in verba magistri, I have therefore neither subscribed to that confession nor to yours; ready as I am to subscribe to both, provided they contain truth. On the other point, my brethren here present can testify that I have neither spoken nor offered any thing to you without their general concurrence." At that word he cast his eyes from side to side, but received no sign either of assent or dissent.* "Since then," was Beza's answer, "you yourself will not subscribe, it is unreasonable to ask our subscription."

The debate on the eucharist was immediately renewed, and Peter Martyr, who then appeared for the first time, entered the lists with Despence. As a compliment to the Queen, he delivered himself in Italian, and handled his argument so learnedly and so eloquently as to extort praise even from his antagonist. A violent declamation was then pronounced by Jaques Lainez, the Spanish general of the Jesuits in the suite of the Legate, who attacked the Reformed in intemperate and unmeasured terms; and in his conclusion, urged the Queen to the suppression of heresy with many sighs and tears, which excited undisguised laughter. To his abuse, Beza replied that he would assent to every thing of which fair proof was laid before him; but that until then he would no more believe that his brethren and himself were monkeys, vipers, and foxes, as his opponent had called them, than he would believe in transubstantiation. Little novelty arose in the subsequent discussion. "What is it you understand by Hoc in the words Hoc est corpus meum?" inquired a doctor of the Sorbonne. "The bread," replied the ministers, "which Christ then held in His hands, and which He called His body, because it was the outward and visible sign or sacrament of His body." "The very body itself," exclaimed the doctor; "Hoc, by grammatical construction, cannot have any other signification; and when Beza resisted that meaning, one of his adversaries, lifting up his finger, shook it in a threatening manner, and called out, "Ah! if we could but once get you into our school!"

The asperity of tone which marked this third conference seemed to preclude all hope of mutual accommodation from another similar assembly, and Catherine proposed that five deputies selected from each party should meet in a private house at St. Germain; not any longer to dispute, but to endeavour to arrange a declaration concerning the eucharist which both sides might accept. On the part of the Romanists were chosen for this service, Montluc bishop of Valence, Duval bishop of Sees, Despence, Salignac, and Bouthillier; on that of the Reformed, Beza, Peter Martyr, Marlorat, Des Gallards, and De L'Espine. The Romanists in the first instance proposed the following article: "We believe that together with the signs or appearances of bread and wine, the true body and blood of Christ is really and substantially present, exhibited to, and received by faithful communicants." This form was afterwards modified into the words below. "We believe that in the usage of the Lord's supper the true body and blood of Christ, truly and in very deed, and substantively, that is in very substance, exists in a spiritual and unspeakable manner, is exhibited to, and received by faithful communicants." Ultimately, it assumed another and more extended shape. "We confess that Jesus Christ in His holy supper, truly presents, gives, and exhibits to us the substance of His body and blood by the operation of His Holy Spirit; and that we receive and eat Sacramentally, Spiritually, and through faith that very Body which died for us, that we may be bone of His bone and flesh of His flesh, to the end that we may be vivified by it, and perceive through it all things necessary for our salvation. And since faith established on the word of God, renders present to us things which are promised, and since through that faith we receive truly and indeed the true and natural body and blood of our Lord by virtue of the Holy Spirit; in that manner we confess the presence of the body and blood of the same our Lord in the holy supper."

The news of the acceptance of this declaration by the joint deputies was received with great joy by the court. The Queen mother sent for Beza to her apartment, where, in the presence of the Bishop of Valence, she testified unbounded satisfaction; and when the Cardinal of Lorraine read a copy of the paper, he affirmed that it contained what had always been his belief, and that he trusted it would content the divines at Poissy. "That he uttered these words," says the Historian emphatically, "is quite certain; perhaps," he adds, "he thought that he spoke truth, for such kind of people never have leisure to think whether they believe or not, nor indeed to think at all on that which they think they believe."* But the happy event which the Cardinal had anticipated was very far from occurring. The faculty of Divines, after close examination, pronounced the declaration not only insufficient, but also captious, heretical, and containing many errors against the holy sacrament. Despence was struck mute at this decision; and the Cardinal of Lorraine felt obliged to admit that the doctors were more clear-sighted than himself, and that he yielded to their judgment.† So terminated this unsatisfactory disputation.

CHAPTER VI.

Tumult at St. Medard—Edict of January—Difficulty in procuring its Registration—The King of Navarre abandons the Huguenots—Beza's Disputation concerning Images—The King of Navarre avows his apostacy—Massacre at Vasey—Remonstrance of the Huguenots—The Duke of Guise enters Paris—Condé retires to Meaux—His rapid occupation of Orleans—Huguenot Association and Manifesto.

The Reformed ministers perceived that their occupation as disputants was now at an end, and they took their leave and retired. When Beza, however, paid his respects to Catherine, with the intention of returning to Geneva, she claimed him as a Frenchman, and entreated that he would not abandon his native country while the slightest opening seemed to remain even for a mitigation of religious hostility. His consent was the more readily obtained by the willingness which the Queen at the same time expressed not to oppose any obstacle against the performance of the Reformed worship in Paris; which was celebrated accordingly, wholly without disguise, by large congregations. On the morning after Christmas day, Beza himself, escorted publicly by D'Andelot and a very powerful retinue, to the great astonishment of the Catholics, delivered two sermons. On the following morning he preached again, and after dinner was reluctantly persuaded to attend in a meeting-house called the Patriarchate, in the Fauxbourg St. Marcel, where a discourse was to be given by Malot, a minister of some distinction. Rumours of an intended disturbance, it seems, had been conveyed to Beza, and his apprehensions were unfortunately verified. More than twelve hundred persons were assembled; but scarcely had the preacher commenced, when his voice was drowned by the clang of bells from the neighbouring church of St. Medard, as if chiming for vespers; and on one of the Huguenot congregation, without communicating his intention to his brethren, going out and requesting the priests to forbear their interruption, high words arose, and in the quarrel which ensued he was severely beaten and at length killed. As the noise still continued, others proceeded to the church, and horror-struck at finding the dead body of their comrade, gave an alarm, excited by which, great part of the congregation rushed tumultuously to the spot. They were headed by one Gabaston, the captain of a body of sixty archers recently instituted as a city police, some of whom were instructed to be always present as a safeguard to the Huguenots during their assemblies. The priests, alarmed by the furious onset of this crowd, naturally irritated by the murder of their friend, barred the church-gates, and retreated to the Bell-Tower, whence they rained a shower of missiles, and sounded the tocsin. Meantime, Beza endeavoured to calm the terrors of that part of the congregation, chiefly women and children, which still remained in the meeting-house; and in order to divert their attention, Malot, with great self-possession, gave out the XVIth Psalm, which they sang lustily. The Huguenots were armed, and being joined, it is said, by many of the licentious rabble ever abounding in great cities and eager to foment disturbance in the hope of pillage, they beat in the doors of the church, grievously wounded many of the Catholics, and committed numerous indecent outrages. The ornaments of the altar were destroyed; reliques and consecrated wafers were strewed on the pavement and trampled under foot; and many images were torn from their shrines and shattered in pieces.* The police meantime secured the most violent among the Catholics, whom they considered to be the aggressors; bound with ropes thirty-six persons, all of whom were wounded, and at least ten of which number were priests; and conveyed them to prison through the streets without opposition. Malot continued his sermon, after which the Huguenots dispersed quietly, but on the following evening the populace fired and destroyed their meeting-house. A Commission appointed to inquire into this tumult, proceeded throughout with marked injustice and partiality; they released the prisoners, and adjudged to capital punishment Gabaston, captain of the watch, and three of his associates, who were stated to have increased rather than to have extinguished the riot by assisting the Huguenots. The gibbet on which these unhappy men were condemned to suffer was erected in front of the Church of St. Medard; but so excited was the fury of the rabble that they tore the dying victims from the hands of the executioners, dragged them with savage howlings and great cruelty through the streets, and, when satiated with their blood, threw their bodies into the Seine. The capital echoed night and day with songs made in commemoration of this barbarous triumph.

In the hope of calming the excitement resulting from this unfortunate collision, Catherine assembled a council of deputies from the several parliaments of the kingdom; and with their consent revoked the edict of July, and constructed another which, named like the former from its date, is known as the Edict of January. Its opening provisions implied a great increase of power among the Huguenots; for they were instructed to restore to the Established Religion all churches, houses, property, revenues, reliquaries, and ornaments of which they might have obtained possession; not to trouble the priests in their collection of dismes and other ecclesiastical dues; not to deface nor destroy crosses or images, an offence which was declared punishable by death without hope of pardon or remission. It then enacted that other churches were not to be occupied by the Reformed in lieu of those which they surrendered; they were restrained from building any meeting-houses either within or without the precincts of towns; and, within such precincts, from holding any assembly for worship, public or private, by day or by night. Nevertheless, provisionally, and till the final determination of a general council, all the penalties inflicted by the edict of July were suspended, in so far as regarded religious meetings of unarmed persons, held by day, and without the precincts of towns. They were, however, to be under the inspection of proper officers, by whose permission Synods and Consistories might be held in like manner. The collection of alms was permitted, but all levies of men or money for offensive or defensive purposes were rigidly prohibited. Conformity with the church was required in desisting from labour on holydays and festivals, and in not marrying within the forbidden degrees of affinity. Ministers were to present themselves before the magistrates within a given time, and to swear that they would obey this ordinance; that they would not preach any doctrine opposed to the Nicene creed or the canonical scriptures; that they would abstain in their sermons from any invectives against the Mass, or other rites of the Catholic church; and that they would not wander as itinerant preachers from village to village, against the consent of the respective seigneurs, landholders, curates, vicars, and church officers. The priests were in like manner enjoined to avoid all injuries and evil speaking against the ministers and their followers, as contrary to true devotion, and as the most fertile sources of disorder and tumult.

† In the Hist. des Egl. Reformées, i. 609, &c. are printed at length the judgment in which the theologians pointed out three heresies, one fallacy, and one insufficiency in this declaration; a confession of the Catholic belief in the real presence, stated in the broadest terms of transubstantiation; a reformation of the Calvinistic confession; and the conclusion of the prelates assembled at Poissy on all the foregoing documents.

* De Thou, ibid. says the images were thrown down by the priests themselves, who, being unarmed, employed them as defensive weapons. Beza, however, contradicts him in both points. Qui hostibus armatis pepercerant, Idolis et panaceo illi Deo parcere non potuerunt, frustra reclamantibus quibus ista non placebant.

From the reluctance with which this edict was at first received by many of the Huguenots, it would appear that they had already forgotten how lately they were an utterly proscribed and abhorred sect, hunted down, and delivered to the flames whenever the bloodhounds of persecution could track their secret haunts. They now, indeed, were said to count no less than two thousand one hundred and forty congregations, dispersed through every part of the kingdom; and so great were their numbers at Paris, that between thirty and forty thousand persons sometimes assembled on the same spot for service; which was generally performed either at the Patriarchate, already mentioned, in the Fauxbourg St. Marcel, or at the Popincourt, without the Gate St. Antoine. No secrecy was affected in the celebration of their rites; and the marriage of two favourites of the Queen of Navarre, the young Rohan and La Brabancon, a niece of Madame d'Estampes, had been publicly solemnized at Argenteuil, close to St. Germain, the ceremony being performed by Beza, in the presence of the Queen herself, of the Prince of Condé, and of the Admiral. But although the spirit of the new ordinance was comparatively tolerant, the liberty which the Huguenots had enjoyed for the last few months, and the manifest indifference of Catherine in her profession of the ancient religion, had encouraged among them hopes of positive establishment, which they were ill-prepared to surrender. The leading ministers, however, addressed to their congregations a pastoral letter, enjoining the Scriptural duty of submission to authority; showing the advantages derived from this, their first public recognition as a body under the Royal protection; and pointing to the favourable prospect which the graciousness of the King held out for the future, notwithstanding certain restrictions which, for the present, were undoubtedly grievous. The commentary on the several articles of the edict which followed this epistle, was distinguished by gentleness, good sense, and piety. The justice of some of the demands was stated to be so apparent, as not to require any argument in its support. The restoration, for instance, of property belonging to the priests, or to their churches, was an obvious duty, and he who disregarded it would deserve to be cut off from religious communion. To deface images was not the province of ministers, whose exertions ought rather to be directed against the idolatry of the heart, by preaching the pure word of God. Harsh as the denial of public service within towns might appear, it by no means interfered with the domestic worship of separate families; and as for the prohibition from carrying arms, the Christian warfare demanded only spiritual weapons, namely, prayer and patience, against the enemies of truth.*

The rigid Catholics, on the other hand, perceived in the immunities granted to their opponents, nothing short of the destruction of their own ascendancy, and the probable downfall of their church; and it was not until they were terrified by the presence of an armed force, and even by military execution, that some of the provincial parliaments consented to register an edict which they denounced as anti-Christian. The Parliament of Dijon, backed by the influence of the Duke of Aumâle, brother of the Duke of Guise and Governor of Burgundy, obstinately and successfully persisted in its opposition; and the struggle maintained by a body whom it was far more important to control, the Parliament of Paris, appeared to threaten a perilous breach between the sovereign and his people. "M. le President," was the reply which the young King had been instructed to deliver to Christopher de Thou, when he presented a remonstrance, "you will tell my Parliament, that I have ordered the remonstrance they have addresed to me to be read in my Council, and that whenever they send me remonstrances on matters appertaining to the good of my service, they shall be graciously received. But you will not forget to tell them at the same time, that my will and pleasure is, that my edict shall be promulgated on Monday next, without further delay; and that I forbid them any further hesitation, since I choose to be obeyed as completely as any of my predecessors. I intend also that they shall obey the Queen, my mother, even as myself; I shall make as much account of obedience to her as if it were offered to my own person; I shall in like manner regard disobedience to her as disobedience to myself; and I shall bear it in constant mind when I attain my majority."* Notwithstanding this spirited reply, the Parliament on receiving it agreed to pass a vote that they neither could nor ought in conscience to proceed in the registration; and it was not until Catherine had worked upon their fears by declaring that numerous bodies of armed men, levied and commanded by she knew not whom, were on their route to Paris, that she appeared to shake their resolution. Following up this stratagem, she contrived that during one of their sittings, some of the King's gentlemen should interrupt the debate, by announcing that four or five hundred persons, armed at all points, thronged the palace courts, and threatened to tear the President and his councillors in pieces, unless they registered the edict. A stormy discussion succeeded this preconcerted scene; and the President at length decided that, "in consequence of urgent necessity, and by the express command of the King," the edict should be registered and published; protesting at the same time, against any supposed approbation of the new religion, and declaring the step which they had taken to be altogether provisional.

The intrigue by which this opposition had been generated and maintained was not long without development. Since his arrival in France, the Cardinal of Ferrara had so far temporised as to excite suspicion in the Vatican that he was not fulfilling his legatine duties with sincerity; but as his projects were deeply laid, so were they slow in advance to maturity; and it was only from a long course of dissimulation that he could hope for ultimate success. In examining the state of parties in France, his sagacity did not fail to perceive that the Catholics were still undoubtedly the strongest; and he doubted not that if the weight in their scale could be sensibly augmented, Catherine would be forced either to withdraw the opposition which she had lately maintained, or, as was more probable, to unite herself with the manifestly preponderating faction. It was to be considered, therefore, through which of their leaders the Huguenots were most vulnerable. The Prince of Condé and the Châtillons were too firm and too upright to permit a hope of seducing them from the religion which they had adopted on conviction; but the King of Navarre, weak, unstable, and voluptuous, might be supposed to have embraced the cause of a sect whose habits were directly opposite to his own, chiefly with the hope of personal aggrandizement; and of so far alarming Spain by the establishment of great influence in France, as to compel her to the restitution of his kingdom. Every art therefore which could occur to the fertile and politic invention of a practised Italian diplomatist, was employed in order to wean that prince from his patronage of the Reformed. Two of the most confidential officers of his household, Descars, his Chamberlain, and the Bishop of Auxerre, Chief of his Council, were readily persuaded to lend their assistance in reconciling him to their own church; and they were instructed to whisper suspicions and to excite jealousy of the Colignys, respect for whom was believed to be one of his strongest ties to the Reformed. Having thus weakened the outworks by his agents, the Cardinal himself directed the main attack; and began by hinting that the Pope's consent might be obtained to the repudiation of his heretic consort Jeanne d'Albret; and to his union with the widowed Queen of Scotland, whose hand would confer not only the sceptre of that kingdom, but most probably that of England also.† Antony, although not less unfaithful to the marriage bed than our own Charles II., like him also had sufficient sense of shame to reject the atrocious proposition of wronging an exemplary consort. The Cardinal, however, was by no means disconcerted; he next pointed to the high esteem in which Pius IV. was held by the court of Spain; and to the facility with which his good offices might be procured in order to obtain either the restoration of Navarre itself, or, if that were not feasible, an equivalent indemnity. The fickle and too credulous prince listened with open ears to the wily proposal, and negotiations were accordingly soon in progress. The Pope dispatched a Nuncio to Madrid; the King of Spain consented to appoint a Commission of Review, but at the same time, notified to the Duke of Vendôme, the only title under which he recognised the Pretender to Navarre, that, as a preliminary, he must feel assured that he was not treating with a heretic; and that no testimony of attachment could be so grateful as the dismissal of the Reformed preachers.

* Garnier, xv. 242.

† Mezeray, v. 50.

While this secret negotiation was pending, the dispute occurred concerning the registry of the edict of January: and the King of Navarre, although not yet prepared for the entire revelation of his future intentions, secretly prompted the opposition and contributed greatly to its prolonged maintenance. Beza was probably one of the first persons who detected symptoms of his apostasy; and he wrote cautiously, although strongly, to Calvin, expressing his indignation. After speaking of some ludicrous occurrences during a Conference which we shall presently mention, he adds that, besides that comedy, a tragedy also was being enacted; in which the principal character was maintained by one, who least of any ought to have assumed it; and whom, he should hereafter always call Julian. "As for him," he continues, "there is great need of the display of God's just judgments; and never has there been witnessed a similar instance of vacillation, treachery, and wickedness. In an audience which he gave me in his bed-chamber, he was not ashamed to treat me as if I had been ignorant of matters with which every child is acquainted; and from that moment he has taken no pains to dissemble his enmity against me; but has openly shown it, and exhibited himself as a madman under the manifest influence of the Evil Spirit. But God in his mercy has so deprived him of all sense, that even in his madness he is little to be feared."

The dispute in which Beza was now engaged concerned images; a point suggested by Catherine, either with a hope of contributing to union, or in order to amuse and deceive the Reformed Ministers. The council chamber at St. Germain was selected as the arena on which a deputation of theologians from both churches was to contend; and Catherine, the King and Queen of Navarre, the Cardinal Legate of Ferrara, the Cardinals of Bourbon, Châtillon, and Tournon, the privy councillors, and some of the presidents and councillors who had assisted in constructing the edict of January, assembled to witness the disputation. Beza spoke on the first day for two hours; and the controversy appears to have been conducted with some playfulness and good humour. Thus, when one of the Sorbonnists maintained that in the time of St. Denys, whom he affirmed to be a disciple of St. Paul, images were employed in Paris, and cited the painted windows in the Church of St. Benoît, in proof of his assertion, Beza drew down peals of laughter by a jest of no very extraordinary pungency, "that the argument was as fragile as glass." The ministers repeatedly urged the prohibition of images in Scripture; to which the General of the Jesuits answered that all things we ought to do are not enjoined by Scripture; first, because if they were so, the Bible would be too unwieldy a volume; and secondly, because if the Code defined every minute action, no change could possibly at any time be admitted. But the Romanists were far from agreeing among themselves. Despence, Boutillier, Picherel and Salignac, altogether abandoned the defence of representations of the Trinity, and of any one of the three persons of the Godhead; and Beza has most graphically described the distress of the unhappy Cardinal de Tournon, when he perceived the tendency of their speeches. The president, he says, as Salignac went on, first groaned inwardly, then grumbled openly, next rose from his chair and walked to the fireplace, and at last fairly buried himself out of sight in the farthest corner of the room. Montluc supported the same opinions "magnificently," founding his arguments on Scripture and on the Fathers, and maintaining his position by correct and powerful reasoning. He complained also of a personal grievance inflicted on himself by the Sorbonne. It seems that the Faculty, without due respect to his Episcopal character, had condemned a book written by him for the use of his clergy, in the diocese of Valence, and containing sound and Christian doctrine; while at the same moment it had authorized a very stupid and silly rhyming volume, by one Arthus Desiré, which, among other evil matters, had thus falsified the IId Commandment in doggrel:—

"Thou shalt make a graven Image,
At thy choice of every kind,
Honour it and pay it homage,
God in that great joy shall find."

The Bishop of Valence, and the four Doctors who agreed with him, then drew up a paper, founded on the above admissions; and expressing their willingness to consent to the removal of all Sculptures and Paintings of the Trinity, as prohibited by Scripture, by Councils, and by many personages of sound wisdom and saintly life. They condemned also the unseemly and licentious carved work which often profaned Ecclesiastical buildings, and the representations of the legends of those Saints, both male and female, whom the Church rejected as Apocryphal. They were content to abolish the adoration, salutation, osculation, investment, and coronation of Images; the offering of vows to them, and the processions in which they were carried about, whether through the streets or in Churches. The other Divines admitted that there might be a few abuses which demanded Reform, but stoutly supported the necessity of retaining the Images altogether.

Beza in consequence presented a long written address to the Queen, in which his main argument was founded upon the IId Commandment, unlawfully retrenched from the Decalogue by the Church of Rome, as he proved by the authority of the Fathers. He protested against any misinterpretation, which might represent him as condemning Painting and Sculpture in general. They were innocent and necessary Arts, when not employed in opposition to Religion and Conscience; but the danger of their ministering to Idolatry had been discovered not only in the time of the writers of the Old Testament, and in the first three centuries of the Church, but also by the wisest Legislators and Moralists of Paganism. Witness Numa and the Lacedemonians among the former; Varro, Horace, and Perseus among the latter. He then critically examined the word Idol, which some had wished to restrict to Images of the Heathen Gods; and he proved by reference to Euripides, Homer, and Virgil, (if in agitating Sacred themes he might be permitted to name such Profane Poets) that εἴδωλον, εἰκὼν, ὁμοίωμα, imago and simulacrum, were altogether synonymous. These Philological niceties, he continued, are little however to the purpose. God's prohibition of Idolatry is universal; and if Images be worshipped, whether by Pagans or by Christians, they are worshipped alike in direct violation of the Divine Law. It is idle to urge that the prohibition delivered in the Old Testament relates solely to the Jews, and, as a part of their Ceremonial Law, is abolished together with the rest of it; those who argue thus should be prepared at the same time to prove that Idolatry was a sinful tendency peculiar to the Hebrew nation; whereas, in point of fact, it is a vice which besets Human Nature itself. In a word, the Commandment was delivered for all men and for all seasons, and St. Augustin has well said that so far as it is concerned, we are now the Jews. The Cherubim on the Ark of the Covenant have been cited as an exception, and they are so. But they were fashioned after an express injunction from God; and can the Church of Rome produce any similar injunction for any of its Images? moreover, the Ark of the Covenant was deposited in the Sanctuary, remote from the general eye, and therefore not exposed to the abuse of adoration. No worship was paid by the Jews either to the Sanctuary or to the Altar, any more than to the fire which blazed, or to the victim which burned on the latter; and the Romanist who affirms otherwise may be accused on similar grounds, and by borrowing his own argument, of worshipping the pig of St. Anthony, the horse of St. Martin, and the Devil of St. Michael, with no less fervent devotion than that which he offers to the Images of those Saints themselves.

In reply to the customary argument that honour is not directed to the Image, but to that which the Image represents, Beza triumphantly inquired (and the inquiry has never yet been answered) why then is any local superiority admitted? Why is one Image considered more holy and more potent than another? Why are pilgrimages made to distant Images when there are others, perhaps of far better workmanship, near at hand? Again, is it tolerable that in a Christian Church an Image of the Virgin Mary should be addressed in terms appropriate solely to the Almighty Father, "omnibus es omnia!" If the Virgin were yet alive and on Earth how would the humility and lowliness of heart, which she ever so conspicuously evinced, be shocked by the hourly impious appeals to her supposed maternal authority over her blessed Son; "Roga Patrem, jube Natum!" "Jure Matris impera!" Then, adverting to the reputed miracles performed by Images, he contended that by the evidence of judicial inquiries, most of them had been indisputably proved impostures; and even with regard to such as remained undetected, it was detracting honour from God, the sole Author of Miracles, to attribute any hidden virtue or mystic efficacy to wood or stone. Passing on to a review of the long controversy about Images maintained in the Greek Church, he concluded by affirming that not less Idolatry might be occasioned by Crucifixes than by Images themselves; and the only part of this Memorial, distinguished as it is by acuteness of argument and soundness of learning, in which we perceive any approach to special pleading, is a somewhat too subtle distinction which it attempts to establish between the sign of the Cross and a material Crucifix. The propositions appended to this document were that Images should be altogether abolished; or if that measure were thought too sweeping, that the King would consent to the removal of all representations of the Trinity or its separate Personages; of all Images which were indecorous, as for the most part were those of the Virgin; of such as were profane, as those of beasts and many others, produced by the fantastic humours of Artists; of all publicly exhibited in the streets, or so placed at altars that they might receive superstitious veneration; that no offerings or pilgrimages should be made to them; and finally, that Crucifixes also should be removed, so that the only representation of the Passion of our Lord might be that lively portrait engraved on our hearts by the word of Holy Scripture.

If the suggestions of Montluc and his party, so accordant with the propositions of Beza, had been admitted by the general Body of the Gallican Church, this Conference seemed to promise a nearer approach to union than any of its predecessors; and it must be admitted that the concessions to which the moderate Romanists inclined were sufficiently ample. But the opinions of those inveterately hostile to all Reform ultimately prevailed, and the only result of the discussion, says Beza, (without perceiving, or at least without adverting to the fact, that he is giving an account applicable to almost every Synod, Conference, and Council in which Religious differences have been agitated,) was that each party abided by its own opinion. The General of the Jesuists indeed was importunate with the Ministers for a promise that they would attend the Council of Trent; and so troublesomely pressing was he, that he pursued them even to their beds with assurances that the Pope would not have his own way in that Assembly. Thus harassed, they represented to Catherine their chief difficulties, and the means by which they might be removed. First, their unwillingness to acknowledge the authority of the Pope to summon a Council at all; which objection they would compromise by attending at the command of the King: secondly, the probable absence of the Representatives from other countries professing their own Religion; which barrier the Queen herself might assist in overcoming by expressing a wish to her Protestant allies that they would send Deputies. The stipulations which they made were that, in remembrance of the fate of John Huss and Jerome of Prague, and indeed of their own recent personal experience—although no men were more willing than themselves to encounter danger whenever the glory of God might so require it—the Council should not be held in any place mediately or immediately dependent on the Romish See, or on any Prince uniting Ecclesiastical with Temporal authority; that in their safeguards, a clause should be inserted expressly opposed to the dictum of the Council of Constance, that faith was not to be kept with Heretics; that at the council they should have full parity of rights with all the other Deputies; that in all questions discussed, the Canonical Scriptures should be the sole standard of reference; and that such passages only of the Fathers might be cited as were founded on Scripture; that the Ministers should be represented by a plurality of their own voices; and that during the Sitting of the Council, all Religious disputes should be suspended in France by the strict observance on both sides of the Edict of January.

It does not appear in what manner Catherine received this memorial. Her thoughts indeed must have been too wholly engrossed by the danger which threatened her own power from the increasing ascendancy of the triumvirate, to permit of her paying much real attention to the ministers now avowedly deprived of the protection of the King of Navarre. On the last day of the Conference, that Prince who had so long sought an opportunity of declaring himself, and thus of gratifying the Spanish Court, affirmed that the ministers, after all their repeated vaunts, had failed in discomfiting the Catholic theologians; and he denounced them therefore as Charlatans and Impostors, with whom he held it disgraceful to maintain farther intercourse. He also immediately removed his son from the Reformed Governors to whose care he had hitherto been committed for education, and surrounded him with others of the Romish persuasion. His Queen was sensibly affected by this unexpected act of violence. Passionately embracing her child, at that time in his ninth year, she entreated him to abide in the Faith in which he had been originally trained, and mingling threats with caresses, she menaced him with disinheritance if he became a renegade. When Catherine recommended patience and a seeming conformity to her husband's will, she indignantly replied, that rather than attend mass, if she had her kingdom in one hand and her son in the other, she would throw both into the bottom of the sea. On the opposite part, the Spanish minister, the Duke d'Alva, gratefully acknowledged this homage offered to the Catholic religion; and while he declined entertaining any proposal for the restitution of Navarre, now an integral part of the Spanish dominions, he offered a compensation, to be tendered by the free grace of his Master. Sardinia, which he represented as a second Paradise, might be guaranteed to Antony; and if the possession of that happy and productive island were not considered sufficient, the confederated arms of Spain, of France, of the Pope, and of the Knights of Malta, might conquer for him the kingdom of Tunis, and extend his territories almost without limit in Africa. For the present, if he sought to accelerate the fulfilment of these splendid hopes, he could not more substantially advance his interests than by procuring the removal of the Châtillons from the French court.

Coligny and his brothers, warned of the approaching demand, which was to be supported by the Spanish envoy personally, and perceiving moreover the inability of Catherine to resist, prudently saved the Queen from mortification and themselves from affront, by a voluntary retirement. The return of the Duke of Guise to Paris, from which he had been absent during the whole winter, gave additional cause of just alarm to the Huguenots; and the commencement of the civil war which ensued, is usually dated from a bloody incident which occurred during his journey. In his route, the Duke's passage lay through Vassy, a town on the borders of Champagne, in which a Huguenot church had been established during the preceding year. The rapid increase of this congregation, on a spot scarcely three leagues removed from the principal domain of the Guises at Joinville, had given especial offence to the Duke's mother, Antoinette de Bourbon, a bigoted Romanist; and, urged by her persuasions, Guise had attempted some months before, first to terrify, and afterwards to convert these insolent heretics, who were represented as bearding him even in his own principality. But the Reformed were too numerous to be intimidated, too well instructed to be seduced; and the gens d'armes retired after an idle demonstration, the ecclesiastics after being forsaken by many of their followers who attended the minister's preaching and embraced his doctrine. With these causes of previous irritation, the Duke of Guise entered Vassy, accompanied by the Cardinal of Lorraine and a numerous suite, on Sunday the first of March; not so much perhaps with a design of suppressing the Huguenots by force, as with a hope that the authority of his presence might contribute to their dispersion. As he approached the town, on hearing the chime of bells at an unusual hour, he inquired its meaning, and was answered that it was a summons to the Huguenot worship. At that announcement, a deep, although indistinct murmur ran through his train, in which, as was usual with men of high rank, was mingled a disproportionate number of pages and lacqueys, ever prompt to violence and greedy of plunder. While the Duke halted in the principal street, where he was joined by a reinforcement of sixty horse, which had been assembled in the town eight days before, many idle stragglers from his suite wandered off to the meeting-house; some indignant at the open display of heresy, some wishing for a quarrel in which they might be gainers by pillage, and others attracted solely by curiosity. The more mischievous among them began to insult the assembled congregation, (about twelve hundred persons of both sexes and all ages,) with rude taunts and mockery; repeatedly calling them dogs, and rebels to their King and God, although they were gathered together unarmed and strictly in conformity with the edict of January. The Huguenots were provoked to retort, till evil words were succeeded by a shower of stones; and when the Reformed closed the doors of the large barn which served them as a meeting-house, the Guisards dismounting from their horses, burst in and attacked the unresisting crowd with drawn swords. The shrieks of women and children imploring help and mercy, the trampling of those who were either rushing in or seeking exit, the shots fired at some of the Huguenots, who, thinking to escape by untiling the roof, were brought down "like so many pigeons," and the general clamour of the tumult, soon called the Duke to the spot; and while attempting to check the conflict, he received a slight scratch on the cheek, which drew blood. The sight of their master's wound inflamed the fury of his retainers, and gave the licentious among them a pretext for unbridled outrage. In spite of his menaces and entreaties, in which there can be no doubt he was sincere, sixty Huguenots were killed, and more than two hundred wounded; among the latter was their pastor, Leonard Morel, first brought on his knees by a pistol-shot, and then twice savagely cut on the head by a sword. The benches and pulpit were shattered in pieces, the Bible and service books destroyed, the dead bodies of the fallen victims stripped for plunder, the alms' chest was despoiled of its contents, and some houses in the immediate neighbourhood were broken open and robbed.

Miserably distracted as was the condition of France at this moment—for there was scarcely a town of any note in the provinces which had not witnessed scenes of violence and outrage, arising from religious dissension—no event so flagrant as the massacre at Vassy had as yet forced itself on public notice. The Reformed ministers at Paris were advised by the governor to suspend their meetings in the suburbs for a few days, till the first exacerbation had subsided; but they peremptorily refused such an abandonment of duty; and demanded his protection so long as they observed the provisions of the King's edict. Their congregations then determined to address an accusation of the Duke of Guise, not to the Parliament, notoriously hostile to their interests, but at once to the crown; and the nobility deputed Francour, —the ministers, Beza,—to convey their memorial to the Queen Mother, who, together with the King, had withdrawn from the turbulence of the capital to a small but favourite residence at Monceaux en Brie. Catherine graciously answered, that she would direct information to be taken, and that a thorough inquiry should be instituted, provided the Huguenots remained quiet; she hoped that the Duke of Guise meantime would not continue his journey to Paris, which indeed she had written to forbid.* The King of Navarre was present at the audience; for Catherine, not without hope of weakening the new ties by which he had bound himself to the Triumvirs, if she could withdraw him but for awhile from Paris, had spread a lure which she well knew the weak prince would not be able to resist; and when she ordered the fair La Rouet, one of her maids of honour, to accompany the court, she rightly anticipated that the King of Navarre would follow. Sternly regarding Beza, he accused the Huguenots of now attending worship with arms! Beza replied, that arms, when borne by men of discretion, were the surest guarantee of peace; and that since the transactions at Vassy, their adoption had become necessary till the church should receive surer protection; a protection which he humbly requested, in the name of those brethren who had hitherto placed so great dependence on his majesty. The Cardinal of Ferrara here interrupted him by some incorrect representation of the tumult of St. Medard; but he was silenced by Beza, who spoke of those occurrences as an eye-witness, and then reverted to the menacing advance of the Duke of Guise upon Paris. The King of Navarre declared with warmth, that whoever should touch the little finger of "his brother," the Duke of Guise, might as well presume to touch the whole of his own body. Beza replied with gentleness, but with dignity; he implored the King of Navarre to listen patiently, reminded him of their long intercourse, and of the special invitation from his majesty in consequence of which he had returned to France in the hope of assisting in its pacification. "Sire," he concluded in memorable words, "it belongs in truth to the Church of God, in the name of which I address you, to suffer blows, not to strike them. But at the same time let it be your pleasure to remember that THE CHURCH IS AN ANVIL WHICH HAS WORN OUT MANY A HAMMER."†

The Duke of Guise nevertheless proceeded onward, and entered Paris by the gate of St. Denis, escorted by the Constable, the Maréchal St. André, and a numerous and well-appointed retinue. Almost at the same moment, the Prince of Condé, returning from a sermon preached without the walls, passed through the gate of St. Jaques; and the two companies encountered each other while traversing the city. The collision, however, was without any evil result; and, although both parties were armed, they did no more than courteously salute each other in passing. Many circumstances attendant upon this re-appearance of Guise, were calculated to excite just umbrage and alarm in the breast of Catherine. It was remarked that he had purposely deviated from the customary route, and had made an unnecessary circuit, in order to enter Paris by the gate of St. Denis, the approach always selected for the state processions of the King; that the Præfects of the Commercial Guilds and the aldermen of the city had received him with civic honours; and that the shouts of the rabble were couched in terms hitherto reserved for the ear of royalty. These pointed coincidences awakened in Catherine so profound a suspicion of Guise's ulterior and ambitious designs, that she threw herself altogether on the Prince of Condé; and her letters, which are still extant, betray the keenest anxiety for his support. At a subsequent period, indeed, when it was her policy to deny this connexion, and Condé, in order to prove its existence, exhibited these letters to the German Protestant courts, she put a gloss upon their contents, which is among the most memorable instances of her extraordinary subtilty. Every sentence appeared so ambiguously worded, as to admit a double meaning, and all dates had been purposely omitted. She contended that her sole object was to induce Condé to leave Paris; and with but little violence it certainly was possible to put that construction on her expressions; yet, at the same time, it is plain to the simplest understanding, that such an interpretation was not that which she intended to be most obvious.

The Prince of Condé did indeed retire; not in compliance with any wish expressed by Catherine; but from his own perception, that if he remained it must be to encounter a most unequal contest. The Triumvirs were now united in Paris, within the walls of which city lay their principal strength. Their intention to obstruct the fulfilment of the edict of January was manifest from the violence committed at Vassy; and the Huguenots, if they sought to preserve themselves from annihilation, could do so only by the sword. But if the sword were first drawn in the capital, in the face of a greatly superior enemy, little would be their prospect of success. One mode, indeed, occurred to some of their more zealous leaders, by which they might free themselves at a blow; but it was a mode too detestable to be adopted; and when they proposed to the Consistory to assassinate the Duke of Guise, while present at a religious solemnity, at which he had declared his intention of assisting, they were peremptorily forbidden to entertain such a project; and instructed that the will of God must be endured without resorting to guilty measures for escape from calamity.

In order to effect a junction with the forces which the Admiral had been collecting, the Prince of Condé withdrew to Meaux. The policy of this abandonment of the capital has been arraigned;* and one of its immediate disadvantages was considerable; it enabled the Triumvirs to secure without opposition the persons of Catherine and the King, whose names they sagaciously foresaw would be a tower of strength in the approaching conflict. When the royal train entered the Castle of Melun, in which they were first lodged, an attendant, intentionally or inadvertently, remarked in their hearing, that more than a century had elapsed since its towers were appropriated to any other purpose than that of a state prison. The Queen listened to the words unmoved, and with a cheerful countenance; her son, not yet confirmed in dissimulation, burst into natural tears. On the following morning they were conveyed to Paris, where the Constable signalized their entry by a petty triumph, the destruction of two meeting-houses, together with their desks, pulpits, and benches. These narrow-minded outrages, little worthy of the high dignity of his illustrious name and office, gained for him a brief popularity from the Popish rabble, and from the Huguenots the well-deserved sobriquet of Captain Brûle-banc.

* This is the account of Catherine's answer, if not written, most probably furnished by Beza in the Hist. des Egl. Ref. ii. 2. Garnier, without citing any authority, makes her state that she knew the Duke of Guise to be so discreet and prudent, that she could not believe all she heard of him. xv. 268. But Catherine, at that moment, had neither reason nor inclination to speak thus favourably of the Duke of Guise.

† A device suggested by this noble apostrophe is engraven on the title-page of the Hist. des Egl. Ref. Three warriors in complete armour, representing the Triumvirate, are beating an anvil with sledge-hammers, one of which is just shattered in its handle. The groupe is encircled by the following legend:

Plus à me frapper on s'amuse
Tant plus de marteaux on y use.

* It is defended at much length by De la Noue, who has devoted an entire chapter to the question. He states that the "assured strength" of the Protestants in Paris consisted of only "300 Gentlemen and as many trayned Souldiours, 400 schollers, and a few voluntarie Burgeses of no experience. And what else was all this agaynst in manner an infinite number of people, but a small flie agaynst an elephant. I thinke that onelie the Novices of the Conventes, together with the Priestes' wenches comming soudainelie upon them, with fagot stickes in theyr handes, had been able to have withstoode them." Certaine observations of divers things happened in the three first Troubles of France appended to the Politicke and Militarie Discourses of the Lord de la Noue, translated by E. A. 1587, p. 351.

Condé meantime, well convinced that civil war was inevitable, concerted measures with the Admiral for the surprise of Orleans; a city, the possession of which, next to that of Paris, seemed most important to their interests. Commencing his march from Meaux, at the head of fifteen hundred horse, he was detained for several hours at Angeville by letters from the Queen, proposing accommodation; they had been despatched by the suggestion of the Triumvirate, and they nearly proved fatal to his enterprise. Warned, however, by a messenger from Coligny that the enemy sought only to amuse him, and that their troops, already advancing, might perhaps gain a march, he spang immediately to the saddle, nor drew bit till he arrived at the gates of Orleans. In his speed, many of his followers were either thrown from their horses, or lost their caps, gloves, cloaks, and other equipments by the way; so that the travellers whom they passed in their desperate gallop marvelled greatly at the uncouth spectacle which they presented, doubting whether they were madmen or drunkards.[*] It was on the first of April that the Prince entered Orleans, the streets of which city were lined by eagerly expectant Huguenots, singing Psalms as he passed between their ranks.

On reviewing his adherents, the Prince of Condé had good reason to be well pleased. Among the most distinguished were numbered the three Châtillons; Antoine de Croy, Prince of Porcean, one of the greatest captains of his time;[†] Francis Count of la Rochefoucault, an experienced officer, and the most rich and powerful Baron of Poitou; René Viscount of Rohan, a cousin of the Queen of Navarre; Antonie Count of Grammont, who headed six thousand veteran Gascons; Gabriel Count of Montgomery, the well-known soldier of Scottish descent, who had been compelled to absent himself from Court since the day of his fatal Just with Henry II.; the Lords of Soubise, of Duras, of Mony, of Esternoy, and his brother, of Genlis,[‡] all valiant commanders; besides a numerous train of other brave and gallant gentlemen of ancient families. By the advice of these distinguished counsellors, an association was formed in Orleans, on the 11th of April, after a solemn reception of the Communion. The manifesto which it immediately promulgated declared that the audacity, rashness, and ambition of certain subjects of the King were so great, that they had not only taken up arms against the royal edicts, but had also put to death a large number of peaceable citizens, assembled for the worship of God, under the protection of those edicts; and furthermore had seized the persons of the King and Queen, and the Duke of Orleans. That such acts evinced a design, under the pretended authority of the King, now imprisoned and detained in captivity, to ruin the true religion, and all those of the nobility and Tiers Etat, who had embraced it. That the undersigned, therefore, desirous to restore the King to safety and the Queen to authority, and to preserve to his subjects the liberty of conscience which had been guaranteed to them by royal edicts, advised and sanctioned by the Princes of the Blood, by the Privy Council, by the Notables, and by the majority of the States, were now compelled to have recourse to arms; the sole means with which God had furnished them for the resistance of oppression. They swore, therefore, before God and his angels, to observe inviolably, and in every point, the terms of the Association and Holy Companionship into which they now entered. First, they renounced all private interests and passions, addressing themselves entirely to the honour of God, the deliverance of the King and Queen, and the observance of the edicts; for which objects they would employ their bodies, their property, and their very last drop of blood. The Association should continue until the King attained his majority, at which time they would submit themselves entirely to his single will and pleasure, confident that they should be able to render a good account of the purity of both their motives and actions. Secondly, in order to evince that purity, they swore not to suffer any offence, which might derogate from the Commandments of God and the King, to be committed with impunity by any member of their association; determining to execute justice strictly against idolatries, superstitions, blasphemies, uncleanness, violence, rapes, pillage, breaking of images, plunder of churches, and in general against all acts prohibited by God and the edict of January. In order to secure obedience to the word of God, they determined to entertain among them good and faithful ministers, who should teach God's will, and to whom they would constantly afford a ready and patient hearing. Thirdly, they named for their chief and leader the Prince of Condé, by birth one of the natural Councillors and Protectors of the crown; they swore obedience to him in every thing which concerned the Association; submission to whatever punishments he should adjudge against rebellion or negligence; and equal obedience and submission to any deputy whom he might appoint, in case of an interruption of his executive duties. The Prince, on the other hand, accepted this high charge, in conformity with the tenor of all the conditions of the Association. Fourthly, they comprised and associated within their present fellowship, all members of the King's Council, excepting those who should bear arms against their conscience, and in order to restrain the free will of the King and Queen. Such persons they denounced as guilty of high treason, and as disturbers of the public tranquillity. For the above purposes, which they repeated were the maintenance of the honour of God, of the peace of the kingdom, and of the liberty of the King, under the government of the Queen his mother, all, from the highest to the lowest among them, swore to place at the disposal of the Prince of Condé, arms, horses, and personal service to the very uttermost extent of their ability; and whenever they should hear of violence committed against any member of their association, in any part of the kingdom, contrary to the edict of January, to assist him according to the Prince's orders, as if the wrong had been offered to themselves individually. Finally, if any treason or rebellion should be detected in their body, they swore, as they hoped for a portion in paradise, to reveal it on the moment to the Prince their leader.

A somewhat detailed notice of this important document has appeared necessary, because it throws much light on the avowed objects of the Huguenots; and by the extraordinary powers which it bestowed upon the Prince of Condé, plainly evinces the unbounded confidence reposed in him by his party. But our limits will not permit us to follow step by step the ensuing war of manifestos, which precluded the more active contest in the field. The Triumvirate, and their tool the Parliament of Paris, loudly affirmed that the King was in the enjoyment of entire liberty, and they employed his name in letters patent, as if issued by himself, to avouch this falsehood. They took pains also to impress a belief that the edict of January would be observed; but when it was added, that this was only to be considered a provisional law, and that Paris was to be excepted from its operation, the boon was rendered of little value.

[*] De Thou, xxix. 13. "Innumerable were the people that they mette by the waie going to Paris, who, beholding the mysterie of this course, and withal that none asked them anie question, did, for the most part, at the first thinke that all the fooles in Fraunce had been there assembled, or else that it had been for some wager . . . . . for ordinarilie by the waie they might behold servants cast downe, horses shouldered and tyred, and sumpters overthrowen, which bred continual sporte even in those which did runne."—De la Noue, 354.

[†] The Prince of Porcean, when on his death-bed, suspecting his wife, a niece of the Prince of Condé, of some inclination to Henry (son of Francis) Duke of Guise, made it his last request, that, if she married again, she would not bestow her hand upon that man in the kingdom whom he considered to be his greatest enemy. We do not know whether the widow-elect gave the promise required; but in due season she became Duchess of Guise.

During the fearful pause which now occurred while the hostile parties were gathering strength for battle, France was convulsed throughout her whole circuit; and each cause was dishonoured, perhaps with equal frequency, by the excesses of some of its followers. Even in Orleans, and under the very eye of the Huguenot leaders, who proclaimed and endeavoured to enforce the strictest discipline, fanatical violence exhibited itself in the continual plunder of churches and the demolition of their ornaments. The Prince of Condé, when summoned one day to repress a tumult in the church of St. Croix, repeatedly ordered an image-breaker to desist from his work of destruction. But the enthusiast pursued his task without noticing the command; till the Prince, irritated by his obstinacy, and willing to strike terror by a single strong example, levelled a pistol, and threatened him with instant death. Undeterred by this menace, the zealot calmly replied, "Have patience, Sir, but for a few minutes, until I have destroyed this idol, and then kill me if you please."*

Happy would it have been if senseless stones had proved the only objects of violence; but when on the occupation of Orleans, the chief cities in many of the surrounding provinces declared in favour of the association, the Huguenots in Maine, Anjou, Touraine, Poitou, Angoumois, and Berry, took arms and chased the priests, often not without much bloodshed, from the numerous opulent ecclesiastical foundations with which those districts abounded. On the other hand, Sens, Amiens, and Abbeville were severely visited by the Catholics; and in the first-named town more than 100 Huguenots perished in a single day. In the South, the devastation was still greater; Orange was sacked by a detachment of Papal troops from Avignon, who practised barbarities which we cannot venture to detail, but which are too well authenticated by the incontestible evidence of De Thou.† "Great and marvellous is the pity!" exclaims Pasquier, writing at the moment, "every body asserts his religion, his loyalty, and his patriotism, but I see not one who under these goodly pretexts does not do his utmost to ruin the kingdom from its very base. All around me is trouble and confusion." "It would be impossible," he continues, "to relate the manifold atrocities committed on the one side and on the other. Wherever the Huguenots have the mastery, they shatter the images, those ancient cements of popular devotion; they demolish monuments and sepulchres, so that in passing through Clery they violated even the tomb of Louis XI., and they plunder all the treasure which piety has hallowed in the churches. In reprisal, the Catholics stab, drown, and massacre every sectary whom they recognise, so that the very rivers are choaked with the dead. And many are those who, affecting to espouse the public quarrel, revenge their own private feuds, and perpetrate crimes at which their leaders are forced to connive."‡

Upon themes thus revolting, it is by no means our intention to expatiate;§ but there are two personages who obtained by their enormities a notoriety so hideous, that the history of the times would be imperfect if we passed them over wholly in silence. Blaise de Montluc, governor of Guyenne, had adopted principles widely different from those professed by his brother the Bishop of Valence. "He was very cruel in these civil wars," says a writer, who has endeavoured to represent his crimes as so many virtues, "and he gained in them large sums of money; so that although in their outset he was but scantily provided, at their close he found 100,000 crowns in his coffers; yet he did not wish for the total extermination of the Huguenots, it being a favourite maxim with him that a tree which yielded fruit so rich should neither be cut down nor uprooted." This savage, whose reckless perpetration of wholesale butchery obtained for him the distinguished honour of a marshalship of France, has taken pains to blazon the atrocities of which he felt proud; and every step in his career of blood has been traced by his own pen in autobiographical commentaries. No sooner had he received the commission by which he was authorised to ravage his province, than he began strict inquisition into the "strange names" of overseers, deacons, consistories, synods, and conferences; "food of which kind," he adds, "never yet had furnished me with a breakfast." In a similar strain of bitter sportiveness, which, like the sneer of Goëthe's embodied fiend, aggravates the horrors he is relating, he proceeds to inform us that in the outset he secretly provided himself with two executioners; that, from their constant attendance upon him, they went familiarly by the name of his lacqueys, and that both were completely equipped for their trade, and furnished above all with a very keen-edged axe. Thus esquired, he issued forth on his first adventure, and at St. Mezard he encountered four Huguenots, who were accused of having spoken disrespectfully of the King. Seizing one of them by the throat, and loading him with terms of execration, he dashed him forcibly to the ground, where he fell against the stump of a broken cross. Then calling out to the executioner "strike scoundrel!" it was not easy to tell whether the words or the blow were first ended, and half a foot of the broken cross was cut through at the same time with the neck of the victim. Of the others, two were hanged on the next tree; the last, a deacon but eighteen years of age, received assurance that his life should be spared, but was so severely beaten that he expired ten days afterwards. "And this," concludes Montluc triumphantly, "was my first achievement when I set out from home, without either sentence or writing, for I had heard say that it was wisest to begin with execution." At Cahors, in one day, "to make short work," thirty or "forty" Huguenots, (so carelessly did he keep account of human life!) were hanged or broken on the wheel. At Gironde, sixty were strung up at once to the colonnade of the Town hall. At the storming of Montsegur, he numbered 700 dead bodies in the streets, and rejoiced in the farther assurance that a great many other victims had perished by leaping over the walls. At Pene, and afterwards at Lectoure, he filled up very deep wells with the corpses of the slain; in the latter place the festering piles were heaped so near the mouth that they might be touched by the hand; and in both cases he chuckles at the remembrance "that it was an excellent method of disposing of those naughty boys." But the consummation of his brutal delight was reserved for Toulouse, in which city, as he records with overflowing satisfaction, he "saw more heads fly than ever he had seen before!"

Impossible as it may appear, Montluc was equalled, if not exceeded in barbarity by one whom ungovernable resentment and temporary interest induced for a while to ally himself to the antagonists of the Triumvirate; but whose total want of principle and subsequent bitter enmity against the Huguenots happily exclude him from even nominal connexion with them in their religious profession. Françoise de Beaumont, Baron des Adrets, after having served in youth with no small distinction in Italy, was frustrated in a legal process by the influence of the Duke of Guise, and retired to his estate in Dauphiné thirsting for revenge. By his intrigues in that province, having excited a tumult which led to the assassination of its governor, he seized his office; and announced to the Queen Mother, with whom he entertained a secret correspondence, that he had been elevated to it by popular election; and that, together with the faithful subjects who had selected him as their leader, he was about to march on Paris for her deliverance. His operations, however, were directed in the first instance on Lyons, which he surprised and mastered; and by rapid and most unexpected movements he spread terror throughout every city of the South, "which dreaded him more than a hurricane sweeping over the standing corn." Continuing to act in the name of the Prince of Condé, he enriched himself by pillage from every town which he occupied, and especially by the demolition of the opulent and celebrated Chartreux, near Grenoble, the Parliament of which city he compelled to attend the Huguenot service. On one occasion, after having sacked the castle of Monthrison, in Veneissin, he put half of its garrison to the sword at the moment, and reserved their comrades, to whom he had promised quarter, for a more horrible mode of death, which he had on former occasions inflicted elsewhere. The keep of the castle was remarkable for its height, and Des Adrets seating himself after dinner on its platform, commanded that his prisoners should be led out, and looked on with grim delight while they were forced to throw themselves from its battlements. One only out of the whole number escaped, and he owed his life to a cool and ready answer. He had already run thrice to the very edge of the tower, and as often had shrunk back from the fatal leap, when Des Adrets impatiently taunted him with cowardice, and desired him not to lose more time. To his no small surprise, the soldier turned round without one mark of fear, and replied with unmoved self-possession, "Brave as you may be, my Lord Baron, I will give you ten times before you take that same jump." Struck by so unexpected a challenge, the wretch relented; but in the same breath in which he gave this victim freedom, he summoned another to the tower, and renewed the horrors of his diversion. When intelligence of these atrocities reached the ears of the associated Huguenots, they exclaimed that Des Adrets was a Goliah who dishonoured the armies of Israel, and the Prince of Condé immediately superseded him in the command with which he had been unworthily entrusted. This dismissal awakened feelings of resentment in Des Adrets more lasting than those which he had entertained against the Duke of Guise; and at a subsequent period we find him engaged in open warfare against the Reformed, although with success far different from that by which he had been distinguished while their adherent.

‡ Lettres, tom. i. liv. iv. pp. 232, 233.

To return to Orleans. The IIId Synod of the French Reformed church was held in that city on the 25th of April, but its transactions were altogether unimportant. The Prince of Condé, well aware that the Guises had negotiated for auxiliaries, both with the Pope and with the king of Spain, sought to strengthen himself also by a foreign alliance. None, however, could be more odious to France than that in which he engaged, and none was ever more unproductive of advantage. The greater part of Normandy was in his possession, and he offered to deliver Havre to the English, provided Elizabeth would garrison it with 3000 men, furnish 3000 more for the defence of Rouen and Dieppe and advance a subsidy of 100,000 crowns. This proposal was readily accepted, and the troops were immediately despatched; but Dieppe being found untenable, was as immediately abandoned. It could not but be remarked, much to Condé's injury, that he thus voluntarily surrendered to the inveterate enemies of his country, a post commanding the mouth of the Seine, furnishing a key to the very heart of the kingdom, and far more important than Calais, which the bravery of the Duke of Guise had won from their dominion. Elizabeth hated the Guises from her very soul; the duke had commanded the French army by which Calais had been reconquered; the Cardinal of Lorraine had been indefatigable in efforts to procure her excommunication at Rome; and both of them were uncles to Mary of Scotland, her rival both as a queen and as a woman. In her manifesto, therefore, on concluding this treaty, she pointedly denounced them as authors of the troubles under which France was suffering; she spoke of the danger to which the person of the Christian king, her good brother, was exposed by the ambition of some of his subjects, which not only placed his own realm in peril, but all Christendom also, and especially England. Alluding to Vassy, she lamented that the name of the captive king had been abused to authorize the butchery of his unarmed and innocent people, the sack and spoil of his richest cities, the breach of his best advised edicts, the persecution of the princes of his blood and of his nobles, the ruin and destruction of his loyal servants. These and an infinity of similar crimes, she said, were perpetrated for no other object than to satisfy the particular interests and passions of certain individuals, who had violently broken down ordinances framed after long and mature deliberation by the states of the kingdom, for the repose and tranquillity of religion, and for the good of the realm and its sovereign. She then complained that many of her subjects trading to Britany had been seized and plundered, and those who defended themselves massacred, by officers of the French government, under no other pretext than that they were what are called Huguenots; that her remonstrances had been disregarded, and therefore that, in order to counteract the violence of the Duke of Guise (mentioning him by name) and his adherents, she had resolved to send over troops who might preserve certain ports for her brother, the king, during his minority. In conclusion, she affirmed before God, his angels, and all mankind, that she had no one object in view except the defence of the loyal subjects of her said brother, who apparently could not otherwise escape destruction.*

We pass over the fruitless negotiations between Catherine and the Prince of Condé. Their personal conference at Thuri,† in the beginning of June, appears to have produced increased exacerbation; and the queen either possessed, or affected to possess, but little power to assent to any proposition which Condé might be justified in advancing. When negotiation failed, an attempt was made by the parliament of Paris to separate the Prince of Condé from his associates; for in an Arrêt issued by its authority, exceptions were made in his single favour, while the Châtillons and other Huguenot leaders were denounced as enemies of God and of the crown of France, disturbers of public repose, and criminals guilty of high treason, whom it was the duty of every loyal subject to arrest and bring to punishment. The prince avoided the snare by a declaration in which he identified himself in all points with his friends.

Both armies were now in the field; and a pleasing picture has been drawn of the moral discipline of the Huguenots at the opening of the campaign. Prayers were read night and morning at the head of each regiment, by its own minister; no cursing nor reviling was heard in the ranks; no gambling nor debauchery sullied the camp. Peasants, tradesmen and strangers resorted in safety to the military quarters, and neither the hope of forage nor of plunder allured the soldiers from their standards. In numbers they were much inferior to the Royalists; who being thus enabled to adopt their own choice of movement, successfully occupied Blois and Tours; stormed Poitiers, and put its garrison to the sword; obtained possession of Bourges through the culpable weakness of its governor; and then determined upon the investment of Rouen, before it could be strengthened by the arrival of the English.

That city, the strongest in Normandy, was entrusted to the charge of Montgomery, the most enterprising chief among the Huguenots. Its garrison consisted of 1500 veteran infantry, nearly 600 horse, and a numerous band of civic militia, in whose ranks many women served with distinguished bravery. To these were afterwards added a re-inforcement of 220 English, under Lord Grey. The king, the queen mother, and the king of Navarre, took their station in the lines. Catherine was bitterly indignant when she saw the English detachment enter the city, apprehending that it might ultimately fall into their possession. She daily reconnoitred the outworks, regardless of the shower of balls which fell around; and when the Duke of Guise and constable remonstrated against her exposure to danger, she told them laughingly that she had full as much courage though not as much strength as themselves. The Duke of Guise pushed his approaches rapidly; and his Mines, the chief weapons employed in sieges in those times, were so skilfully constructed that ultimate success appeared certain. Three weeks had passed in these operations, when the king of Navarre,—who, however deficient in moral courage, was physically brave, and who was piqued by the superior reputation which the Duke of Guise had acquired,—exposing himself too openly in the trenches, was struck by a musket ball. Twelve more days elapsed before a final assault—it was the seventh—proved successful. The carnage was then horrible; Montgomery made good his retreat, but the greater part of the English detachment perished in the breach, and the city was given up, during eight days and nights, to the license of a ferocious soldiery. Wearied with adjudging to imprisonment the numerous Huguenots who were dragged before him, Brevedent, the lieutenant of police, at length recommended from the seat of magistracy a more summary process. "Why," said he, with a hideous blasphemy, "do you crowd the dungeons? Can you doubt what you ought to do? Is the river yet full?" Nor was it only from the first horrors of a triumphant storm that the miserable Rouenese were to suffer: their protracted defence, which for its gallantry might have excited admiration, was viewed as a crime; and its chief authors having escaped the fury of war, were destined in cooler blood to execution. Jean de Bosc, Lord of Mandeville and President of the Court of Aids, was beheaded. A less honourable punishment was inflicted on two ancient councillors of the city, and on Augustin Marlorat, one of the twelve ministers who, it will be remembered, had been deputed to Poissy. The prisoners met their fate with constancy, more especially Marlorat, who was exposed to much rudeness and even violence from the bystanders at his execution. His death excited profound grief and indignation at Orleans, and two prisoners of some note, the Abbé de Gastines and Baptist Sapin, the latter a councillor of parliament and brother-in-law of the first president Le Maître, were dragged to the scaffold in reprisal.

* The Manifesto may be found at length in the Mem. de Condé, iii. 694.

† De la Noue, who was present at the conference, has left a very touching picture of it. One hundred men on either side accompanied the queen and Condé respectively, and they were ordered to keep at a considerable distance asunder. "Having thus beheld eyther other for the space of halfe an houre, each coveting to see one his brother, another his unkle, cousen, friende, or old companion, they craved leave of their superiours, which was hardlie graunted, in respect that at the first they were forbidden to meete for feare of injuryes and affrayes. But so far were they from quarrelling, that contrariwise there was nothing but salutations and embracings of such as could not forbeare the demonstration of amitie unto those whome parentage or honestie had united unto them. . . . . . . Then waighing with themselves that all these greetings would bee converted into bloudie murthers, uppon the least token of battayle that the superiours shoulde give; that the viseardes being shut and readie, furie having vayled their sight, one brother would scarce pardon another, the water even stoode in their eyes. Myselfe was then among the Protestants, and I may trulie saie, that on the other side there were a douzen friendes whom I accounted as deere as my owne brethren, who also bore me lyke affection. Private amitie did as then live, but since these great calamities had course, and conversation discontinued, it is even dead in many."—356.

The unexampled escapes of an otherwise obscure individual from the perils of death, on more than one occasion during this siege, have given him fair title to remembrance. François de Civille, a gentleman serving in the garrison at the head of his own company, was wounded in one of the assaults by a musket ball, which entering at the right jaw lodged in the hinder part of his neck. Falling into the ditch, without any signs of life, he was immediately stripped by the pioneers, thrown together with another corpse into a hole, and loosely covered with earth. This rude burial happened about mid-day; and, at night-fall, a servant of De Civille, anxious to convey his master's remains to his family, obtained assistance and disinterred both bodies. Wounds and blood however had so totally disfigured them, that even this faithful retainer was unable to distinguish which was that of his master, and he hastily replaced them in their graves; but as he withdrew, observing that an arm of one of them was still uncovered, he returned to protect it from violation by the dogs. While employed in this pious office, the moon shone brightly on one of the fingers still encircled by a diamond ring, which he recognized as his master's; and overjoyed at this first discovery, he was still more so when upon again disengaging the entire body he found that it retained warmth, and some faint tokens of breathing. The surgeons to whom he conveyed it, perplexed by the great number of wounded, refused attention to a case which they at once pronounced to be desperate; and four days elapsed during which De Civille received neither sustenance nor medical aid. At length, his wounds being dressed and some food administered, although not without difficulty from the convulsive locking of the teeth, he was slowly advancing to recovery, at the moment of the storm. During the horrors of that attack, the chamber in which he was lying helpless and unprotected was forced, and he was thrown by some ruffians from its window into the court-yard. His fall was luckily broken by a dung-heap below, on which during three days and nights he lay unassisted and without nourishment, till having been found and relieved by some friends, he recovered, and survived for more than forty years afterwards.

The fate of the King of Navarre was less happy. He was conveyed on a shutter from the trenches immediately after receiving his wound; and although he suffered so much agony from the motion that his bearers were frequently compelled to stop, and the surgeons on examination were unable to find the ball, the hurt at first was not considered dangerous. His hours of confinement were spent in toying with La Rouet and in feeding an idle fancy on exaggerated visions of the riches and delights of his promised Sardinian kingdom. When informed of the capture of Rouen, although still a prisoner to his couch, he projected a triumphal entry. The wall of his chamber was thrown down, to allow the passage of a litter, and he was carried in it through the breach in the ramparts, preceded by military music. His wound meanwhile was prevented from healing by the presence of the ball and of some pieces of shattered bone; and the commencement of internal mortification threatened a fatal result. As his danger manifestly increased, he threw aside all worldly thoughts, and bent himself wholly to the care of his salvation. Still halting, however, between the two creeds, he first confessed and received the viaticum, according to the Catholic rites: and afterwards, when visited by Catherine, who urged upon him attention to the Scriptures, he summoned one of his physicians, Raphael de Mezieres, a Protestant, listened attentively to him while he read the book of Job, and then declared that, if he were permitted to recover, he would openly profess and maintain the tenets of the Confession of Augsburg. Wearied by the tediousness of his confinement, he sought relief from change of air and place, in opposition to all medical advice, and while proceeding in a boat down the Seine, he was seized with shiverings, and compelled to land at Andely. It seemed as if neither church were willing to relax its doubtful hold upon his belief, while he retained one breath of life: for as Raphael prayed by his side during his last agonies, a Dominican friar was stealthily introduced in disguise through the zeal of his brother, the Cardinal de Bourbon. The King evinced consciousness of the monk's presence, without however paying him attention. Already in the convulsions of death, he grasped the beard of one of his domestics, an Italian, and with his last words, urged him to be faithful to the Prince his son, and to warn that son to preserve his fealty to the crown of France. He died on the 17th of November, in the forty-fourth year of his age, little respected or regretted by either of the contending parties; and more blamed for the abuse, than approved for the possession of any good qualities with which he might have been originally endowed.*

Condé meanwhile had been largely reinforced from Germany; whence the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Wirtemburg, the Elector of Saxony, and the Landgrave of Hesse had despatched to his assistance 3300 Reitres and 4000 Lansquenets;† a force enabling him to move on Paris, which he hoped to find almost defenceless. The enterprise miscarried in consequence of the rapidity with which a portion of the royal army broke up from Rouen; and Condé retired on Normandy in disappointment. Thither also he was quickly followed; and the hostile forces took up a position near the little town of Dreux, so close to each other that a battle appeared inevitable. The Constable and St. André, however, who were in command of the Royalists, shrank from the responsibility, and they had recourse to Catherine for instructions. Never was the ingenuity of that wily Queen more severely taxed to avoid committing herself by a perilous decision, and never was she more happy in securing her extrication from difficulty. "What?" she inquired sarcastically of Castelman, the bearer of the demand, by whom this interview is related, "do the great captains of our time, send to ask a woman and a child whether Frenchmen shall draw their swords against each other? Nurse," she continued, turning to the King's nurse, a Huguenot, who chanced to enter the apartment at the moment, "since women are now chosen as Councillors, let us hear your opinion—shall the army give battle or not? The nurse, when pressed, replied more than once, that since the Huguenots would not listen to reason, she thought a battle was necessary. The privy council resolved that those who were honoured with military command were alone competent to judge of the propriety of military movements; and the generals, satisfied to find that the wish which they privily cherished for engagement did not meet with opposition at Court, resolved to give battle without farther delay.

The memorable day which followed was not without its omens. "Of the two incidents which I am about to relate," says the Historian who records them, "I can fully avouch the truth; one I witnessed with my own eyes; the other I heard with my own ears." On the morning before the battle, as Condé was passing a rivulet near the Castle of Maintenon, an aged woman, stepping into the mid stream, caught hold of his boot and stopped him. Then, after regarding him for a while earnestly in the face, she loosed her grasp, uttering these words: "Go on, Prince! much wilt thou suffer, but God is with thee." The Prince compassionating the wildness of her manner, moved by the solemnity of her expressions, or willing to encourage his followers by accepting the prophecy of good fortune, answered by thanks and a request for her prayers.

* Le Roy de Navarre est mort d'un coup de bale, qui n'est regreté des uns ny des autres. Pasquier Lettres, liv. iv. tom. i. p. 234. But his character is, for the most part, represented with numerous contradictions; and the single point on which historians agree, regards the fineness of his person. Garnier, who may be trusted for having consulted most of his predecessors, after describing him as largely gifted with excellence by nature, as full of integrity, bravery, generosity, and as being in all points "a good citizen," finishes the picture by informing us that he had nevertheless one little defect: he was irresistibly given to picking pockets (filouterie), insomuch that his pages always searched his clothes after he had undressed, in order that they might restore the property which they contained to the persons from whom he had stolen it.—xv. 370. Quel vrai citoyen!

The second occurrence is far more striking. Condé on that same night being already in bed, and conversing familiarly with his attendants, turned to the minister who had just read prayers to the company. "To-morrow," he said, "if I am not much mistaken, whatever the Admiral may think, we shall certainly fight. Now, although I know that little faith is to be given to dreams, I must tell you that which I dreamed last night. I thought that I had engaged in three battles, one after the other, and that I finally gained a victory, seeing my three enemies dead. But I myself, also, was mortally wounded; so that, having ordered the three corpses to be laid one upon the other, I placed myself above them, and rendered up my spirit to God." If it were Beza (and it probably was so) to whom the above words were spoken, he answered wisely with regard to the origin of these sleeping images, stating that the dream was the result of the waking thoughts by which the Prince had long been anxiously occupied. The vague prediction hazarded by the excited fancy of the new Sibyl demands little notice; but the subsequent realization of Condé's dream, to the very letter, may justly be numbered among the most remarkable of those coincidences which have sometimes appeared to defy the ridicule, if not to refute the reasonings, of that scepticism which denies the existence of any presentiment of futurity.*

Military details little belong to our narrative. The Battle of Dreux would have been won by the Huguenots, but for the coolness and presence of mind of the Duke of Guise.† That prince, who had twice held the distinguished rank of Lieutenant-general of France, did not choose on this occasion to act subordinately to the Constable; much less did he wish to dispute the command with him. He took his post, therefore, with a body of reserve, forming about six hundred horse, and chiefly composed of his own private friends. With these troops he was to act at discretion; and at a critical moment, when the rashness of the Constable had sacrificed one entire division, and lost both his own liberty and that of St. André, who had hastened to his assistance, Guise, by a seasonable charge, compelled the Admiral to retire, and thus, by keeping possession of the field, established his claim to victory. The loss on each side had been nearly equal; and between the two armies, not fewer than eight thousand men were killed. Among them was the Maréchal de St. André himself, pistoled in cold blood after he had surrendered, by a gentlemen named Bobigny, in revenge for a private wrong. But the most remarkable chance of war was that by which each of the opposing commanders in chief became a prisoner in the hands of his enemy. Montmorency was wounded and captured early in the day. The Prince of Condé, fighting even after the retreat of the Admiral, and ever found among the rearmost of the combatants as his own division slowly followed, would have drawn off in safety, but for the exhaustion of his horse. His interview with the Duke of Guise, when led to his tent after the battle, was distinguished by chivalrous feeling on both sides. Their numerous mutual injuries, the strong desire which each had avowed for revenge by an appeal to personal combat, their hostility but a few minutes before on the field of battle; all these causes of repulsion were forgotten in each other's presence; they exchanged courtesies and kindnesses, partook of the same table, and at night, as Condé's baggage was lost, according to a custom warranted by the times, they shared the same bed.

Paris meantime was deeply agitated. Rumours had arrived of a total defeat, and it had been confirmed by fugitives from the scene of blood itself. One of these evil messengers, a Gascon officer of distinguished courage, named D'Aussun, having witnessed the signal discomfiture of the Constable, and thinking that all was lost, rode at full speed to the capital, and announced the misfortune. So profound was his sensitiveness of wounded honour, that when he afterwards learned the real event of the battle, in spite of the endeavours of the Duke of Guise to restore his self-esteem, by reminding him of his former well-earned and brilliant reputation, he refused all food, and died after five days of mental suffering, more acute than that arising from his voluntary abstinence. The conduct of the Queen Mother during these few trying hours of suspense has been variously represented; and a speech has been sometimes attributed to her, fully characteristic of her undisguised indifference concerning religion. "Is it so?" are said to have been her words when informed that the royal army was defeated, "then we shall say our prayers in French!" But the story is improbable; for Catherine's fears must have been too powerfully awakened at that moment to permit the escape of so light an expression. Whatever might have been her wishes or designs before the open outbreak of war, and however much she might have rejoiced in any check to the power of the Triumvirate, she had latterly exhibited herself in too close union with them, not to render a complete triumph of the Huguenots a subject of the most painful apprehension; and she must have wished more than ever for the preservation of her favourite balance of parties. She had amused and deceived Condé; she had proclaimed the Châtillons traitors, and menaced them with the infliction of capital punishment; and what forbearance was to be expected from such enemies if left uncontrolled? Great, therefore, was her relief when, on the morning following the battle, a despatch arrived from the Duke of Guise, giving a succinct account of the alternations of fortune, and accompanied with the captured standards as a proof of its happy result.

Catherine, however, was still involved in no small difficulty. Freed from alarm at Coligny's possible resentment, she now perceived that the Duke of Guise had become all-powerful from the absence of competition. The deaths of the King of Navarre and of St. André, and the captivity of Montmorency, had left him without a rival; and, if the Queen had hesitated to bestow, he was doubtless fully prepared to extort the appointment of Lieutenant-general of the Kingdom. In that authority, he greatly strengthened himself by an unusually lavish distribution of military patronage; and, having promoted the chief officers whose attachment he either wished to secure or had already experienced, in the commencement of the following year he made preparations for besieging Orleans. The Admiral, after a skilful retreat, had wintered in that city, where he had been unanimously elected Chief of the Huguenot Association, during the captivity of their original leader. As Spring began, he left the garrison well provided, and made an incursion into Normandy with his Reisters; and while he was absent on that expedition, the Duke of Guise commenced the seige. Under his active superintendance, the approaches were rapidly conducted; and so proudly confident did he feel of success, that when some one spoke of difficulty, he replied with an oath, that since the sun found entrance into Orleans, he also would enter it. But, on the evening of the 18th of February, while returning to his quarters, after having made dispositions for a general assault on that very night, with almost a certainty of success, he was wounded in the back of the right shoulder by three pistol-bullets. Unapprehensive of danger, and consulting his ease, he had laid aside his cuirass; and the shock at first made him bow upon his horse's neck; but soon recovering, he observed to the two attendants with whom he had been conversing, "They have long owed me this, but I think it will be nothing." The wound, however, quickly manifested dangerous appearances, and he prepared for death with great firmness and devotion. The Queen Mother visited him; he took an affectionate leave of his Duchess; tenderly exhorted his eldest son Henry; and made a pointed declaration, which few will be so uncharitable as to disbelieve, that he was innocent of any premeditated intention of bloodshed at Vassy; and, after lingering six days, expired in his forty-fourth year, leaving behind him a reputation for lofty powers of intellect, for courtesy, generosity, and valour, not exceeded by that of any of his contemporaries. How far these liberal gifts of nature were marred and defaced by immeasurable ambition, may be best determined by asking from the foregoing narrative in what degree they contributed to the glory, the happiness, or the tranquillity of his suffering country?

* Hist. des Egl. Ref. tom. ii. 228, 9, a portion probably written by Beza, who was present at the Battle of Dreux.

† De La Noue mentions a very striking particularity in this battle most characteristic of the miseries of civil war. "Although both armies were above two long houres within a cannon-shot each of other, as well to put themselves in array as to contemplate their adversaries, yet was there not any skirmish, small or great, before the general battell; albeit, in many other battels that have been fought, the same have been the forerunners. . . . . They every man stoode fast, imaging in himselfe that they who came against him were no Spaniards, Englishmen, nor Italians, but Frenchmen and those of the bravest; among whom were their companions, friendes, and kinsefolkes, as also that within one houre they were to slay each other. This bred some horror; neverthelesse, without quayling in courage, they thus stayed untill the armies moved to joyne."—380.

The wretched perpetrator of this foul assassination was Jean de Poltrot, Sieur de Merei in the province of Angoumois, misrepresented by a recent Historian as "a deserter from the Huguenot army, and in the pay of the Admiral." The first of these statements, as we shall perceive, is altogether untrue; the second does not contain the whole truth, and implies a falsehood. Poltrot, although scarcely six and twenty years of age, had seen much service, not altogether of the most reputable nature. His first employment was under the Seigneur de Feuquieres, formerly governor to the young King, for whom he acted as a spy in the wars of Picardy; and he next attached himself to the Sieur de Soubise, at that time commanding in Lyons. To that officer he once stated his intention of delivering France from her miseries by the assassination of the Duke of Guise; and the declaration was received as wild and idle talk, which Soubise, however, thought it right to correct, by charging the boaster to perform his ordinary duties, and to leave God to execute His own purposes by His own methods. Not long afterwards, Poltrot was sent, accidentally as it seems, with a despatch to the Admiral, then at Selles in Berri; and he conveyed at the same time a request from Soubise (which is worthy of observation as refuting all suspicion of a designed transfer of this envoy to the Admiral's service,) that he might not be detained, as he was of use in Lyons. At his own request, however, he proceeded round by Orleans, in which place he stated that he had private business to transact. The Admiral, on his return, unexpectedly found him in that city; and, having heard more from Feuquieres of his peculiar capabilities, he gave him twenty crowns, and commissioned him to make observations on the enemy's camp. There, the ready knave obtained an introduction to the Duke of Guise, and so far deceived him as to be engaged on his side also for some treacherous attempt on Orleans, whither accordingly he returned without suspicion. The Admiral was satisfied with the information which he brought back; and wishing to procure yet closer insight into the designs of the besiegers, when Poltrot complained that he was badly mounted for an enterprise which might require a fleet horse, he ordered him a hundred crowns more to effect his desired purchase. Such, there can be little doubt, was the uttermost extent of Poltrot's connection with the Admiral, and so far and no farther was he "in his pay." His introduction to the Duke of Guise was obtained under the pretext of desertion from the Huguenots; but his real title was yet lower in the evil graduation of dishonour; he was not a deserter, but a spy.

After a short second abode in the camp before Orleans, Poltrot, on the morning of the fatal day, mounted his new horse, and riding to a wood in the neighbourhood, fell on his knees and prayed fervently to God that if the act he was about to commit was displeasing in His eyes, He would so far influence him by inward grace as to produce a change in his design; if otherwise, that He would strengthen and confirm him in his great purpose. "At the conclusion of this prayer," he says in one of his confessions, "I arose with so much lightness of spirit, that it seemed as if God led me by the hand to the execution of my enterprise." He took his post accordingly, and levelling a pistol at the Duke's shoulders as he passed, from a suspicion that he might wear a shirt of mail, he discharged it with murderous effect at the distance of six or seven paces. Then, clapping spurs to his horse, he eluded immediate pursuit; but after riding the greater part of the night, he discovered, on the following morning, that in consequence of his agitation and of want of sufficient acquaintance with the country, he had travelled nearly in a circle, and was still almost close to the spot whence he had originally started.* Both himself and his horse were so overpowered with fatigue, that repose became necessary; and, while sleeping profoundly in a neighbouring farm-house, he was arrested on suspicion, and soon acknowledged his crime.

In reviewing the numerous and contradictory depositions which were afterwards extorted from Poltrot, the conclusion at which we arrive respecting his character is, that he was simply a mercenary ruffian; who, although he had not bargained for his deed of blood beforehand, felt strong expectation that it would be rewarded after its perpetration. No tinge of insanity discolours his confessions; and except in the single instance of the prayer above mentioned, which rests but on his own worthless authority, not a trace appears of the fanaticism and mistaken sense of duty which afterwards deluded Jacques Clement and Ravaillac into the commission of similar crimes. When first seized and examined before the Queen and council as to his employers, he accused the Seigneur de Feuquieres, and a Captain Brieu who had been killed before Rouen. Those persons, he added, introduced him to the Admiral, who renewed the proposal, and offered golden recompense. The Comte de la Rochefoucault was privy to the design; and Beza and another minister with whose name he was unacquainted, but whom he described to be of low stature with a black beard, represented it as pleasing to God and as a sure passport to Heaven. After these denouncements, he warned the Queen that similar attempts were meditated against her life also; and that he had seen in the Admiral's suite numerous determined spirits who had devoted themselves to the removal of every Catholic who might be appointed to succeed the Duke of Guise in his command. These avowals were alternately repeated and denied with a view no doubt of gaining time and postponing his sentence, till on the 18th of March, the prisoner, after undergoing the question, was immediately dragged from his agonies in the chamber of torture to the Place de Grêve, there to endure the yet more fearful and protracted sufferings which the French law adjudged as the punishment of a regicide.*

To the criminatory depositions of Poltrot, an answer was returned under the signatures of the admiral, the Comte de la Rochefoucault and Beza, replying clause by clause to the accusations. The admiral explained his acquaintance with the assassin in terms similar to those in which we have already stated it; and then most particularly declared before God and man that the charge of instigating him to his crime was falsely and wickedly conceived; that all the world was acquainted with what had passed between the Duke of Guise and himself; that he admitted frankly that before the late tumults he had known several persons who avowed an intention of killing the said duke, but that he had invariably discouraged and discountenanced such a course; and, as the Duchess of Guise could sufficiently testify, had often forewarned her late husband of the times and places designed. That it was true that since the massacre at Vassy, and since he had been compelled to draw his sword for the maintenance of the king's edict and the protection of the poor oppressed against the violence of the said duke and his adherents, he had continually pursued them as public enemies of God and the king; nevertheless he protested, on his life and honour, that he had never given assent or approval to any attempt upon the person of the said duke; while on the other hand he well knew that both the duke and the Maréchal de St. André had employed agents for the assassination of the Prince of Condé, of himself, and of his brother the Sieur d'Andelot. He acknowledged that, on this account, whenever he had since heard any one say he would kill the Duke of Guise if he had the power, he had not been forward in forbidding him; but once more he declared upon his life and honour, that he had never courted, nor induced, nor solicited any person to such an act by words, money, or promises, by himself or by any other, directly or indirectly. He then explained the services on account of which he had given money to Poltrot; noticed the improbability, even if he had entertained the design imputed to him, that he should have admitted a person of such a class to his confidence; and concluded by owning his recollection that Poltrot once told him it would be an easy matter to kill the Duke of Guise; but that he paid little attention to the words at the time, and upon his life and honour had never opened his lips to encourage the proposition.

La Rochefoucalt peremptorily denied that he had ever heard the design mentioned. Beza declared that, notwithstanding the great and general indignation aroused against the Duke of Guise on account of the massacre at Vassy, he had never entertained an opinion that he should be proceeded against otherwise than by the methods of ordinary justice; for the attainment of which purpose he had assisted with other deputies from the Reformed churches in presenting a memorial to the queen and the late king of Navarre. He admitted that since the duke had commenced the war, he had exhorted the Reformed both by letters and sermons to use their arms; but he had at the same time inculcated the utmost possible moderation, and had instructed them to seek peace above all things next to the honour of God; taking heed that they were not deceived. Moreover, that since he esteemed the Duke of Guise to be the principal author and fosterer of these troubles, he had numberless times prayed God that he would either change the duke's heart, (of which indeed he never entertained any hope) or else that he would deliver the kingdom from his tyranny: but that he had never held communication either by himself or any other, with Poltrot, with whom indeed he was wholly unacquainted. In the act committed by that person, however, he recognized the just judgment of God, menacing similar or yet greater punishments to all the confederated enemies of his holy Gospel, who are the occasion of so many miseries and calamities to France. Then, commenting on some particular phrases which Poltrot had attributed to him, he expressed a willingness to rest his defence singly upon their manifest falsehood: for, God be thanked! he was not so ill instructed in his duty as to misapply Scripture by exhorting one who designed to commit murder, to "take up his Cross even as his Saviour had taken it up;" and much less did it accord with the doctrine which he professed, to promise any man Paradise as a reward for his works.

* A similar instance of bewilderment, arising from guilt and fear, occasioned the apprehension of James of Lindsay, after he had assassinated Roger Kirkpatrick in his own castle of Caerlaveroc. See Sir Walter Scott's Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, iii. 359.

* The Duke of Guise, as Lieutenant-General of France, resented the person of the King; and therefore his murder was considered to be regicide.

This paper, when signed, was despatched to the queen before Poltrot's execution, with a request that he might be committed to secure custody, in order that, whenever peace, so much to be desired, should be concluded, he might be confronted with those whom he had accused; and in case this means of justification should be denied by his immediate execution, protesting against such a measure as injurious to their good repute. A letter from the admiral to Catherine accompanied their joint declaration; and it concluded with words which no man could have employed whose conscience accused him of being accessory to murder. "Nevertheless, Madam, I would not have you suppose that I use these expressions out of any regret for the death of M. de Guise; for I esteem it the greatest blessing which could have happened to this realm, to the church of God, and especially to myself and to all my house; and it remains with your majesty's pleasure whether it shall not be the means of restoring tranquillity to France." It is not with so frank an avowal of undisguised satisfaction that an assassin speaks of the death of him whose murder he has privily compassed; and Coligny's innocence of this dark crime may be fairly deduced from the sincerity with which he expresses his sense of the great advantages resulting from its commission.

The punishment adjudged to the assassin had been that of a regicide. The obsequies of the murdered duke were celebrated on the day of Poltrot's execution with regal pomp and at the public expense; and his corpse, after a solemn service at Nôtre Dâme, was conveyed to the family sepulchre at Joinville. His high offices were partitioned between his sons, although as yet only boys; Henry Prince of Joinville became grand master of the palace and governor of Champagne; and Charles, afterwards Duke de Mayenne, was invested with the dignity of grand chamberlain. Meantime the great revolution in the prospects of the Catholics, occasioned by the death of Guise and the captivity of Montmorency, had rendered them anxious for peace. Catherine and the Prince of Condé opened a preliminary correspondence, and more formal negotiations were afterwards commenced between the two illustrious commanders, who were still detained prisoners. Condé at first peremptorily demanded the full restoration of the edict of January, but the Constable as peremptorily rejected the demand; and the prince, finding that all hope of attaining his wishes to their full extent was denied, ultimately agreed to a compromise. How far the appointment of lieutenant-general, a brilliant lure which Catherine subtly held out, might dazzle his ambition and induce him to concede, could be known only to himself, and perhaps not even to himself distinctly. It was the plea, however, which he used in order to reconcile his followers to terms which disappointed their expectations; and relying, with but slight discretion, on Catherine's sincerity, he assured them that the influence which his office, when once attained, would give him with the king, rendered the ultimate gratification of their desires a matter of certainty.

It is plain however that he fully anticipated the reluctance which he was to encounter in obtaining the consent of his friends to the secret terms which he had determined to accept. Before giving his final answer to Montmorency he requested permission to hold a conference with some of the Huguenot ministers; and Desmoranges of Orleans, Pierius a Spaniard of Blois, and Roche Chandieu of Paris, were summoned accordingly. Some management, he felt, would be requisite in communicating with these deputies; he did not venture therefore at once to declare the clauses of the pending treaty, but he proposed two questions for their resolution. 1st. Was he bound to profess to the queen that, having armed in order to secure the observation of the edict of January, he would not lay down his arms until that edict should be restored in its fullest meaning, force, and purport? 2dly. If he were altogether unable to obtain the restoration of that edict, might he accept terms proposed by the queen, provided they were consistent with liberty of conscience? It needed but little sagacity on the part of the ministers to discover that Condé had resolved upon peace at all events, and that the edict of January would not be restored. Far from temporizing, however, they boldly expressed their sense of the great wrong which he would do the church by admitting any modification of that edict; and they declared that neither the queen nor himself, without offence to God and justice, could derogate, in however small a degree, from the high authority of a law constructed, promulgated, and sworn to by a solemn assembly of the state.

The questions proposed by the prince were taken into more full consideration by a Synod, consisting of seventy-two ministers, who returned a written answer to the following effect. After expressing an earnest desire for peace, if obtained on terms which they could subscribe consistently with duty, they stated those terms to be no other than the confirmation of the edict of January, without any restrictions or modifications. They demanded that the king should declare himself Protector and Conservator of the Confession of Faith presented to him in June 1561; and then (with that remarkable blindness which has so often made dissenters from an establishment intolerant to others even when seeking toleration for themselves), they pointed out the strong necessity of rigorous punishment being directed against all heretics and schismatics, whom they stigmatized by the names of Atheists, Libertines, Anabaptists, and Servetists. They required that the Reformed Synods and Consistories should be authorized by law; that their baptisms and marriages should be esteemed valid; that, in towns and villages in which they had not yet established churches, ministers might be freely admitted; that their religion, formed as it was on the ancient doctrines of the prophets and apostles, should no longer be called the New Religion; that restoration should be made of all property, offices, and dignities, of which any of their brethren had been deprived; and that the outrages committed against them at Vassy, Sens, and elsewhere, should be investigated and punished.*

Notwithstanding this remonstrance, which, in order to give it greater weight, was solemnly registered, Condé did not hesitate to proceed in his negotiation. Quitting the ministers when he found them intractable, he summoned a military council, composed of the officers in garrison at Orleans; explained to them that Catherine, in case her terms were refused, was fully bent upon the storm and total ruin of that city, an attempt in which her success was not to be doubted; laid the treaty briefly before them; and obtained their consent to its completion. The single condition for which he pleaded with the Queen was, that the ratification might be delayed till the return of the Admiral from Normandy; he was answered by a permission to choose between an immediate signature or an immediate assault of Orleans. On the 12th of March therefore he signed, and on the 19th of the same month the King promulgated the Edict of Pacification, known from the town at which it was dated as the Treaty of Amboise.

The following were its chief provisions: 1. That all nobles holding fiefs directly from the Crown might enjoy in their own houses, with their families and such vassals as chose to resort thither, freely and without restraint, the exercise of the religion called Reformed. 2. That similar liberty should be allowed to those who held other fiefs, for themselves and their families, provided they did not inhabit towns, boroughs, or villages subject to higher jurisdiction, in which case they must obtain permission from the superior lords. 3. That in every bailliage and senescalship having appeal to a Court of Parliament, a town should be set apart, in the Fauxbourgs of which the said worship might be celebrated, and that no domiciliary visits should be made under pretext of religion. 4. That in every other town, except those above mentioned, in which the said worship shall have been practised before the seventh of the present March, one or two places should be appropriated at the King's discretion for its exercise; but that all churches which have been so employed must be restored to the Catholic priests. 5. Paris was affirmed to be "exempt from all exercise of the said religion." In the remaining clauses the Prince of Condé and all who had assisted him in the late "tumults," were declared to be good and loyal subjects, who had acted "with the best intentions for the service of the King;" and lastly, an enactment was made, which no edict, it may be thought, could be sufficiently powerful to secure; namely, that all injuries and offences which the late iniquity of the times had occasioned, should be considered dead and buried, and as if they had never existed; that no one, on peril of his life, of what state or quality soever, should reproach another for any thing that had passed, or dispute, quarrel, or argue on questions of religion; but that all men should live together as brothers and fellow-citizens.[*]

Five days after the proclamation of this peace, the Admiral arrived at Orleans with a larger and better appointed force then he had led in the Battle of Dreux. His first disappointment was bitter, and he fiercely and indignantly denounced as ruinous a treaty which never ought to have been concluded without his participation. He forcibly displayed how far better at that moment was the condition of the Reformed than it had been at the commencement of the war. Two of the triumvirs were dead, the third was a prisoner, and yet the terms now accepted were inferior to those offered at the outset, when the edict of January might have been obtained for all France excepting the capital. Provision, he said, had been made for religion only among tbe rich; peasants occupied in ceaseless rural toil, and mechanics in the sedentary employments of trade, children, women, and aged persons could little be expected to perform a long journey to some privileged town, or to the Mansion of the Seigneur, for the benefit of worship; and consequently the Reformed doctrine must languish, and the great mass of the population would probably relapse into its former superstitions. In a word, he reproached the Prince with having injured the church far more by a single stroke of his pen than the Catholics could have done in ten years with all their armies.

The peace indeed was in many ways hasty and improvident. Whether Condé had been influenced by weariness of his imprisonment, by jealousy of the Admiral scarcely acknowledged even in his own heart, or by the promise of the lieutenancy; or whether Catherine had entangled him in any of those nets of blandishment which she was well skilled to weave, and for the construction of which she had ever held assembled in her court a train of matchless and not over rigid beauties, is not now to be determined. Each of these motives in turn has been assigned, and be it which it may that actuated his conduct, it must be admitted that he was duped and deceived. He exposed himself to suspicions of insincerity by listening to promises which chiefly affected his own private interests; he disbanded his troops when both his ranks and his treasury had just been amply recruited; and he violated the promise which he had made to England of not treating separately, at the very moment in which he ought to have been most grateful for the promptness with which she had afforded succour.

Meantime, he surrendered himself unreservedly to the pleasures of the court; and the death of his Princess removed every check upon the libertinism to which, even in her lifetime, he had been too much inclined. It was not till the honour of one lady of distinguished birth, and the wealth of a second of large possessions, had been sacrificed to the vain expectation of obtaining his hand, that the urgent remonstrances of the Huguenot ministers, on the scandal arising from his licentiousness, induced him to renew the nuptial bond. Undeluded by the false hope of an alliance with Mary of Scotland, which the Cardinal of Lorraine endeavoured to excite, he then selected for his consort Frances of Orleans, sister of the Duke of Longueville.

Havre was still occupied by the English; and Elizabeth having avowed her intention of retaining it till Calais should be surrendered according to promise, preparations were made for its immediate reduction. When the Constable summoned the Earl of Warwick, who commanded the garrison, he was answered that the English were his most humble and affectionate servants; but that they would rather die than disobey the orders of their Royal Mistress. In this parley many recognitions took place between several brave officers now arrayed against each other in hostility, who had lately fought side by side at Rouen. "We have stood in the same ranks, under the same banner, and we have shared the same prison," said Leighton, an Englishman, to one of D'Andelot's lieutenants; "how is it that we are now prepared to cut each other's throat?" "Each of us," replied Monins, "obeys the commands of his sovereign. All difference of religion between Frenchmen is terminated by the late peace; and his country is no less dear to a Huguenot than to a Catholic." The Prince of Condé himself was present in the camp; and Warwick, after a gallant defence, when his garrison was rapidly wasting under a contagious disease, and the interception of some despatches concealed from him the near approach of a powerful succour, assented to an honourable capitulation. On the morning after it was signed, a reinforcement of eighteen hundred men appeared in the port. But the relief was too late; and Elizabeth, disgusted by the ingratitude of her late allies, and finding little profit in the continuance of the war, soon afterwards readily negociated a peace.

The active and ambitious spirits of Condé and of Montmorency, now disengaged from civil war, were equally formidable to Catherine; and, in order effectually to preclude them from all chance of too great ascendancy, and to preserve the sovereignty to herself by nominally transferring it to her son, she boldly resolved to proclaim the King's majority. The French law had by no means positively defined the age at which a royal pupillage ceased; but a constitution of Charles V., dated in 1383, having conveniently recognized fourteen years as the epoch, and maintained it on the not very conclusive precedents of Joash, Josiah, David, Solomon, and Hezekiah,[*] Catherine affirmed that it was the commencement of the fourteenth year, not its completion, which was there intended. It was not without some opposition that the parliament of Paris consented to register the edict promulgated at Rouen, which thus invested Charles with the full power of royalty. The deputies, when they conveyed a remonstrance, were received with severity; the King refused to enter his capital until the dispute should be terminated to his satisfaction, and after some farther debate the proposition was accepted. On his first arrival in Paris, Charles was perplexed by an unforeseen application. The retainers of the late Duke of Guise, clad in mourning habits, proceeded in large numbers to the palace. At their head appeared Antoinette of Bourbon and Anne of Este, the mother and the widow of the murdered Prince; his children followed,[†] and the sorrowing train was closed by many illustrious connexions of both sexes. On arrival in the presence chamber, they kneeled before the young King; and when he hastened to raise them from their posture of supplication, they earnestly besought him to institute a close inquiry into the foul crime which had deprived their family of its head. The Admiral was not, indeed, mentioned by name, but it was manifest that he was the object of attack. Charles, in answer, wisely confined himself to general assurances of sympathy, and to a promise that at a more seasonable opportunity the desired investigation should be commenced.

[*] The treaty is printed entire in the Hist. des Egl. Ref. ii. 283. The guidance of that very useful and copious work terminates with the close of the first civil war. The XVIth and last Book contains a few particulars relative to the subsequent history of Metz.

[*] We have ventured to substitute Hezekiæ for Hierimiæ, probably an error of the Press in De Thou, xxxv. 7.

[†] Francis, Duke of Guise, left by his Duchess three sons. Henry, who succeeded to his father's title, Charles, Duke of Mayenne, and Louis, Cardinal of Guise; all distinguished characters in our future narrative.

The Huguenot ministers took early advantage of the restoration of tranquillity to assemble a IVth National Synod. The city selected was Lyons, and the meeting took place on the 10th of August; but its proceedings were utterly unimportant, being chiefly confined to a meddling and mischievous interference on matrimonial questions, in the resolution of which the Calvinistic divines rejoiced to exhibit their casuistry.* Not many months afterwards, the great Catholic Synod, the Council of Trent, closed its twenty-fifth and last sitting, after eighteen years of futile and inconclusive deliberation. It was, perhaps, on account of a bold remonstrance which the French Ambassadors at that Council addressed to Pius IV. in consequence of his partial adjudication of a dispute concerning precedency between them and the Spanish Envoys, that the irritated Pontiff ordered an affront to the crown of France, which might have been dictated by the imperious spirit of Hildebrand. Not content with deposing or suspending some of the most illustrious prelates of the Gallican church, among whom it may be sufficient to mention the Cardinal of Châtillon, brother of the Admiral, and Montluc, Bishop of Valence, the Apostolic Council directed the Cardinal Inquisitors to address a penal monition and citation to the Queen of Navarre. "As it is the duty of the Holy Office, (was the declaration of this extraordinary instrument) to proceed against all persons suspected of heresy, so more especially should it take cognizance of any error in those who deriving sovereign power from God, ought therefore to serve and obey him from whom that power flows, and to acknowledge a loving mother in the Church. We have learned," it continued, "by common and notorious report, and to the sorrow of our spirit, that Jeanne, Queen of Navarre and Princess of Bearne has deviated, and every day more and more increases in deviation from the faith held, believed, taught, and preached by the Catholic Church; and we doubt not that this open and public error conduces no less to the destruction of her subjects than it does to her own eternal perdition. In order therefore to avert these ills and this grievous scandal, we cite the above-named Queen to appear, not by proxy, but personally, in our court at Rome, within six months from this summons, that she may there clear herself from the above charges. And if she should fail in obedience and contumaciously refuse to appear, we pronounce that she is excommunicated, that her children are bastardized, and that she has forfeited all her kingdoms, principalities, dominions, fiefs, estates, and other property of every kind, and condition; which accordingly may be seized and occupied by any one whom his Holiness or his successors shall please to confirm in their possession."

The Queen of Navarre, since the death of her late consort, had resided on her principality of Bearne in undisguised profession of the Reformed worship, and occupied chiefly in the education of her son. Her own means of defence were feeble, but her cause became that of crowned heads in general; excepting of the blind and bigoted King of Spain, by whom the outrage against her had no doubt been prompted. No sooner therefore had the above citation been affixed, according to custom, on the gates of St. Peter's and in other of the most public places in Rome, than the court of France directed a spirited protest to the Conclave. Charles announced that the Queen of Navarre must be considered under his especial guardianship and protection; first, on account of proximity of blood; secondly, in respect to her royal dignity, which gave her claim to the aid of every King her brother, and demanded his resistance of an assumed authority which might some day be drawn into an evil precedent against himself. The neighbourhood of the Queen's dominions in France, and her vassalage to the crown of that country for many of her fiefs, were next adduced as reasons on account of which the King felt great umbrage at the citation. No Pope had hitherto asserted the power of summoning a vassal of France to Rome; and it was altogether new that the Holy Father should pretend to confiscate any property within the French dominions, in direct opposition to all existing Concordats. For these and many similar reasons, the King felt deeply interested in the transaction, and deemed it marvellous strange that such an attempt should have been made, at least without previous communication to him; seeing that it regarded a relative in blood, a sister in dignity, a neighbour, an ally, and a vassal. The measure, he doubted not, had proceeded from some burst of irregular passion, occasioned by the false reports, the sinister impressions, and the evil counsels of ill-advised ministers; who for their own private interests were endeavouring to disturb the good understanding which subsisted between his holiness and the King. But, to take far lower ground; how, it might be asked, should the Queen of Navarre become acquainted with a monition affixed at Rome? Was it not most preposterous and contrary to every rule of justice, to summon that lady to answer for her religion, when the Queens of England and of Scotland and the Protestant Princes of Germany were left undisturbed in similar professions of faith? Above all, the King pointed out that the wounds occasioned by religious dissension, so recently healed within his own dominions, were likely to be irritated and bleed afresh, if all indulgence were denied to those who varied from the Catholic doctrine. Urged by these considerations, he earnestly appealed to the Holy Father, with all that devotion and observance which was justly his due, to recall and annul the offensive monition; and to take it in good part if the King should punish any of his subjects who had occasioned its issue. Otherwise he declared that if he were compelled to resort to the measures and remedies which had been adopted on similar occurrences, however deeply he might regret the necessity, nevertheless his object was so just and honourable, that in order to compass it he would exercise the whole force and power with which God had endowed him.

This concluding menace was effectual, and the Pope desisted. Yet the Queen of Navarre not long afterwards had well nigh become the victim of a deep-laid conspiracy, planned by some of her disaffected subjects among the Roman Catholics of Bearne. These traitors, after communicating with the King of Spain and his minister the Duke d'Alva, concerted a plan by which the Queen and her two children, the Prince Henry and the Princess Catherine, might be carried off from Pau and consigned to the dungeons of the inquisition. The negotiation had been pending more than a year when the principal agent, either struck with remorse or making an imprudent confidence during a severe illness, revealed its details to one who took measures for its defeat. A more vigilant and effective protection than the widowed Queen could afford now appeared necessary for the security of her son; and the future champion of the Huguenots, having been committed to the care of governors of undoubted attachment to the Reformed principles, was removed to the court of France, in order to complete his education.

In a progress which the King and the Queen Mother undertook during the spring and summer of 1564, they remained for some time at Rousillon in Dauphiné; a place which derives notoriety from an edict promulgated in it, explanatory, as was pretended, of the treaty of Amboise; but in fact violating many of its conditions. The Huguenot ministers had already been prohibited from officiating any where within ten leagues of the abode of the court for the time being, and from residing in any parts of the kingdom, except those in which they were customarily allowed to preach; and no one professing the Reformed doctrines, either layman or ecclesiastic, was permitted to open a school. By the edict of Rousillon, the privilege which had been granted to the Huguenot nobles holding in capite, of celebrating worship in their Chateaux, was restricted to their own families and their immediate tenants; if any other persons attended, the Seigneur was liable to a fine of 500 crowns for the first offence, and to confiscation of his Fief for a second. The collection of money also, for any purposes whatsoever, was forbidden under threat of corporal punishment. All those of either sex who during the late troubles had renounced their vows of chastity, and abandoning the monastic state had contracted matrimony, were peremptorily commanded either to relinquish their nuptial ties and return to the cloister, or else to quit the kingdom within two months. The galleys were denounced as the punishment for men, perpetual imprisonment for women disobedient to this harsh provision. The difficulties raised in the way of public worship by the first of these clauses, the overthrow of all church discipline by the second, and the cruel destruction of private happiness which the third must occasion, were severely felt by the Huguenots; and Condé who had retired to Valéry, the domain for which he was indebted to the infatuated passion of the Maréchal de St. André's widow, addressed, first a letter, and afterwards a very pointed remonstrance to Catherine. In the latter, he complained that, besides the infraction of the treaty of Amboise, murder was daily committed upon Huguenots, and passed unpunished by the magistrates. More than 130 persons were said to have fallen victims to open or secret violence. Among them was a gentleman of much distinction both on account of his individual qualities and of his extraction; Gilbert de la Curée, a strenuous Huguenot, who had displayed great courage at Dreux, and had been rewarded by the Queen of Navarre with the government of Vendôme. He was assassinated, during a hunting match, by the treachery of some powerful Catholics. Yet when his widow demanded inquiry, the application was coldly received at court, and the Lord of Cognée, a near relation of the deceased, being accused of some illegal step in a process instituted by him against the murderers, underwent a long and painful imprisonment, in order to strike terror into others. The King received the Prince of Condé's address with apparent friendliness, but returned a vague and unsatisfactory answer.

* One question may afford a fair specimen of the frivolous matters occasionally submitted to grave discussion. "Chapter XVI. Cases of Conscience, xxxvi. A gentleman troubles the church, and wills that his wife come up immediately after him unto the Lord's Table, before any of the men. And although it had been ordained by the Synod of Caen, that he should follow the general practice of the churches, yet, nevertheless, he will not conform thereunto. The Assembly orders a letter, in their name, to be sent to him, advising him to walk with more humility."

The court wintered in the south; and in the course of the following summer, under a pretext of neighbourhood to the Spanish dominions which afforded Catherine an opportunity, rarely to be enjoyed, of familiar intercourse with the Queen Isabelle her daughter, the royal progress was continued to Bayonne. Thither also the Duke d'Alva repaired, ostensibly as the bearer of the collar of the Golden Fleece to Charles. The Queen of Spain and her cortège were lodged in a temporary building, erected for the purpose, adjoining the Bishop's palace in which Catherine had fixed her abode; and a private communication between these residences afforded facility for the secret interviews of the Queen Mother and the Spanish minister. The days were passed in spectacles of unwonted magnificence; the nights, if we may believe the almost universal voice of contemporaries, and among them of not a few Roman Catholics, in the arrangement of plans for the destruction of the Huguenots. The evidence of generally accredited rumour and of the accordance of future events with its purport, however strong, is not infallibly conclusive; but we see not how, after the remarkable conversation which Henry IV. overheard, it is possible to deny that these conferences at Bayonne were directed to the formation of an alliance against the Reformed. Henry, at that time a boy only twelve years of age, was the enfant gaté of Catherine; so fond was she of his society that she seldom allowed him to quit her side; and whether she attended Mass, or a party of pleasure, or even the King's most secret council-chamber, the favoured child had the privilege of admission. On one occasion he was present at a discussion between the Queen and the Duke d'Alva respecting the best mode of suppressing the new doctrine; and he especially remembered, and, as it appears, plainly understood, a figurative expression used by the unrelenting Spaniard, "that the jowl of a salmon was well worth a hundred frogs." He had sufficient prudence to conceal from the common ear the important secret implied in these portentous words; but he communicated them at the time to one of his most confidential officers, Colignon Chancellor of Navarre, who accompanied him to Bayonne, and by whom they have been transmitted to posterity as a damning evidence of the preconcerted blood-guiltiness of Catherine and her advisers.

The Vth national Synod of the Huguenots assembled before the close of this year; and, notwithstanding the prohibition contained in the edict of Rousillon, partly it may be supposed on account of the Prince of Condé's remonstrance, partly from the continued absence of the court which was then at Blois, the deputies boldly met in Paris. Their proceedings were for the most part without interest. They explained and limited the dangerous powers of suspension and excommunication. They regulated the admission to the Lord's table of such persons as "notwithstanding their knowledge and profession of Gospel truth," still retained Papal benefices; and we need not say that this adjustment between God and Mammon required no inconsiderable ingenuity. All promises of marriage, unless made in the presence of two witnesses at the least, if possible before the parents of the contracting parties, and in either case, "after solemn seeking of God by prayer," were declared to be null. Permission was granted for the marriage of a man with the sister of a woman to whom he had been betrothed, but who had died before the nuptials were celebrated. Children under twelve years of age were prohibited from admission to the Lord's table. And as if some unusual inroad had been attempted upon the gravity of the Calvinistic system, by unseemly attire and indulgence in the sportiveness of wit, ministers were first instructed to abstain from all gaudery in their own persons and in those of their wives and children, and to exhort their people to be modest in their habits; and secondly, all persons whom "God hath endowed with gifts and ability to write in defence of truth, were requested not to publish their thoughts in a ridiculous or injurious manner."

The King, in passing through Nerac, the principal abode of the Court of Navarre, insisted upon the re-establishment of the ancient religion, which had been abolished within that city, and he afterwards summoned an Assembly of the Notables for the following January. The edict promulgated at Moulins by that body when it met chiefly related to the better administration of justice, but in one of its LXXXVI clauses was included a renewal of the edict of Rousillon. The main object of this Assembly however was to promote and to witness a formal reconciliation between the houses of Guise and of Châtillon. For that purpose, the Admiral renewed his former oath, that he had neither concerted nor been privy to the assassination of the late Duke; and the declaration was accepted by the widowed Duchess and by the Cardinal of Lorraine. The young Duke, Henry, who had just returned from his first campaign in Hungary, in which he had served with great promise of future distinction, was not present at this interview. Dissembling all resentment, he nevertheless avoided any decisive expression of forgiveness; and it may be believed that to the very last he entertained a conviction of the Admiral's participation in his father's murder, sufficiently strong to justify in his own sight the bloody vengeance which he afterwards achieved.

But fresh cause of intestine discord soon arose. Philip II. had now altogether surrendered himself to the guidance of the ferocious d'Alva, and troops under the Duke's command were pouring from Savoy through Franche Comté and Lorraine, for the extermination of Protestantism in the Spanish Netherlands. The approach of a foreign army to the frontiers afforded Catherine a plausible excuse for gathering an extraordinary force; she put the garrisons in a state of complete defence, assembled troops in the Provinces, raised fresh national levies, and summoned 6000 mercenaries from Swisserland. It was not possible that in the existing circumstances of the kingdom, these active preparations should be viewed by the Huguenots without considerable alarm. The concurrent marches of the Duke d'Alva and of the Swiss were believed to be the results of that scheme against the Reformed supposed to have been framed at Bayonne; and the suspicion derived ample support from numerous other acts of the French Government. The edicts favourable to the Huguenots were daily violated; the towns which they had been permitted to retain by the Treaty of Amboise were dismantled; and forts, erected within the circuit of their demolished walls, were occupied by the royal troops. The ears of the Magistracy appeared deaf to any complaint tendered by a Huguenot, and the grossest outrages upon the personal liberty, the property, and even the lives of the Reformed, if not openly authorized, were at least allowed to pass unpunished and even uninvestigated. It was known that frequent couriers were exchanged between the French Court and Rome; little pains were taken by the Catholics to repress tokens of exultation at some approaching triumph; and more than obscure warnings were given that the time was now at hand in which their hated rivals would cease to enjoy that freedom which they had recently extorted from the King. Representations of these and similar circumstances were anxiously submitted to the Prince of Condé and the Admiral by their followers. Conferences were held among the chief Huguenot leaders both at Valéry and at Châtillon; but in all of them pacific counsels were inculcated. Nothing, it was said, was to be so much avoided as a renewal of civil war; nor was the sword to be drawn till every other remedy had proved ineffectual.

During these agitations, the VIth Synod assembled at Verteuil; and the ministers, as if unmindful of the great terrors gathering around them, were occupied for the most part, as heretofore, in the discussion of subtle points of casuistry, and in regulations tending to clog the freedom of matrimonial engagements. Thus, it was resolved, that if women whose husbands upon the account of trades were a long time absent from them should desire to be married they must apply to the Magistrates; and that ministers were to take heed not to solemnize the marriage of widows within times forbidden by the civil law. If two young persons should contract marriage foolishly and rashly, without consulting their parents or guardians, the remedy pronounced was not a little summary, "Let them be punished and chastised, and let their marriage, at the request of parents and guardians, be rescinded." The punishment most commonly in use appears to have been fasting, either for three whole days, "having given them but a little bread and water," or for one whole day with nothing allowed them for their nourishment. The Church, it may seem, wanted either power or inclination to visit offences by adequate penalties; for even in the case of fraudulent traders who, "according to the custom of the country, do falsify, disguise, or corrupt their merchandise, as stretchers or drawers of cloth," the pain adjudged was incommensurate to the crime. They were "to be admonished by the Consistory to forbear those cheats, and in case they do not desist to be laid under censure." The accomplishment of marriage was not to be deferred above six weeks after the promise of it; in case of farther delay the parties were to be called into the Consistory and admonished, and if afterwards they continued disobedient, they were to be committed to the civil Magistrate, who had power to compel solemnization. On their wedding-day parties were instructed to come "modestly to Church, without drums or minstrels, demeaning themselves orderly and gravely as becometh Christians; and let them come before the bell hath done tolling, that so the marriage may be solemnly blessed before sermon, and if they be negligent, or should come too late, let them be turned away unmarried."

This officious, and in some instances fulsome and offensive inspection of the private and domestic intercourse of their flocks, the details of which we abstain on more than one account from prosecuting farther, was probably of little avail towards the general improvement of moral habits, and certainly tended to depress the standard of female delicacy. Over the public administration also of the Church, the vigilance of the Consistories, without doubt, was abused; and we read with surprise, and not without some diminution of gravity, their "roll of vagrants," a sort of police Gazette, describing numerous unfit personages who had intruded themselves into the ministry. Thus the faithful are warned against "a certain fellow, a lean man, who hath been often taxed for having no call to the ministry, and being unordained yet preacheth." Another, "a man of mean stature, his beard waxing grey, deposed from the ministry at Usanchez by the brethren of Limoges for lying, cheatings, forgeries, roguish tricks, drunkenness, unchaste kissings, and at Pâmier for dancing and contumacy against the Church, intrudes himself into all places where he can get admission to preach." A third, a Franciscan friar, who quitted and resumed his cowl at pleasure, had been deposed, because he usurped the ministry of the gospel without call or ordination. As to his moral qualities, he had been "convicted of, and condemned for adultery, and accused also of being confederate with robbers;" in person he was "a fellow of great stature, yellow beard, and had lost two of his front teeth." Besides guarding against the above hypocrites, the Churches are advised to take heed also of a "certain old, grave, and bald-headed fellow, who, though he was never called or ordained, doth nevertheless take upon him to exercise the office of a minister;" of "a little dwarfish fellow;" of one "having a great red nose, who is a mercenary and most abusive fellow;" and lastly, of one who appears to have exceeded all the rest in the degree of abhorrence which he excited both by his partial adherence to Romish forms and his repudiation of some peculiarities of Calvinism. "John Clopet, alias Child, a wretch full of heresies, a champion for the mass, asserting its goodness; in two points only excepted, viz. Prayers unto the saints and for the dead; maintaining that the good and bad have equal privilege to communicate in the body of Christ, as also celibacy, and praying towards the east; and that commentaries upon Scripture are needless: and that Calvin did very ill in writing of predestination; and that man may keep perfectly all the commands of God. He is a fellow of mean stature, a yellowish beard, and speaks somewhat thick, plain in his looks, and tawny face, aged five-and-twenty."

But we turn from these grave frivolities to a more severe and painful narrative. The peril of the Huguenots hourly increased; although the Duke d'Alva had already entered the Low Countries, the Swiss, whose services were no longer required as a precaution against him, far from being countermanded, continued to advance upon Paris; and when Condé sought an explanation of this warlike aspect, he received idle excuses in reply. Meantime, sure advices were received from Huguenots of rank about the Court, notifying that designs were meditated against the life of the Admiral and the liberty of Condé; that the Swiss were to be distributed in Paris, Orleans and Poitiers; and that after the occupation of those cities, the tolerant edicts were to be altogether revoked. On this intelligence, both the Admiral and his brother, D'Andelot, expressed strong conviction of the necessity of immediate recourse to arms, and of anticipating the blow by which they must otherwise be destroyed. To remove the Cardinal of Lorraine from the kingdom, and to cut off the Swiss, were the avowed primary objects of the new movement. To what results it might ultimately tend was not perhaps distinctly contemplated by its authors themselves.

The little town of Rosoy en Brie was named as the place of general rendezvous; and thither accordingly, late in September, repaired the Admiral, D'Andelot, La Noüe, the Comte de la Rochefoucault, and about four hundred other Huguenot nobles and gentlemen. It was recollected how great an advantage had resulted to the Guises in the former war from the possession of the King's person; and the design therefore in the first instance was to surprise and carry off Charles, while he was engaged, on the Feast of St. Michael, in holding, according to announcement, a Chapter of the Order of that Saint. The Court had just removed to Meaux; and Catherine, till the very moment of the Huguenot gathering, was wholly unapprehensive of insurrection, and listened with incredulity to its first announcement. When she ascertained the alarming truth, her sole hope of escape was in temporizing till the Swiss could arrive by forced marches; and for that purpose she despatched Francis Montmorency, the Constable's eldest son, to amuse Condé by inquiries respecting the objects for which he appeared in arms. The stratagem was successful, and Montmorency prolonged his conference till he received intelligence that the Swiss were close at hand. On his return, a discussion arose relative to future proceedings. The Constable strenuously urged that the royal party should remain at Meaux; the town itself, he said, admitted of defence if it became necessary, and the Swiss would form a nucleus, round which a powerful army might soon be assembled. On the other hand, retreat was hazardous; for who should assure them that it could be effected without fighting? and if they fought, who could guarantee the result? Retreat also must in some degree wear the semblance of flight, which ill accorded with the royal dignity. Peace was hitherto unbroken; and till a blow should be either struck or provoked, there seemed good hope that it might still be preserved. These sound arguments, backed by the honest support of the Chancellor de l'Hôpital, might have prevailed but for the opposition of the Cardinal of Lorraine. To his restless spirit, peace offered but few attractions; and his turbulent ambition pictured to itself hopes of aggrandizement for his nephews in the renewal of civil dissension.

It was resolved therefore to move at once for Paris, a distance of somewhat more than thirty miles, on the following night. The Swiss had rested but three hours after their hurried march, yet they were all at their posts by midnight; not a courtier, writes Castelnau, who shared in the peril, had armour, and the greater number were mounted on but sorry hackneys. Ill prepared as they were, however, nine hundred horsemen of gentle blood surrounded the persons of Catherine, the King, and the ladies of the court; and at daybreak, when they had advanced about four leagues from Meaux, they were encountered by the Huguenots in array. Some skirmishing ensued; and when the Swiss seemed hot for battle, and had grounded their shields, which with them was the first movement preparatory to combat, it was thought advisable that the King should draw off with a strong detachment, and proceed through by-ways with all speed to the capital; Montmorency engaging meanwhile to make head against the enemy. Two hundred chosen horse formed the royal escort, and Charles, exhausted by hunger and wearied by a journey undoubtedly perilous, and which might be considered long, according to the rate of travelling in those days, arrived at Paris towards evening. But even his night was not to be given to repose. The Huguenots, on perceiving that the King had withdrawn, did not long continue their skirmishing with Montmorency, and the two parties separated at Bouget after small loss on either side. A few stragglers, however, advancing on Paris in the dark, fired some windmills close to the walls, and the garrison, alarmed by the flames, beat to arms under expectation of an assault. The Cardinal of Lorraine, who had directed his steps to Rheims, was surprised on his route by a party of Champagners, who intercepted his baggage and would have captured its owner also, but for the fleetness of the Spanish genet upon which he fortunately happened to be mounted.

This enterprise of the Huguenots appears to have been rashly planned and feebly executed. Nothing short of complete triumph could justify so hazardous an attempt; and by its failure they brought upon themselves the obloquy of treason, a name which, if they had been successful, no one would have dared to attach to their boldness. Their previous wrongs and sufferings were little remembered; and it was easy for their enemies to represent that, in the midst of profound peace, they had risen in arms against their Sovereign, and had treacherously endeavoured to despoil him of his liberty, perhaps of his crown. The insult was never forgotten by the sullen and vindictive temper of Charles; and those who trace his subsequent atrocious deeds of blood to a remembrance of this single day, may not, perhaps, have erroneously calculated its effects. Pius V., who in the commencement of the year had been elected to the Tiara, and was eagerly engaged in opposition to the Reformed, seized the opportunity afforded him of stimulating the neighbouring Princes to co-operate for the extermination of the Huguenots. He wrote to the King of Spain, informing him of the "conspiracy," or, more properly, the "rebellion," which had occurred in France, and he despatched a special Internuncio to require his aid for its suppression. Priuli, Doge of Venice; Gonzaga, of Mantua, who had married the Duchess of Nevers, and was thus in possession of the great fiefs of that house; and Emanuel Philibert, Duke of Savoy, were solicited in like manner; and although the treasury of the Vatican was almost exhausted by sums advanced in assisting the Emperor and the knights of Malta against the Turks, and Mary of Scotland against her rebellious subjects, a subsidy of ten thousand ducats was paid to the Duke of Savoy, to furnish him with necessary equipments, and a considerable sum was forwarded to the Cardinal of Lorraine for general purposes.

No sooner had the King entered Paris, than the Huguenots, spreading themselves over the adjoining districts, blockaded the chief roads from Normandy, Le Perche, Mayne and Anjou; and by intercepting all convoys, reduced the capital to great distress. The Constable, although far from relaxing in his enmity against the Reformed, and continuing to affirm that the Treaty of Amboise was to be considered as only provisional, cordially and sincerely desired reconciliation. But his efforts were altogether ineffectual, for neither party manifested any willingness to concede; and since the populace of the capital, now straitened for supplies and impatient under privations, began to impute his pacific labours to want of courage or of fidelity, he was compelled, in spite of his reluctance, to commence more active operations. His first object was to dislodge the Huguenots from the important post of St. Denis, in which Condé had entrenched himself and fixed his head-quarters; and the disproportionate force which it was in their power to oppose, led him to expect little serious resistance. In his own ranks he counted sixteen thousand infantry and three thousand men at arms; exclusive of the civic militia, upon which, however, he placed little reliance. The Huguenots, on the other hand, in the absence of a corps of five hundred horse and eight hundred harquebuziers, detached under D'Andelot, mustered no more than twelve hundred infantry and fifteen hundred horse; most of these also were but half armed; and, in order to supply the want of lances, they had shod with iron heads the poles found supporting some booths at a late fair held in St. Denis. Well might the citizens of Paris inquire from their leaders how it was that "an Ant was allowed to besiege an Elephant!"

It was perhaps, however, this very inequality of numbers, which, in addition to his hope of avoiding hostilities altogether, had induced the Constable to be tardy in his movements. Little, indeed, could he suppose that commanders so experienced as Condé and the Admiral would venture to the forward position which they occupied without certainty of strong support; and the rashness with which they acted was in this respect their best security. On the 9th of November, the Constable beat up their quarters, and harassed them through the day with skirmishes, in order correctly to ascertain their force and position; and on the following morning, when he issued from the gates of Paris, with his whole army, turning to the bystanders, and reminding them of the murmurs of the rabble, which appear to have impressed him far too deeply, "This day," he said, "shall free me from the taunts of my enemies and the suspicions of the people; for my return shall be in triumph, if alive; or if a corpse, after a death of glory in the moment of victory!" The words, as we shall perceive, were ominously spoken. After many hours occupied in previous dispositions, when evening was already at hand, the Huguenots, to his surprise, not content with awaiting his onset, boldly advanced to the charge;* and being wholly unprovided with artillery, after receiving a few volleys from the royal cannon, they pressed on, hand to hand, and joined in close engagement. In the confused and almost wholly personal conflict which ensued and lasted for nearly an hour, all the Chiefs were at times exposed to imminent danger. The Prince of Condé had his horse killed under him, and was extricated with difficulty from the mêlée. When the bridle of a fiery Arab, upon which the Admiral was mounted, had been cut through, the affrighted animal, taking the bit in his mouth, carried his master into the heart of a troop of Royalists flying from the field, through which he dashed without being recognized. Each army was partially routed; the loss of each was nearly equal, and chiefly in cavalry, of which about seven hundred were killed between them; and if the Huguenots had not fallen back upon St. Denis, which they regained in good order, while their opponents continued to occupy the field, the victory might have been doubtful even in name. The title of success which the laws of war adjudged to the Royalists, was dearly purchased by the loss of their commander. It was upon the division led by the Constable himself that the main efforts of the Huguenots had been directed; and the gallant veteran, unbent by the burden of nearly eighty winters, evinced an activity and prowess not surpassed by the youngest soldier in his ranks. Wounded in four places, and abandoned by his followers, he still continued to fight; and had just cut down one of his assailants, when a Scotch partizan of the Huguenots, Robert Stuart by name, pressed him to surrender, and demanded his sword. The Constable indignantly replied by dashing its hilt in the face of his enemy so violently as to beat out three of his teeth, and the Scot, irritated by the blow, discharged a pistol through his body. The wound was mortal, for Montmorency's advanced age did not permit him to bear the weight of a cuirass of sufficient proof. His anxious request, on falling, was that he might be allowed to die on the field, but he was disengaged from the press around him, and carried into Paris, where he expired two days afterwards. His known valour and great military skill had seldom been requited by proportionate success; and in the seven pitched battles, in which he had been present, (in three of them as commander,) Fortune, for the most part, had shown herself adverse. His political experience and sagacity, and his profound knowledge of mankind, are the general theme of contemporary praise; and the chief fault attributed to him is one arising from intimate acquaintance with Courts,—a somewhat undue regard to his own private interests. Davilla relates a noble anecdote which no incident of the Constable's past life authorizes us to reject; and which all who value memorials of the more elevated portions of human nature would most unwillingly abandon. Undisturbed in spirit, and with tokens of the uttermost constancy, Montmorency felt his last agonies approaching; and when a priest offered some common-place consolation, he turned to him with a placid and serene expression of countenance, requesting his silence. "Ill, indeed," he remarked, "should I have spent my fourscore years of life, if I had not learned to die for a quarter of an hour!"

The death of Montmorency was viewed with satisfaction by Catherine, for it relieved her from an observant and powerful monitor, to whose authority she had often been compelled to defer. Even if she wept, as Brantome would persuade us, her tears, as we have more than once before perceived, were not always the key to her real feelings. His obsequies were conducted with much solemnity; and as a mark of especial honour, his effigy was borne upon his hearse; a distinction which custom had reserved for members of the blood royal. The office of Constable was not filled up; either because there was not any individual whom it seemed discreet to entrust with a dignity conferring so great a power; or more probably, because Catherine did not choose that the authority of her second and favourite son, the Duke of Anjou, for whom she obtained the post of Lieutenant-General, should be shared with any rival. The extreme youth of that prince made a council requisite for his assistance; but its members were carefully selected from persons of whose compliance with her will the Queen Mother felt assured.

* Davilla assigns good reasons for the determination of the Huguenots to give battle; they could not retreat without fighting; the very existence of their army depended upon the maintenance of confidence; and the day was so far advanced that even if they should be beaten, they ran little hazard of being pursued.—Vol. i. lib. iv. p. 185.

We need not detail the military operations of the next few months. The Huguenots, satisfied with the reputation of having withstood the royal army notwithstanding their own great inferiority in numbers, fell back from St. Denis upon Loraine; and there awaited a junction with nearly 7,000 Reistres and 300 Lansquenets, whom the Elector Palatine had despatched to their assistance, under his son Prince Casimir. During a few days of anxious suspense before the arrival of this expected reinforcement, the confidence of the Huguenot army appears to have failed; and their drooping hopes were raised and their mutinous clamours silenced by the opposite qualities of their two Generals. Condé cheered his followers by sprightly and light-hearted sallies; the severe disposition of the Admiral enforced discipline by grave admonition. Even, however, when the much-desired Auxiliaries were at hand, new difficulties were to be encountered; and the provision of 100,000 crowns, which had been promised to the German soldiery, far exceeded the scanty resources of the Huguenot military chest, scarcely competent to supply the daily necessities of its own army. The Prince and Coligny, however, contributed their plate and jewels; and their example and the exhortations of the ministers who always accompanied the march prevailed so greatly, that every officer and man made some personal sacrifice, and even the meanest horse-boy and camp-follower in the host emulously threw in his mite to the general fund. Casimir, who had embarked in the enterprise from a deep religious impulse, lent his ready aid to mitigate the disappointment of his more mercenary comrades; and a distribution of 30,000 crowns, the utmost sum which could be raised, for awhile satisfied their rapacity.

Encouraged by this large addition to his force, and by the declaration of many important towns in his favour, Condé early in the following year once again advanced from Loraine, and, having crossed the Marne and Seine without opposition, proceeded to invest Chartres; a city, the occupation of which was considered desirable before a transfer of the seat of war to the immediate neighbourhood of Paris. But notwithstanding his present success, and his apparent increase of strength, he must have perceived that the foundation upon which he rested for the future was altogether insecure. He was deficient both in stores and in money to procure them; the battering train with which he ventured to commence the siege of Chartres was composed of no more than five field-pieces, and four light culverins; upon the Germans little reliance could be placed without regularity of pay; so hasty had been the original rising that no preparation for the subsistence of an army could be arranged, and it was plain that if supplies were wanting, desertion would rapidly thin the ranks of the Huguenot soldiery; even the gentry also were kept together with difficulty, and manifested a strong inclination to return to their families and estates, which were exposed to outrage during their absence. The court was ready to negotiate; and, however little confidence was to be placed in its sincerity; however slight the pains taken to conceal that the attempt upon Meaux was not forgotten and should some day be revenged; whatever private intimations were received that no terms would be honestly observed; nevertheless, in the choice of evils which presented itself, the chances of a hollow peace appeared preferable to the continuance of a war thus certainly destructive. No question was likely to arise regarding conditions which one party had previously resolved at all events to violate; the conferences, therefore, were brought to a rapid conclusion; and the Admiral with just forboding of ill, Condé, with the most sanguine hope of good, affixed their signatures on the 23d of March, to the treaty of Longjumeau.* Its chief stipulations provided for a general amnesty; a renewal of the edict of Amboise in its literal tenor; the restoration of all towns and fortified places occupied by the Huguenots; and the dismissal of all foreign troops engaged on both sides, after their arrears of pay had been discharged by the King.

The messenger whom Charles selected to announce the conclusion of this peace to the Parliament of Toulouse, and to demand its registry, was a gentleman in the Prince of Condé's suite, Rapin by name. Some active services which he had before performed in Languedoc rendered him unpopular among the Toulousians; and their magistrates, disregarding the sacredness of his diplomatic character, and the royal authority under which he acted, arrested him on some unjust pretext and delivered him to the executioner. Scarcely had the new treaty been promulgated before a similar thirst for blood and equal disregard for good faith manifested itself in almost every province of the kingdom. In the capital, the pulpits reechoed with wild and vehement declamations, not against the doctrines only but the persons also of the Reformed; and the recently established order of Jesuits then first especially inculcated those perverse applications of scripture, and those subtle ethical distinctions which have ever since formed the marked characteristics of its disciples. Besides affirming the decree of the council of Constance, that faith was not to be kept with heretics, their preachers cited holy writ abundantly in evidence that persecution was an acceptable offering to Heaven. They spoke of Corah, Dathan, and Abiram; of those whose slaughter was commanded by Moses and the Levites; of the punishment of the worshippers of the golden calf, and of Jehu who cut off the priests of Baal by stratagem; and each of these histories was interpreted as a precedent against seceders from the church of Rome. Thus roused to fury, the populace in many districts perpetrated acts of blood and violence; at Amiens more than a hundred Huguenots perished in a tumult; on the restoration of Auxerre to the royalists a massacre of the Reformed commenced, and a hundred and fifty corpses were thrown into the sewers and the river. Rouen, Bourges, Issoudun, Troyes, Blois, and Orleans, witnessed outrages which terminated in wholesale murder; and even in other places, in which not more than single lives were sacrificed, it seemed as if the increased atrocity which accompanied the deed was designed as an atonement for the paucity of victims. Thus at Ligny, a Huguenot who sought refuge from his pursuers in the house of the mayor, was killed the very arms of the magistrate from whom he claimed protection. At Clermont also a townsman who had neglected to decorate his windows with tapestry, and to display other marks of reverence on a festival during which the host was paraded through the streets, was dragged to the market place, and burned on a pile hastily formed from the timber of his own house pulled down for the destruction of its master. It was calculated (perhaps with exaggeration, but when such an exaggeration was hazarded the numbers must have been terrifically great,) that, within three months after the treaty of Longjumeau, more than ten thousand Huguenots fell by assassination; although during the preceding six months of war scarcely five hundred had perished in battle. It need not be asked why the court had been prompt to treat; for who would have recourse to the doubtful issue of open hostility when vengeance could be thus far more securely and abundantly gratified under the semblance of peace?

The dismissal of the good and wise de l'Hôpital from the chancellorship,* through the intrigues of the Cardinal of Loraine, deprived the Huguenots of their sole advocate in the royal council. From that moment, indeed, all disguise appears to have been thrown aside. The Admiral and Condé could no longer disregard the rumours which they hourly heard of intentions against their persons; a spy was detected by the Prince surveying the works of the castle at Noyers, in which he had fixed his residence; and at length an intercepted despatch removed every doubt of the intended treachery. The charge of arresting the Prince had been committed to the Maréchal de Tavannes, deputy governor of Burgundy, who is said to have been the original author of the design; and his measures had been so fully taken, that nothing more than an increase of force was needed to ensure his success. The letter which he wrote to obtain more troops was couched in figurative language, but language the interpretation of which could be little dubious, "The stag is in the toils, make haste and advance your people." This despatch fell into the hands of one of Condé's patrols, and the miscarriage is believed to have been intentional. Not, indeed, out of any good will on the part of Tavannes either to Condé personally or to the Huguenots at large; but from a suspicion that the enterprise was not quite certain, and a wish to stand well with that party which might eventually predominate. The chances were infinitely against the escape of the Prince, even after the plot had been revealed to him; but if he did escape, and should ultimately prove successful, Tavannes might claim the merit of having given him the earliest advice of his danger.

* A small town in the modern Department of La Seine et Oise, twelve miles S. E. from Versailles.

* The name of Politiques was given to those who, with L'Hôpital, wished for temperate measures.

If the Huguenots valued their liberty, not a moment was now to be lost in retiring upon some fortified town, strong enough to permit defence. The Admiral, already warned by Condé, had joined him at Noyers, and La Rochelle was the city in which they determined to seek refuge. The attempt was hazardous in the extreme. Between Noyers in Burgundy and La Rochelle on the Bay of Biscay, almost the whole extent of France from west to east was to be traversed; and the intervening 250 leagues were thickly beset with enemies. Condé's Princess was far advanced in pregnancy; three of his children were still in arms; an equally helpless train accompanied the Admiral and the wife of D'Andelot his brother, who was engaged in another district; and no larger escort could be provided than 150 men at arms. But on this, as on former occasions, the very rashness of the enterprise proved its chief cause of success; for the royalist troops gathered round Noyers in readiness for its surprise, giving tardy credence to the improbable announcement that Condé had departed with so slight an attendance, thus afforded him time, by which he gained largely in advance of their pursuit. When they afterwards taunted him with pusillanimity for his abandonment of home, and maintained that his suspicions had been fanciful, he quietly replied, "that the birds by quitting their nests had saved themselves from a cage." His first great peril was encountered after fording the Loire near Sancerre. Scarcely had he reached the farther bank before the troops of Burgundy appeared in view; and feeling sure of their prey on the following morning, halted for the night at St. Godon. The delay of that single night, however, preserved the fugitives; for at daybreak the river was so swollen and flooded as to be no longer passable, even by boats; and the Prince and his company advanced peaceably on their route in the sight of their disappointed pursuers thus wholly deprived of any power of molestation.[*]

When he entered Poitou, the Governor, perhaps not unfriendly to his purpose, refused the pressing application of some zealous Catholics that he would obstruct his farther journey, pleading that he had not received orders to that effect. It was more difficult to elude the vigilance of one little likely to relax in hostility, Blaise de Montluc, who had put in motion the forces under his command in Guyenne; but after four and twenty days of unceasing anxiety and hourly danger, Condé at last arrived in La Rochelle, with a retinue largely increased during his progress. Shortly afterwards he was joined by the Queen of Navarre, with her children and an armed force of nearly 4,000 men. The words addressed by her son Henry in reply to the set speech with which he was received by one of the civic orators, deserve remembrance; for their promise was amply verified in the great part which he who delivered them enacted in after life. "I have not yet studied enough," was his answer, "to speak as well as you do, gentlemen; but I assure you that if I speak but ill, I will do better; for I know more of acting than of talking."[†] Of the Admiral's brothers, d'Andelot was actively engaged in raising levies in Britany; Odet, Cardinal of Châtillon, compelled to fly from his estate in Beauvais, and unable to penetrate to La Rochelle, found means of embarking for England, where he rendered good service to his party by representations to the Court of Queen Elizabeth. Of this prelate's character De Thou has spoken with no ordinary praise; he describes him in one place, as a man whose naturally good disposition had remained pure amid the corruptions of the Court; in another, as one who in greatness of spirit, candour, fidelity, and sound judgment, had few rivals. At a subsequent period he was employed in negotiating the projected marriage between Queen Elizabeth and the Duke of Anjou; and while preparing to return to France, he died at Hampton Court, in his fiftieth year, on the 14th of February, 1571. His remains were deposited in the Cathedral at Canterbury, in a tomb little worthy either of the rank and virtues of the deceased, or of the splendid monuments by which it is surrounded; and it having afterwards been ascertained that he had been poisoned by his valet, the assassin was seized and executed at La Rochelle.

La Rochelle had been selected as the place of gathering, on account both of its favourable site, and of its staunch adherence to the Reformed doctrine. So early as the year 1534, we read of a female martyr in Poitou who had derived her knowledge of the gospel from that city,[*] and about eighteen years afterwards some cruel executions occurred within its walls. No regular Church, however, is believed to have existed in it till 1558, when a permanent establishment was founded under the care of Richer, one of the ministers who had accompanied Villegagnon's expedition to Brazil.[†] It was in that year also that a visit of the King and Queen of Navarre was distinguished by a theatrical representation not unlike the comedy which we have already mentioned as exhibited at an earlier date before Francis I. The Court and a numerous audience were present, and when the curtain rose, a sick woman was discovered lying at the point of death, and earnestly entreating to be confessed. For that purpose, she was attended first by the Parish priest; and afterwards by friars "black, white, and grey," Carmelites, Dominicans, and Franciscans, who prodigally exhibited their beads and relics, read indulgences in her ear, and at last put upon her "the weeds of Dominick," as a sure passport to Paradise. But their spiritual labours were wholly ineffectual; the dying woman still called for shrift, and in tones of desperation declared that, without more powerful aid, her condition was hopeless. One of her acquaintance then stealthily approached the bed, and in a low murmur, as if afraid of being overheard, whispered that she knew a person who could tranquillize her wounded conscience, but who seldom stirred abroad unless by night. The woman earnestly requested his presence; and accordingly, a man in a lay dress entered. Their conversation was not overheard; but the sick person expressed great pleasure by her gestures, and received from him at parting a small book, which he assured her was a specific for her disease. No sooner had he quitted the stage than the woman arose from her bed, announced her entire recovery, and attributed it altogether to the wonder-working volume which she held in her hands. "This little book," she added, "shall be lent to any one who requires it; but I must forewarn you that it may be hot in handling, and that it smells somewhat of the faggot. For the rest, if you ask either my name, or the name of the book, I must leave both of them as riddles for you to conjecture." The Court of Navarre was far better pleased with this allegory, than were the ecclesiastics of La Rochelle; and the comedians, notwithstanding the protection of royalty, found it prudent to quit the city with speed. The Calvinistic minister, by whom this anecdote is preserved, cannot at first subdue his sturdy prejudice against the abomination of stage plays; but in the end, his spirit appears to become softened by a recollection of the object at which the satire was directed; and he relents into an unwilling approval which might have been sanctioned even by our own Prynne. "God, who is an admirable workman, and who gave an ass language for the reproof of a Prophet, permitted the theatre to speak in this instance when the pulpits were silent; so that those who by profession were teachers of folly, were now in some sort permitted to enunciate truth."[‡]

The Rochellois had manifested but little zeal in behalf of Condé, during the first civil war; they contributed 1600 livres per month to his service, but they refused connection with the General Association of the Reformed Churches. On the commencement of the second troubles, however, they immediately declared in his favour; and at the conclusion of the late peace, they refused to admit a royal garrison, and steadily maintained their independence, notwithstanding menaces of punishment, and even the positive march of troops for their reduction. Their city, of very ancient origin, possessed several privileges and immunities; and a right of electing their own Magistrates, and an exemption from resident military control had kindled among them an unextinguishable spirit of freedom. The population of about 18,000 persons was supported partly by the extensive commerce of their advantageous port, partly by the rich produce of the adjoining country; and this capital, as it may henceforward be deemed, of the Huguenot party, appeared to increase in wealth and strength, amid the desolation which continued to waste most of the other parts of France.

[*] We have not been able to trace Laval's authority for stating that Condé's attendants, whom this deliverance forcibly reminded of the Israelitish passage of the Red Sea, fell upon their knees, and after giving thanks, sang the CXIVth Psalm. But the story is probable; it is characteristic both of the times and of the sect; and under similar circumstances, a like burst of feeling would, perhaps, have been exhibited by the Cameronians. The parallel of the Red Sea was certainly employed by a Rochellois orator, in a speech of congratulation which he addressed to Condé on his arrival.

Condé, having reviewed his forces, addressed them on the lamentable state of their country; spoke of the King as still in captivity, and as the unwilling agent of wicked counsels; denounced the Cardinal of Lorraine by name as the chief author of the existing troubles; expressed profound sorrow for the necessity of a new recourse to arms; and proposed an oath of fidelity to THE CAUSE, (as the Huguenot interests were now named,) which was adopted by acclamation. To the Manifesto which he issued in conformity with this speech, the Court at first replied by a Proclamation of unusual gentleness. No distinction, it was said, should be made by the King between any of his subjects; and Protestants and Catholics might rely, with equal confidence, upon his tender and paternal care. All that was required from the former was pacific conduct and obedience to the laws. Their appeals should receive prompt attention, and all Magistrates were strictly enjoined to redress any grievances submitted to their investigation. A declaration so utterly belied by the former conduct of those who promulgated it was little likely to obtain credit; and as the snare failed, and the Huguenots continued firm, an edict, more according with the real temper and designs of the Court, was issued about the close of September. After eulogizing the clemency and wisdom of the late reigns, and declaring that the present King had framed the edict of January in a similar policy, as a temporary provision till the attainment of his majority, it recounted the perfidy and violence of the Huguenots in the former two wars; and especially noticed their treacherous retention of Montauban, Castres, and La Rochelle, since the conclusion of the late peace. As the sole remedy now left, it forbade, by a perpetual and irrevocable ordinance, all persons, of every condition throughout the whole kingdom, from professing any other than the Catholic faith: the religion of the King, as it had been that of his ancestors. The penalties annexed to a breach of this enactment were confiscation and death; and no more than fifteen days were allowed for the departure of every minister of the pretended Reformation beyond the boundaries of France. The sole mitigation granted was, that no one should be visited for a former profession of Huguenotism, provided he conformed in future to the Church of Rome. A third edict deprived all Huguenots of their dignities, magistracies, and public offices; and the Parliament of Paris, as if to aggravate the fury of these new statutes, framed an oath, to be taken by every one on his acceptance of public employments, that he would live and die in the Catholic and Apostolic faith; and that, if he should ever apostatize from it, he would submit to degradation for his unworthiness. Such were the fierce notes which preluded the renewal of hostilities.

CHAPTER IX.

Battle of Bassac or Jarnac—Death of Condé—Letters of Pius V.—Henry of Bearne declared Protector of the Huguenots—Battle of Moncontour—Capture of Nismes—Treaty of St. Germain—VIIth National Synod—Favourable treatment of the Huguenots—The Cross of Gastines.

The forces on each side were nearly equal, and those of the Huguenots were far more numerous than during the former war. When Condé united his whole army at Aubeterre, he counted 25,000 foot and 3000 horse; the Royalists had about 1000 less of the former, 1000 more of the latter. Notwithstanding the severity of the winter, the Huguenots persisted in fruitless attempts to bring on an engagement, which the Duke of Anjou constantly declined. The Queen of Navarre was indefatigable in her exertions; and chiefly on her account, and through the representations of the Cardinal of Châtillon, the Court of England furnished arms and money, and hospitably entertained the numerous unhappy fugitives chased by persecution from the shores of Britany, Normandy, and Picardy. Elizabeth granted her protection also to a squadron which had been equipped at La Rochelle; and empowered it to cruise in the British Channel, with an assurance that the produce of all captures should be applied to the service of THE CAUSE.

It was not till the following March that any decisive military operation took place, and the two armies then met on the banks of the Charente. The Duke of Anjou had been largely reinforced, and, aware that Condé was awaiting a powerful detachment of German auxiliaries, he determined to anticipate its arrival by an immediate attack. For that purpose it was necessary that the Charente should be passed; but of its two bridges, one at Jarnac was in possession of the Huguenots; the other at Chateau-neuf had been partially destroyed. The remains of the latter, however, being inadequately guarded, were repaired during the night, and crossed by the Royalists on the morning of the 13th of March, before the Admiral who commanded the Huguenot vanguard could assemble his divisions, which were scattered widely over the neighbourhood. His intention, when he learned the advance of the Royalists, was to fall back upon the village of Bassac; but the tardy movements of some of his corps brought on a skirmish with his rear, which soon increased to a general battle. Bassac was stoutly defended; but the Royalists, who at first were driven back with much loss, at length carried and maintained it. When this reverse was announced to Condé, who being posted at some short distance had not hitherto been engaged, the brave Prince was ill-circumstanced to afford assistance. In consequence of some previous hurt, he had entered the field with his arm supported in a sling, and as he rode along his lines, a severe kick from a mettlesome horse belonging to the Comte de la Rochefoucault shattered one of his legs in his boot. Concealing all sense of pain, and without changing the easiness of his tone and manner, he took this opportunity of inculcating a military lesson. "Gentlemen," he said, "bear in mind that fiery horses do more harm than good in action; and that it is but a silly vanity to pique ourselves on their management, and so to distract that attention which ought to be directed altogether on the enemy—you may here see an unlucky proof of my doctrine, which however will not hinder me from fighting." Then waving his sword, he added with greater fervour, "Nobles of France, know that the Prince of Condé with a broken leg and his arm in a scarf has yet courage to give battle!" After these words he rode briskly to the Admiral's assistance; and charging with scarcely 300 men at arms, he found himself unexpectedly opposed to the main body of the Royalists. Surrounded, his horse killed under him, and himself disabled by his recent hurts, he beckoned two gentlemen of the enemy whom he recognized; and having surrendered his sword and received their faith for his security, he was raised from the ground, and seated under a tree. Almost at the same moment the Baron de Montesquieu, a Gascon gentleman and Captain of the Swiss Guards of the Duke of Anjou, rode up to the groupe, and asked who was the prisoner? Upon hearing that it was the Prince of Condé, he exclaimed with vehemence, "'Sdeath, kill him, kill him!" and approaching closely behind his back, discharged a pistol through his head, by which he was instantly despatched.

There is too much reason to believe that this most atrocious and cold-blooded murder would never have been perpetrated had it not been well known that it would be approved by the Duke of Anjou. Young as was that Prince (he had scarcely yet attained his eighteenth year,) the seeds of those evil passions which afterwards rendered him the most detestable of his odious race, had already struck deep root in his bosom, and one among the most prolific of them was revenge. He was jealous of Condé's popular qualities, and apprehensive of his rivalry. There can be little doubt, even after rejecting the improbable details preserved by Brantome, that he had found in him a competitor for the highest military command; and we may attach full credit to another portion of that garrulous anecdote-monger's narrative, in which he proceeds to state that the Duke of Anjou had consented to peace solely for the purpose of entrapping the Prince of Condé, whom he hated with a hatred to describe which the English language has not an expression sufficiently strong, although we should say even unto death.[*] "It was not likely to be otherwise," continues Brantome, remarking on the savage and treacherous act of Montesquieu, "for the Prince, as I well know, had been recommended to many of the favourites of Monsieur, on account of the hatred borne against him from the day which I have mentioned; and assuredly there is nothing which a great man abominates so much as another great man who is his equal; unless it be one who is not so, and who yet endeavours to raise himself to equality."

[*] Qu'il hayssoit à male-mort et plus que tous les Huguenots. Brantome states, that the Prince of Conde demanded the Lieutenancy of the Kingdom when the Spanish troops under d'Alva were on their march; that one evening, during the Queen's supper at St. Germain, the Duke of Anjou drew the Prince aside, and conversed with him for a long time with gestures of great impatience; now grasping the hilt of his sword, now feeling for his poniard, now striking his cap up and down; while the Prince replied unbonnetted, and with an appearance of meekness. Brantome admits that the bystanders, of whom himself was one, could not overhear a syllable of the conversation; nevertheless, he unblushingly adds that the Duke fiercely reproved Condé's presumption for aspiring to an office which was his own due; and assured him, that if he meddled any farther,

The ungenerous treatment which the remains of the fallen Prince received corroborates the suspicion that his assassination may be ultimately charged on the Duke of Anjou. "Monsieur," says Brantome again, "was not at all displeased but overjoyed, and wished to see his enemy's body after the conclusion of the battle. More out of insult than for any other reason, it was thrown across an old she-ass that happened to be at hand; carried to Jarnac with the legs and arms dangling on either side of the beast, and placed in a lower room under the chamber then occupied by the Duke, and on the day before by the Prince himself." After having been thus brutally exhibited as a spectacle to the whole army, the body was in the end delivered to Condé's brother-in-law, the Duke of Longueville, and buried by the Prince of Bearne at Vendôme.

Louis of Bourbon when thus foully and untimely murdered was in his nine-and-thirtieth year, and no personage of his time had evinced more brilliant and attractive qualities. Eminently gifted with the power of captivating those with whom he associated, whether in the court or camp, he appears to have won all affections of which he sought the mastery; and the wish which issued from almost every lip was that Heaven would guard from ill

Ce petit homme tant joly,
Qui toujours cause et toujours rit.

His courtesy, liberality, affability, readiness of speech, and chivalrous courage, are subjects of unbounded admiration even among those most hostile to his opinions. "This Prince," says a contemporary—that Pasquier whose sagacity and knowledge of mankind we have often before had occasion to notice—"was generous and magnanimous; his actions sprang immediately from the heart."—"He left to posterity the reputation of being the most generous Prince of his time," is the character given by another, who had frequent opportunities of close observation, and who served the opposite party. His faults were those of an ardent temper, unrestrained by early discipline, and encouraged by the contagion of a most licentious court. His services to the cause which he adopted were beyond all price; and that the Huguenots were able to make the glorious stand against oppression which we are now narrating, must principally be ascribed to the illustrious rank and the conciliating temper, to the wisdom, the energy, the vigilance, the activity, and the constancy which belonged to their great chieftain. It has been said indeed that his sole motive for embracing the Reformed doctrine was the hope of personal aggrandizement; that the Huguenots were the ladder by which he thought to scale the Throne; and the calumny invented by the Jesuits relative to a coinage bearing the Legend "Lodovicus XIII. Dei Gratiâ Francorum Rex primus Christianus," has been cited in corroboration of this design. How far his motives may have been ambiguous; in what proportions ambition mingled with religious conviction when he announced that he was converted, was a problem unresolved perhaps by even the Prince himself, and one which must be decided by a judgment more unerring than that of man. But it should be remembered that a follower who was long and intimately acquainted with his habits, and whose own strictness of life and of devotion afford a strong assurance that he would not deliberately misrepresent the character of another on those points, after joining in the universal eulogy of Condé's obvious merits, concludes by stating, "He bore himself better in adversity than in prosperity; his greatest commendation of all was his steadfastness in religion."*

Another Huguenot of some notoriety, Robert Stuart, was massacred, like Condé, after receiving quarter in this battle. When carried into the presence of the Duke of Anjou, he was recognized by the Marquis de Villars, as the individual who had killed his brother the constable, Montmorency, at St. Denis; and pricked with a fierce desire of revenge, that nobleman begged the unhappy captive of the Prince. The bloody act which followed was committed not indeed under the immediate sight, but within the hearing of the Duke. Stuart, having been led a little on one side, was stripped of his armour, and deliberately cut to pieces.

The exultation of the youthful conqueror was boundless; and but for the discreet suggestion of one of his confidential officers, that he would thus accredit the rumour which imputed Condé's death to his express orders, he would have erected a chapel to mark the spot on which the Prince had fallen. When intelligence of the victory was conveyed to Metz, the temporary residence of the court, great joy was manifest also in that city. On the arrival of the courier at midnight, Charles arose from his couch to receive him, and proceeded immediately to the cathedral to celebrate a Te Deum. He then appointed a solemn service of thanksgiving throughout the kingdom; notified his success to all the crowned heads his allies; and laid the captured standards at the feet of the Pope. Pius V. was loud in his acknowledgments, and addressed letters of congratulation in return to the chief personages of the French court. "When I received your most welcome messenger, my beloved son," were his words to the King, "announcing the victory gained by God's assistance over His enemies and those of the church, your rebellious subjects; and the death of the source of all these troubles and seditions, the leader of the heretic army; raising my hands to Heaven, I gave thanks to the Almighty with all lowliness of heart, for that He had vouchsafed you success, and had graciously poured out upon us also the riches of His loving-kindness. But in proportion as God has dealt thus mercifully, so ought you with greater diligence and strenuousness to employ this opportunity, that you may follow up and destroy the remnant of the enemy; that you may utterly extirpate all the roots, and even the offsets from the roots, of that so great and so confirmed an evil. If indeed they be not altogether eradicated, they will spring up again in quarters the least expected, as has often occurred before." Then, especially recommending the military occupation of Navarre, he urged Charles by the strongest exhortations to take from the common enemy all power of rising again. "This," he said, "will be best compassed, if you determine that no respect for human things or persons shall tempt you to spare the foes of God, by whom neither God nor yourself has ever yet been spared. You have indeed no other means of appeasing God except by avenging most severely and with due punishment the injuries which He has endured from the most wicked of mankind;" and to that effect the example of Saul and the Amalekites was then propounded and applied. Similar incitements to persecution were repeated in a second letter, written about a fortnight afterwards, in which the King was assured that tranquillity could be obtained for France by no other means than by insisting on unity of religious faith. "To procure that unity, under God's assistance, it is requisite that your Majesty should proceed against God's enemies and your own, by just pains and penalties, exercising with severity the fullest rigour of the law. For if any motive should induce you (which we are far, however, from suspecting) to delay pursuit and vengeance, in those matters which give offence to God, you will deservedly provoke His long-suffering to anger. It is your duty to be deaf to every prayer, to reject every claim of consanguinity and kindred, to manifest yourself inexorable to every voice which may dare to petition for the most impious of men; and to that holy task, as it becomes our pastoral office and our paternal affection, well knowing that you are inclined to undertake it, we nevertheless think it fitting to stimulate you by this fatherly admonition."

Duplicates of these slaughter-breathing letters, with a few necessary variations of address, were at the same time trans-

he would make him repent it, et le rendroit aussi petit compagnon comme il vouloit faire du grand. Disc. lxxx. 1. tom. vi. p. 337. The comparative ages of the two parties, exclusive of the illustrious rank, the known courage, and the general character of the Prince of Condé, sufficiently rebut this gossip.

[*] La Noue, p. 433. That distinguished nobleman, to whom our references have been so frequent, was a branch of one of the most ancient families in Britany. He was born in 1531, and adopted the Huguenot principles before he was thirty years of age. His courage, probity, and sagacity, gave him eminent rank among his party; and so great was his reputation for integrity, that during the reign of Henry III. he was often named by both sides as an arbitrator on disputed points. Having lost an arm before Fontenay, a skilful mechanist framed for him a substitute, from which he derived his nom de guerre,—Bras-de-fer. He was killed at the siege of Lamballe, in 1591.

mitted to Catherine; and a hint was added, that the Pope had heard of applications for the release of some of the heretic prisoners without punishment; a rumour which he confidently trusted the Queen would be able to contradict. To the Duke of Anjou, Pius wrote in terms of high compliment on his brilliant success in so early youth; urging him to follow up his victory with activity, and to exhort his royal brother to administer punishment unsparingly. But the Pontiff's chief expressions of confidence and attachment were reserved for the Cardinal of Lorraine; "If there be any one," he said, "of those numerous illustrious Catholics by God's grace existing in France, who is to be congratulated more heartily than another on this seasonable victory, surely you are that person to whom we would peculiarly manifest our paternal sympathy. Not only because you are endowed with singular piety towards God, and are so deeply imbued with affection for the Catholic faith, that no one is likely to feel greater present joy, but because we know also that through God's assistance, it is mainly to your discreet councils and wise suggestions that the Christian commonwealth of your kingdom is indebted for its prosperity." The remainder of the letter enjoins the Cardinal, in a similar spirit to that which Pius displayed elsewhere, to exert every energy which he possessed for the suppression of any inclination to mercy which might chance to arise in the king's bosom.

The loss of lives in the battle of Jarnac had been inconsiderable in point of number, amounting to about four hundred Huguenots and half as many Royalists. The latter were tardy in improving their victory; and the heroic energy of the Queen of Navarre, together with the skilful generalship of the Admiral, soon restored the courage and reorganized the discipline of the beaten army. The Queen hastened from La Rochelle to the head-quarters at Cognac, and there harangued the troops. While deeply sorrowing for the loss of Condé, she took occasion to propose his bright career as an example which every Huguenot ought to follow. "Still," she exclaimed, "is he living among us in spirit. He has left a son who inherits his name and virtues; and I also have a son who is the property of THE CAUSE." Before she left the camp, the Prince of Bearne, as her son Henry was then called, was formerly declared Protector of the Huguenots, and received oaths of fidelity from the principal officers in the army; the chief command remaining with the Admiral under the title of lieutenant-general.

The death of Francis d'Andelot by a fever, not long after the defeat at Jarnac, was another severe blow upon the Admiral and the Huguenots at large. He was among the earliest personages of distinction who had avowed conversion; and the consequent forfeiture of his Sovereign's favour, and the painful imprisonment which he had endured for conscience sake under Henry II. were sure pledges of both his constancy and sincerity. In soundness of judgment also, and in military science, he was exceeded by few of his party. Dispirited by these repeated strokes of evil fortune, it was with proportionate increase of joy that the Huguenots, in the course of the summer, effected a happy junction with their German allies. After three months' painful march across little less than a thousand miles of hostile territory, during which they were harassed by almost perpetual skirmishes, 7500 reisters and 6000 lansquenets arrived at St. Yrier, to which spot the Admiral had advanced in order to meet them. The Duke of Deux Ponts, by whom this arduous movement had been conducted, overpowered by fatigue and anxiety, died three days before its conclusion; the command devolved upon his lieutenant, Wolrath Count Mansfield, and the Huguenots now presented altogether a formidable army of 25,000 men.

September, however, passed away before the occurrence of any military exploit which need find a place in our narrative. The fury of the Court meantime exhibited itself in a fierce war of proclamations, which by order of the Cardinal of Lorraine were promulgated in the French, Latin, German, Italian, Spanish and English languages. Under the authority of the Parliament of Paris, the chief Huguenot leaders were denounced as traitors; a reward of 50,000 crowns and a free pardon were offered to any one engaged in the rebellion, who should capture the Admiral, dead or alive; the Vidame of Chartres and the Count of Montgomery were sentenced together with him to capital punishment; and their three effigies, after having been drawn in a tumbril to the Place de Grêve, were there suspended from a gibbet. These tokens of determined hatred and bitterness were especially grateful to the Head of the Apostolic Church; and Pius V. wrote afresh to Charles expressing his delight that he had stripped of all his honours, and covered with deserved ignominy, "that execrable and detestable man, if indeed he may be called a man, who pretends to be Admiral of the Kingdom; but who is in truth the agent of the Devil's treachery, the leader and standard-bearer of all heresies, and the stirrer-up of discord and civil war." The results of the parliamentary ordinances were speedily manifested. Won by promises of immunity for the past, of a large bribe in immediate possession, and of protection for the future, the valet of the Admiral undertook to remove him by poison. The plot was discovered, and distinctly traced to an officer high in the service of the Duke of Anjou; the prime mover of the great crime was beyond the reach of punishment, but his villainous agent met the death which his treachery deserved.

As Autumn advanced, strong reasons urged the Admiral to court an engagement. The French gentry of Languedoc, Provence, and Dauphiné, had once again grown impatient of their protracted absence from home, and took little pains to disguise their intentions of disbanding. The Germans murmured and almost mutinied for want of pay; and Coligny perceived that it was only a battle which could prevent the entire dissolution of his army. The Duke of Anjou was far from being pressed by similar necessity; his treasury was rich, his supplies were abundant, and his troops therefore were well contented. But, burning with the ardour of youth, he coveted fresh laurels and was weary of inaction; and even the older and more experienced generals who formed his council, anxiously desired to strike a blow, by which they trusted to free the kingdom from the great hazard to which it was now exposed, by the presence, on both sides, of so numerous bands of foreign mercenaries. In this temper, the two armies approached each other on the 2d of October, near the Castle of Moncontour on a height above the river Dive in Poitou; where a most severe skirmish, greatly disadvantageous to the Huguenots, was terminated only by the night. On the morrow, the Admiral, sensible of his inferiority, would have avoided a renewal of the combat; but the delay occasioned by the tardy obedience of his mutinous Germans when ordered to march, and by endeavours to retain the unwilling Huguenots under their banners, enabled the Duke of Anjou to force his enemy into battle against his better judgment. The languishing spirit of the troops was reanimated by the appearance of the young Princes on the field before the combat began; and Henry of Navarre, with that gallant bearing which so often afterwards availed him in the hour of peril and difficulty, rode along the lines, courteously saluting the German leaders, and addressing the French nobles familiarly by name. After a short opening cannonade, the light troops of the Huguenots were first driven back; and in the subsequent advance of the main Royalist body upon that of the Admiral, he was wounded in the cheek and compelled to withdraw. The battle then became severe. For awhile the Royalist line wavered, and fortune manifestly appeared inclining to the Reformed. The seasonable presence of the Duke of Anjou, who, careless of danger, had a horse killed under him, and plunging into the thickest fight, pressed the wearied Huguenots with a charge of fresh troops, after two hours' contest changed their short success into a complete route. The German lansquenets were first trodden down by their own flying reisters; and when afterwards, surrounded and overpowered by a greatly superior force, they had thrown down their arms and begged quarter, so great was the fury of the Swiss mercenaries opposed to them, that out of 4000 men not more than 200 were spared; 2000 Huguenot infantry fell at the same time, and about an equal number were taken prisoners; the cavalry suffered less severely, and their killed did not exceed 300. On the other hand, the chief loss of the Royalists was in their horse, and among the 500 men at arms who perished were counted many officers of note. Standards, baggage, and artillery fell into the possession of the conquerors, but their success although complete in the field did not extend beyond its limits. The flight of the scattered army was so well covered by a reserve under Prince Louis of Nassau, that pursuit was almost immediately abandoned as hopeless and unavailing.*

It was to the care of that brave and able general that the young Princes of Bearne and Condé were entrusted, with permission to view the battle from a neighbouring height. The former watched the alternations of the field with intense anxiety; and, at a moment, during the first shock of the two main bodies, in which the Royalists showed symptoms of unsteadiness, it was with difficulty he was restrained from charging in person. When checked in his purpose, he exclaimed with bitterness of disappointment, "Then we throw away our advantage, and the battle in consequence!" and the result of the day proved how correct had been the military instinct of this warrior of sixteen.

* William, Prince of Orange, and his brothers, chased from the Netherlands by the Duke d'Alva, had joined the march of the Germans with a few troops of horse; but William had returned to Flanders before the battle of Moncontour.

The victory of Moncontour once again called forth the Papal congratulations, and they were delivered in terms similar to those which had followed the triumph of Jarnac. Unsparing dispensation of punishment, inexorable firmness in resisting entreaties for mercy, and unbending resolution to mould every man's faith after a single model, were earnestly recommended to the Most Christian King; and the establishment of the Inquisition in every city of his dominions was advanced as the specific and sovereign prophylactic against the contagion of heresy. In spite of these counsels, little advantage was derived by the conquerors from their great victory. Instead of vigorously pushing the scattered remnant of the Huguenots, the Duke of Anjou commenced the siege of St. Jean d'Angely, a neighbouring fortified town, which according to the maxims of war at that time, he was unwilling to leave in his rear. Its capture cost him two important months, and 6000 men. who perished under its walls by the sword or disease. The defence was most gallant; and the Lord de Pilles who conducted it, did not accept the honourable terms under which he capitulated, till his garrison was reduced to less than half its original number, his ammunition was exhausted, his walls were battered to the ground, and he was utterly hopeless of relief.

The Admiral fell back in the first instance upon Parthenay, a few leagues from the scene of his defeat. A short delay in that town and in Niort to which he afterwards retreated, enabled him to collect his entire cavalry and about 4,000 foot; and having first taken measures for the security of La Rochelle, he determined to abandon the present seat of war, and to pass the winter in Guienne and Languedoc. Those provinces and their immediate neighbourhood offered many advantages. They were unoccupied by any Royalist force which could excite apprehension; such of their towns as had shown themselves well affected to THE CAUSE would afford recruits and supplies; and such as were hostile might be given up as free quarters to the Germans, hungering for their wages, and little scrupulous whether they received them from plunder or from pay. Montauban on the frontiers of the two Provinces was chosen as the principal depôt; from that town numerous excursions were made into the surrounding districts, and Toulouse was visited with especial severity in reprisal for the death of Rapin.

The capture of Nismes was one of the most remarkable episodes in the history of this winter. In that rich and distinguished city, a great proportion of the inhabitants had very early embraced the Reformed Doctrine; but the austerity of the Governor St. André had driven the most zealous Huguenots from their abodes, and reduced those who still lingered behind to apparent conformity. The hope of triumphant return still, however. glowed unextinguished in the bosoms of the Exiles, and by the courage of a simple artisan it was ultimately gratified. A copious stream rising without the walls, at the foot of the hills which overshadow the beautiful remains of the temple of Diana, after traversing the city, issues again from it near the Porte des Carnes. At its exit, it was protected by a strong iron grate, not far above which was stationed a sentinel, relieved once every hour during the night. The guard, when he quitted his watch, gave a signal on the city bell to warn his successor, and thus a few minutes intervened between every relief, during which the post was unoccupied. Madaron, a carpenter of the neighbourhood, having observed this unmilitary remissness, concerted his plan accordingly. Having descended into the ditch at nightfall, during the absence of the sentinel, he girded himself with a rope thrown from the walls by a confederate, whose grasp as it was relaxed or tightened was to notify that the moment was favourable, or otherwise to the workman below. Thus prepared, Madaron approached the grating and filed the bars: the gustiness of the autumnal breezes, and the constant murmuring of the rivulet assisting to conceal whatever noise he was unable to avoid; and which, even if it broke at all upon the ear of the unsuspecting sentinel, was attributed by him to any but the real cause; some stone, he thought, was carried roughly down the channel and dashed against the banks, or some one of the many dogs who prowled along the ramparts was gnawing a half-eaten bone. Knee-deep in mud and exposed to the inclemency of frequent storms, Madaron continued his patient toil during fifteen nights, selecting those which were moonless and cloudy; and before each dawn, having smeared the bars with a composition of wax and clay, in order to conceal the marks of his file. he quitted the ditch undiscovered. Not till the work was completed did he disclose his ulterior scheme to the Exiles; and the remainder of the perilous enterprise was undertaken with zeal by a Huguenot detachment quartered in the neighbourhood. Three hundred men were placed in ambush under the cover of some olive trees by which the city is surrounded; and they were accompanied, as was usual on such occasions, by a minister, who passed the hours previous to the attack in prayer and spiritual admonition. But while they awaited the appointed moment, a tempest accompanied with lightning most unusually vivid well nigh disconcerted the ripened undertaking. Struck with terror by this prodigy, as it appeared to them, at so late a season of the year, and fearing that they must have been discovered from the walls, the soldiers declared that Heaven, by those tokens, had avowed itself hostile to their enterprise; and it required all the zeal and eloquence of the minister to direct their superstition into an opposite channel, and to convert this inopportune omen into a presage of victory. Their captain, seizing an instant in which they seemed thus impressed, hurried to the ditch, easily removed the grating, entered the city with a few comrades, and opened the gates to the remainder. The drowsy burghers were roused from sleep by loud shouts and trumpet-blasts in their streets; and the dead hour of the night increased the panic occasioned by these unwonted sounds. Little resistance was attempted; and before morning, Nismes, with the exception of its citadel, was in possession of the Huguenots. In the first exultation of victory many lives were sacrificed; and the aged Governor who had broke a leg in attempting to escape by leaping from the walls, fell a victim to the revenge which his former harshness had provoked. The citadel maintained itself during a three month's siege, but at length capitulated, and Nismes, the most important city of Languedoc, fell altogether into the power of the Huguenots.

On the return of spring, the Admiral was early in motion. The court, indeed, with its customary policy. had expressed willingness to treat for peace even immediately after the battle of Moncontour, and coveted nothing so much as that disarming of the Huguenots which would render them an easy prey. But Coligny was too sagacious not to perceive, that he could secure far better terms, if it were in his power to assume a menacing attitude, than if he negotiated under the pressure of defeat. A severe and dangerous illness checked his progress not long after he had resumed the field; and upon his recovery were suspended the fortunes of the Huguenot CAUSE. "Peradventure," writes Le Noüe, "if he had been carried away, there would have ensued change of counsayle; for having lost the hinge whereupon the whole gate was turned they could hardly have found such another: but in the end God sent him health to the great contentation of all men."

By the middle of June, the Huguenots had penetrated into Burgundy. During the eight months which had elapsed since their defeat at Moncontour, they had made a circuit of the greater part of France, almost everywhere with success; and passing over nearly 300 leagues of country, they had gained or recovered fifty principal towns. Paris was now their avowed destination; and that great capital already trembled at the approach of their twice beaten army. The Maréchal de Cossée, with a greatly superior force, lay between them and the object of their march; and in a long and hard-fought skirmish at René le Duc, each party so far learned the vigour of its enemy, as to feel unwilling to renew the combat. A suspension of arms for ten days ensued in consequence; and notwithstanding the zealous remonstrances of the Spanish Ambassador, and the well-known disapprobation of the Pope, a treaty of peace was finally concluded at St. Germain on the 15th of August.*

Pius V. successively addressed each of the leading personages of the French court, through whose influence he felt any hope that he might avert amicable negotiation. Twice he wrote to Charles himself; once to Catherine, urging her to prevent by her maternal care the numerous dangers to which the King was likely to be exposed from wicked counsellors; once to the Duke of Anjou, once to the Cardinal of Bourbon. His last missive was directed to the Cardinal of Lorraine, on the very day before the final signature of the Treaty. This most confidential of the Papal correspondents was exhorted and implored in the name of the Almighty God, as he bore in mind the duty which he owed to Heaven and to the Catholic Faith; as he was conscious of the distinguished fidelity which he had always manifested to both of them, in the most turbulent season by which France had ever been agitated; as he remembered the dignity and importance of the part which he sustained in the Realm; to leave no exertions untried by which he might disturb and overthrow the negotiation. But these artifices by which the pretended Vicar of the God of Peace sought to prolong the continuance of war proved altogether unavailing; and it remained for him to denounce the conclusion of the treaty with a bitterness not less remarkable than the pertinacity with which he had endeavoured to impede its advance. No sooner was the peace signed than his tears were abundantly poured forth for the hazardous compact by which the heretics had succeeded in imposing upon the court terms so nefarious and so destructive. He could not but apprehend that God had abandoned to a reprobate mind the King and his counsellors who had given their assent to it, so that seeing they might not see, and hearing they might not understand.

* At the conclusion of the peace of St. Germain, we lose the important guidance of two very prominent and upright actors in the scenes which they describe, Castelnau and La Noüe.

The chief provisions of the peace of St. Germain were amnesty for the past; restoration of the Roman Catholic faith in all places in which it had been suspended; and permission for the Huguenots to live in every part of the kingdom, unmolested on account of their religion, and free from domiciliary visits, "provided they behaved themselves according to the ordinances of the present edict." The privilege of celebrating public service in their Chateaux during the period of their actual residence, was confirmed to lords holding their Fiefs in capite; others were permitted to solemnize worship for their families; "yet in case any of their friends should chance to come there to the number of ten, or some Christening should occur in haste, the company not exceeding the same number, they shall not be prosecuted nor troubled for the same." As an especial gratification to his "dear and most beloved aunt," the Queen of Navarre, the King empowered her to have divine service performed, in the presence of as many persons as chose to assist, in one house in each of her Fiefs, even during her absence from it. The suburbs of certain provincial towns, expressly named, were set apart for the exercise of general worship, provided such towns were neither the actual residence of the Court for the time being, nor within two leagues of that residence. In Paris and within ten leagues it was altogether prohibited. The Universities, Schools, and Hospitals were thrown open without regard to difference of religion, and the Huguenots were declared capable of holding all dignities and public offices. Above all, the four important towns, La Rochelle, La Charité, Montauban, and Cognac, were delivered for two years into the custody of the Princes of Navarre and Condé; in order that all of their religion who felt unwilling to dwell elsewhere might if they so pleased fix their abode in those places. The occupation of La Rochelle secured to the Huguenots free intercourse with their English Allies; La Charté commanded the navigation of the Loire; Montauban opened to them a communication with Languedoc; and Cognac was in the heart of Angoumois, a Province in which their friends very greatly predominated.

These terms, notwithstanding many painful and invidious distinctions which they created or retained, were on the whole much more advantageous than the fortune of war had entitled the Huguenots to expect. By many, therefore, they were contemplated with suspicion. The wits of the Court amused themselves by an untranslatable pun bearing reference to the two chief negotiators, and named the peace "lame and ill conditioned." Graver politicians ominously foreboded a speedy renewal of calamity from the hollowness of the reconciliation. The Admiral alone expressed cordial satisfaction. Disgusted by the many atrocities which he had witnessed, by those fearful acts which no strictness of discipline can wholly restrain during the rage of civil contest, he was steadily resolved to close its horrors at any price. He felt strong hopes of directing the King's inclinations to a war with Spain in the Low Countries; and he more than once forcibly declared his willingness to encounter a violent and ignominious death, rather than again to draw the sword against his fellow-countrymen.

The King's marriage with Elizabeth of Austria, daughter of the Emperor Maximilian II., was celebrated before the close of this year; and a similar contract was proposed between Margaret, the sister of Charles, and Henry Prince of Bearne; a union by which it was affirmed that the conflicting interests of the two religions would be finally reconciled. One pretender to the hand of that Princess was first to be silenced, and the King took a summary mode of extinguishing whatever ambitious hope had been kindled in the bosom of the young Duke of Guise by Margaret's somewhat prodigal encouragement. Indignant at the presumption of a subject in thus aspiring to match with royalty, Charles instructed his bastard brother, Henry d'Angoulême, Grand Prior of France, to assassinate the Duke while engaged on a hunting party; and notwithstanding the hesitation of the instrument which he selected, the crime would probably have been committed but for a seasonable warning which Guise received, and for his equally seasonable haste to disarm his Sovereign's jealousy by an immediate marriage with Catherine of Cleves, widow of the late Prince of Porcean.

Early in the following spring, the VIIth Synod of the Reformed Church of France assembled at La Rochelle. It was the first similar meeting which had received the sanction of royal authority, and it commenced its sittings under the direct protection of the King's Letters Patent. Beza was summoned from Geneva as Moderator; and he was supported among others by Nicolas Des Gallards, a minister in conjunction with whom he is supposed to have written that Ecclesiastical History to which our pages have been so largely indebted. By this assembly, the Confession of Faith drawn up at the first Synod in 1589 was recited and confirmed. The teaching of Socinus and his followers in Poland and Transylvania was condemned as a rivival of the false doctrines of "Samosatanus, Arius, Photinus, Nestorius, Eutyches and many others, yea, and of Mahomed himself also;" and the ministers unanimously voted "their detestation of all those abominable errors and heresies." A Committee appointed to examine "the Tables of Cozain" reported that they were to be "condemned, rejected, and detested;" and they were instructed to desire the English bishops "to repress his and the other errors which had begun to be in vogue among them." Beza was "ordered" to answer certain impugners of the Confession of Faith; and little freedom, it seems, was left to the exercise of his discretion as to the fittest mode of obeying this command. He was to employ materials collected by the minister of Bordeaux, and the whole was afterwards "to be communicated to the brethren of Geneva." Some obscurities in the Confession were explained; and a subtle commentary was given on the sense in which "participation of Christ's substance" was predicated, in that article which treated of the Lord's Supper. A vague form of ordination was drawn up by De Chandieu, and ministers were "forbidden to practise physic, or any other calling, trade, or vocation whatsoever."

Never had any Huguenot ecclesiastical meeting been attended by so many distinguished personages as graced this Synod. "There were present," says the report of its acts, "Joane, by the grace of God, Queen of Navarre; the high and mighty Prince Henry, Prince of Navarre; the high and mighty Prince Henry de Bourbon, Prince of Condé; the most illustrious Prince Louis, Count of Nassau; Sir Gasper Count de Coligny, the Admiral of France, and divers other lords and gentlemen, besides the deputies who were members of the Church of God." A proposition made by the Admiral is distinguished by its gentleness and charity;—that no person when first reported to the Consistory for impropriety of behaviour should be mentioned by name till his miscarriage had been proved. The Queen of Navarre was warned in somewhat imperious language, "not to sell her vacant offices, especially those of judicature; nor to bestow them upon the recommendation of another, without her personal knowledge of their qualifications and abilities who are to discharge them;" and to a question which she proposed, she received an answer manifesting that the Church was animated by a decided spirit of exclusiveness. "The Queen of Navarre having demanded our advice whether through want of others she might with a good conscience receive and establish Roman Catholic Officers in her dominions, as also in her Court and family. To which the Synod humbly replied, that her majesty should take special heed about her domestic officers, and as much as possible to employ persons fearing God, and of the Reformed religion; and that she should cause the Papists who are peaceable, and of unblameable lives, to be instructed, and that she should utterly discard those traitors, who forsook her in her necessities, and cruelly persecuted God's saints in these last troubles."

The events occupying the two years which succeeded the peace of St. Germain have been scrutinized with a keenness of research not exceeded by that applied to any other period of history. Pure zeal for religion, a sober love of truth, the blindness and bigotry of partizanship, and that natural curiosity which is always more or less excited by difference of opinion, have each by turns addressed themselves to the inquiry; and it would be difficult indeed to present the reader with any facts which have not before seen the light, or to offer him any arguments by which the deductions obtained from those facts have not already been supported. It will be enough if we can hope to frame our narrative with accuracy; and if, while we show that which appears to us to be the incontrovertible result of the evidence before us, we can succeed in guarding ourselves from the opposite errors either of extenuation or exaggeration. In entering upon any less well-known and less beaten story, it would be a just rule of composition not to anticipate the catastrophe by premature allusions; not to place our goal full in sight at the commencement, as the point of direct view which closes a long perspective. But, in the present instance, such concealment is wholly impracticable. Were it attempted, the reader's impatient acquaintance with facts would outrun the writer's sedate artifice; every eye which glances but for a moment at the names of Catherine de Medicis and of Charles IX. associates them at once with the fiend-like deeds of St. Bartholomew; and there would be little good taste in affecting to dissemble our necessary and unavoidable knowledge of that association.

If we look to the former transactions of the reign of Charles, we shall everywhere observe, during the short intervals of peace which served but as breathing times for the renewal of more fierce hostility, numerous breaches of fidelity on the part of the government which it was not thought worth while either to conceal or to excuse. It is needless to repeat the many instances with which our pages have abounded, of bitter insults, of sickening cruelties, of judicial murders, of secret assassinations, suffered by the followers of the proscribed doctrines; of the violences openly perpetrated; of the redress haughtily and contemptuously denied. War was to them comparatively a season of relief; for they were then prepared for danger, and in many instances were fully able to resist it. But during nominal peace, the destroyer approached them stealthily and unexpectedly; and the sword was sheathed only that the victims might be put under saws, and under harrows, and under axes of iron. On a sudden, however, we shall perceive this policy altogether changed; the government appeared actuated by a new spirit and a new soul; its tokens of hatred were transformed into unmeasured prodigality of affection; its most hidden counsels were seemingly communicated to those against whom it had breathed the uttermost vengeance; the chiefs so lately abhorred were courted, honoured, and preferred; and the great mass of their followers, whose extermination had been so often not only menaced but attempted, was protected by authority, and encouraged to resort to the shield of law.

This revolution of feeling in the Court was greatly in advance, however, of the spirit which prevailed among the people at large; and the Roman Catholic rabble of Paris, who early manifested that their opinions remained unaltered, were severely taught that they must accommodate them to those notions which it now suited their rulers to adopt. About three years before the time of which we are treating, Gastines, an opulent and distinguished merchant in the capital, unblamed in life and an object of general attachment, had been accused of celebrating divine service and the Lord's Supper by night, in his own house, in contravention of the royal edict. The denouncement involved his brother also and another intimate family connection, as being present at this forbidden worship; and the sentence passed upon them all was death and confiscation. Gastines, venerable from his years, his demeanour, and his benevolence, was regarded with universal pity and affection. His character had endeared him to every class of his fellow-citizens; it was more than suspected that bribery had been employed among his judges by a notorious tool of the Cardinal of Lorraine; and it was not without manifestations of popular discontent, that an offence in all preceding instances expiated by fine and banishment, was now to be punished on the scaffold. But the authorities refused mitigation of their decree, and the prisoners were executed. Yet farther, perhaps in consequence of the unwelcome expression of public disapprobation, the house of the chief culprit, in which the Huguenot meetings had been assembled, was razed to the ground; and as a perpetual mark of ignominy, a monument, named the Cross of Gastines, built on the spot from the produce of the sale of his property, bore inscribed upon it his sentence of condemnation. By the first clause of the Treaty of St. Germain, a general amnesty had been declared; and that provision included the annulment of all criminal decrees and judgments issued on religious accounts during the late troubles; the restoration of their confiscated property to the sufferers; and the suppression of all records and monuments which might prevent oblivion of the past. No act so important as the demolition of the Cross of Gastines had hitherto been demanded by the Huguenots in compliance with this stipulation; but, when demanded, it was not refused. As a compromise, however, and to avoid any breach of the peace which might arise from the presence of a tumultuous mob in a crowded city, it was agreed that the removal should take place by night, and that the monument should be re-erected in the neighbouring cemetery of St. Innocent's, after the obliteration of the offensive inscription and the substitution of another in honour of the holy cross. But it was little likely that a work of so great magnitude, requiring the labour of many hours, could pass unobserved. A few straggling spectators gathered on the spot in the first instance; and as their numbers increased, the indulgence shown to the Huguenots was vehemently and angrily discussed. Fierce words were the prelude to fiercer acts; and the mob, procuring arms, attacked and pillaged some houses belonging to the Reformed, and killed a servant who offered resistance. Montmorency, the Governor of Paris, hastened to repress the tumult; some of the more prominent ringleaders were cut down by his followers, and one of the very lowest class, whom it has been thought worth while to specify as a vender of oranges, was summarily hanged from the window of a neighbouring house. This vigorous demonstration of power struck terror into the other rioters, who speedily dispersed; and it was received with marked joy by the Huguenots, who concluded that their security was an object of solicitude to the police. How far their deduction was correct remains to be perceived hereafter.

CHAPTER X.

Projected marriage between Henry of Bearne and the Princess Margaret—Assassination of Lignerolles—The Admiral comes to Court—Pius V. endeavours to break off the match—Mission of the Cardinal Legate Alessandrino—Examination of the words used to him by Charles IX.—Death of Pius V.—VIIIth National Synod—Letter of the Queen of Navarre to her son—She proceeds to Paris—Her death and character—Henry assumes the title of King of Navarre—The Admiral disregards all warnings—His arrival in Paris—Fraud respecting the Dispensation—The Marriage—Festivities succeeding it—The Admiral is wounded—Maurevel the Assassin—The King visits the Admiral—State of the Huguenots on the night before the Feast of St. Bartholomew.

The Marriage of the Prince of Bearne with the Princess Margaret formed the subject of an express mission to La Rochelle, and the Maréchal de Biron was despatched to invite the Queen of Navarre and her son to the royal presence, and to urge the projected nuptials as the surest pledge of sincere reconciliation. The envoy was instructed to represent, as from himself, that the conclusion of this alliance would effectually destroy the slight remaining influences of the Guises, who were already on the eve of quitting Court. He added, that a refusal might leave evil impressions on the mind of the King, who was negotiating with Rome for the dispensation requisite both on account of consanguinity and of difference of religion. The Pope as yet hesitated; but if other matters were previously arranged between the contracting parties, which could only be done by word of mouth, little doubt remained but that his Holiness would gratify the King's desire. In this assertion Biron went far beyond the truth. Pius, to his last moments, obstinately persisted in refusal; and on one occasion, as we are told by his secretary and biographer, placed his left hand, the hand he always used, on his throat, and fervently declared that he would lose his head rather than grant the dispensation. The Queen of Navarre returned her thanks with all due gratitude for the proffered honour; but she considered the proposal too weighty not to require farther time for deliberation. Such a connection, she said, was doubtless to be coveted, both on account of the distinction and of the advantage which it conferred; nevertheless, some hesitation could not but arise from the nearness of blood and the opposition of faith between the principals. If, after consulting her divines, she found that she could proceed with a safe conscience, she would then most willingly assent to any conditions which the King and the Queen, his Mother, might propose.

The Court passed the summer at Blois, frequently repeating, without effect, the invitation to the Queen of Navarre, her son, and the young Prince of Condé. In the autumn it proceeded to Bourgueil, in Touraine; where stood one of the many delicious palaces which Catherine's Italian taste for magnificent architecture had constructed at a boundless expense. That visit was clouded by a dark event never yet fully explained; but which contemporary suspicion connected with the latter and far more bloody occurrences. The Count de Lignerolles, a confidential favourite of the Duke of Anjou, and one of the chief officers in his household, was assassinated at mid-day, in the Town Hall, by a band of the leading courtiers; among whom were especially noted the Vicomte de la Guerche, a personal enemy, and Henri D'Angoulême, the King's bastard brother. The rank of the assassins, the publicity of their deed, and the ultimate impunity with which it was attended, left not a doubt that it had been perpetrated by high command; and various motives were assigned for the crime. By some it was attributed to the King's jealousy in a love affair, but the habits of Charles render that conjecture improbable. Others whispered that an important secret, known to few but the royal brothers, had been confided by the Duke of Anjou to his friend; and that Lignerolles, indiscreetly betraying his acquaintance with it to the King's ears, had atoned, by the forfeiture of life, for his idle vanity.[*]

Undisturbed by this murder, however, the royal circle continued its diversions; and the Admiral, less cautious than the Queen of Navarre, repaired to Court, and was received with distinguished honours. He was permitted to entertain a private bodyguard of fifty men, even within the verge of the palace; the King restored him to his seat in Council; presented him with a largess of 100,000 crowns, as an indemnity for his losses in the past troubles; addressed him as cousin; and added a few words, the ambiguous sense of which must have afforded no slight inward triumph to this most consummate dissembler. "Now that we have once got you by our side, you shall not hereafter quit it hastily nor at your pleasure." But the lure had been spread for a larger quarry than it had as yet attracted; the Admiral, singly, was an insufficient prize; and, after a short visit, during which the war in Flanders was studiously made the principal subject of discussion, he was permitted to return to his estate of Châtillon.

It is probable that the marked attentions thus offered to the Admiral, called forth an indirect remonstrance, which Pius V. addressed to Catherine before the close of this year. While exciting her to activity in behalf of the English Romanists, he pointed out the former declaration which Elizabeth, "that worst of queens," had promulgated in favour of Coligny and the Huguenots. He warned her that the French pretended Reformed, notwithstanding the existing appearance of peace, still held perpetual communication with England; that they were collecting treasure by pillage and piracies from the Catholics;[†] and that, perhaps, a conspiracy was at that moment ripening in the very beart of her kingdom. Charles also received a despatch, in which, among other matters, he was strongly urged to break off the treaty of marriage in progress between his sister and the Prince of Bearne. "Grieved am I," wrote the Pontiff, "that their nuptials are so pressingly advanced, under an empty hope that the Prince may become reconciled to the Catholic Church through the persuasion of his bride; when it is rather to be feared, on the other hand, that she may be perverted through her unbelieving husband. Her salvation, indeed, is exposed to hazard; for even if she should still wish to live as a Catholic, what peace, what repose can she expect with a heretic spouse? By conforming to his errors she may, perhaps, obtain a brief and delusive tranquility during the present miserable life; but it will be purchased at the price of eternal damnation hereafter, and of interminable torments in hell."

In order powerfully to awaken these convictions in the bosom of the French King, the Cardinal Alessandrino, Legate in Spain and Portugal, was instructed to proceed to Blois; and during a conference held after his arrival, a memorable declaration fell from the lips of Charles, which affords conclusive evidence as to the preconcertment of the ensuing massacre. "You may assure his Holiness," said the King, "as the event will prove, that my only object in concluding this marriage is to avenge myself on God's enemies, and to chastise those great rebels." No strength can be added to the deductions recently made from this most important fact, by one whose deep and overflowing knowledge of history, and whose acuteness in the examination of conflicting testimony, qualify him beyond all others for the task which he has performed. It may perhaps, however, have been too easily admitted that De Thou "disbelieved" the story. No expression so strong as that of unbelief, is, we think, to be found in the pages of that great Historian. He tells us, indeed, that Italian writers are fond of vexatious refinements; and then, on the authority of some of those writers, (one of whom, Catena, he specifies by name,) he relates the anecdote which we are about to give below, without at all delivering his own opinion as to its credibility. But when De Thou wrote, the irrefragable evidence of D'Ossat, which we shall by and by subjoin, had not been published.

Catena was secretary to Cardinal Alessandrino, and afterwards to Sixtus V. He published, in 1587, both at Rome and at Mantua, a Life of Pius V., professedly composed from oral communications with that Pope, and from the numerous state papers to which the author had ready access in consequence of his office. In that work he informs us, that when the Cardinal Alessandrino, during his mission to Blois, had advanced objections to the contemplated marriage, the King replied by an assurance, that upon that marriage the public peace was altogether suspended; and that when pressed to explain himself farther, he continued in the words which we have given above. The same anecdote had been told as a matter of triumphant boasting yet earlier, by Camillo Capilupi, nephew of a cardinal of that name, who wrote at Rome an apology for the St. Bartholomew, within a month after its occurrence. The work was submitted to the Cardinal of Lorraine, and received his approbation, but was suppressed for a time as not agreeing with the representations of the massacre which the Court of France ultimately determined to circulate.

Never has any morsel of secret history received confirmation so remarkable and so incontestable as has fallen to the lot of this most damnatory fact. Seven and twenty years had elapsed since the massacre, when the Cardinal D'Ossat, the most sagacious diplomatist of his time, was engaged in negotiating with the court of Rome respecting the dissolution of marriage with Henry IV., for which Margaret of Valois had applied. In a conversation on that affair with Pope Clement VIII. (Aldobrandini) the latter stated that he himself, having been auditor to Cardinal Alessandrino and in personal attendance upon him at Blois, was well acquainted with the occurrences during that mission. It was universally known, he said, that Margaret was most reluctant to the match, and that she was sacrificed in order to forward her brother's political designs; and he added, that after frequent discussions, the King, on one occasion, taking Alessandrino by the hand, had addressed him thus: "My Lord Cardinal, all you have said is true, and I admit it to be so; and I am grateful both to the Pope and to you. If I had any other means of avenging myself on my enemies, I would not conclude this marriage; but in fact I have not any other means." Aldobrandini, deeply struck by these words, committed them to writing at the moment; and he told D'Ossat that he could still find the memorandum among Alessandrino's papers. He added also, that when the Cardinal, on his return to Italy, first received intelligence of the St. Bartholomew, he exclaimed, "God be praised! The King of France has kept his promise to me." D'Ossat, upon reporting this conversation with Clement VIII. to some of his friends in the sacred college, learned that the same fact had already been stated to them by the Holy Father himself in an early stage of the pending discussion; and thus fortified by the authority of the Pontiff, the Ambassador employed the communication, in the written argument upon the divorce of the Queen which he delivered before the conclave.

[*] De Thou, l. 14.; where he states many conflicting opinions concerning the fatal secret. Some fully believed it to relate to the subsequent massacre; other Huguenots about court, "as I have heard from their own mouths," adds De Thou, "did not think that Charles at that time contemplated the massacre." A little onward (li. 9.) he remarks, that although Charles himself at time might not be fully informed of the bloody design, it was believed to have been long meditated by Catherine, the Duke of Anjou, and their confidants. He farther notices a fact which greatly tends to inculpate Charles. A wooden tower was constructed opposite the Louvre, avowedly that its mimic siege might form part of the diversions at the marriage of Henry and Margaret. It was suddenly pulled down; and the story ran that the King of Navarre and the chief Huguenots, arrayed as assailants of the mock fortress, were to have been killed by an accidental discharge of ball-cartridges from its battlements; that Lignerolles betrayed his privity to that design; and that the King, in order to silence suspicion, murdered the indiscreet courtier and destroyed the tower. The same story is related at much length in the Mémoires d'Estat, i. 44.

[†] The fleet of the Prince of Orange, which harassed the Spanish and Portuguese commerce, was allowed to ride undisturbed in the vincinity of La Rochelle, which became a mart for its prizes.

That the words which Clement VIII. repeated were almost, if not altogether, the very words employed by Charles, the carefulness with which the Pope had recorded them in writing, warrants us fully to believe. Their variation from those attributed to the King by Capilupi and by Cateno, is in letter only, not in spirit; there is sufficient diversity to remove all suspicion of a common understanding for the propagation of imposture; sufficient agreement to corroborate the general truth of each separate writer. The expressions are too precise to have been used without a definite meaning; and if "the only inference" to be drawn from them is that Clement believed Charles to have "compelled the marriage under the expectation that it would give him the superiority, and allow him to punish those whom he considered as obstinate rebels;" if "this," as has been stated, "is all," Clement's measure of "punishment" and estimate of "superiority" must have been gigantic indeed! "Vengeance" is a somewhat strong term for political ascendancy; it was vengeance which Charles promised, and it was by the massacre of St. Bartholomew that Clement acknowledged the promise to be fulfilled.

The sickness of his Uncle the Pope recalled the Cardinal Alessandrino to Rome, where he arrived a few weeks before the decease of Pius. The election of a successor was too rapid to admit of the presence of the Cardinal of Lorraine, who hastened to attend the conclave; but he nevertheless proceeded onward to the Vatican, in order that he might communicate the secret intentions of the French cabinet to the new Pontiff, Gregory XIII. The known object of the Legate's recent mission to Blois had deterred the Queen of Navarre, (whose consent to the marriage of her son had now been obtained,) from appearing at court till after the Cardinal's departure. The King received her with tokens of esteem and attachment; affected to speak insultingly of the "Monk" who had endeavoured to prevent the marriage, and whom he had treated as his impudence deserved; and assured her "that he was about to give his sister, not to the Prince of Navarre singly, but to all the Huguenots collectively; in order that they might receive her as a bride, and lay aside every doubt as to the immutable firmness of his edicts." Here again, the hypocrite was precise in his choice of words; and carefully weighed the mixture of truth with which he "dashed and brewed" his duplicity. The Queen's retinue was splendid; she was accompanied by the Prince of Condé, by Louis of Nassau, by the Count de la Rochefaucault, and a large train of Huguenot nobility; and when she proceeded to the capital to arrange the final preparations for the approaching nuptials, she took up her residence in the palace of Guillart, ex-bishop of Chartres, who, having openly embraced the Reformed religion, had been degraded at Rome.

Even if the connection about to be formed by their Protector was disapproved by the Huguenot church, its ministers discreetly abstained from any public expression of their dissent. In their VIIIth synod, held at Nismes on the 6th of May, we find an incidental order that "letters should be written unto her Majesty, the Queen of Navarre, and to his Highness the Prince her son;" and it is probable, although it is not so stated, that those letters were either monitory or congratulatory. The other proceedings of the Synod were yet more than usually meagre. According to custom, a few troublesome matrimonial regulations were submitted to discussion; and a singular indulgence, as it seems to have been considered, was granted to doctors and professors of divinity. The question asked was, whether such persons "were not bound by the XVIIIth canon of our discipline to put away their wives if guilty of adultery, or else to be deprived of their professorships in our schools and churches?" Unto which there was this answer returned, "That that canon did purely relate unto pastors, not unto professors; nor is there a parity of reason for the one as for the other. Ministers being public officers in the whole church, are to be exemplary in their persons and families for holiness, and therefore must not receive again an adulterous wife into their bosoms, which would be a scandal to the church. Moreover, Professors of divinity are not to reprove and correct as pastors are; so that they may, if they please, pass by the wickedness of their wives, and notwithstanding their adultery, enjoy their professor's place among us, and not be deposed from it." A denunciation of theatrical amusements was annexed also to the articles of discipline. "It shall not be lawful for the faithful to be present at stage-plays, comedies, tragedies, or farces, whether they be acted publicly or privately; because they have ever been condemned by God's ancient churches for corrupting of good manners; especially when as the Holy Scripture shall be profaned by them. But if a college judge it meet for their youth to represent any history not comprised in the Sacred Scriptures (which was never given us for our sport and pastime, but to be preached for our conversion and comfort) and provided this be done very seldom, and by the advice of the colloquy, which shall first peruse the composition, it shall be tolerated."

The dark interior of the French Court at this moment, its gross moral and political corruption, its fraudulence, its intrigues, and the just apprehensions which the Queen of Navarre entertained of the result of her pending negotiation, are vividly pictured in a letter addressed to Henry before she quitted Blois, March 8th. The young Prince had not accompanied his royal mother on her journey; and he was not likely to augur favourably of his future matrimonial happiness from the representations which she transmitted to him. After describing in language of more than ordinary strength the great "travail and extremity" which she endured from her present undertaking, she told him that it was conducted in a manner altogether contrary to her expectations and to the promises with which she had been amused; that she was never allowed to converse privately with either the King or the Princess Margaret, but that the Queen Mother, who was all in all, used her very scurvily. That the Duke of Anjou affected great intimacy with her, half bantering, as was his way, and half dissembling. The Princess was to be seen only in the Queen's apartments, the most unfit place in the world, or else in her own chamber, at inconvenient hours, and in the presence of a Governante; that in conversation she exhibited great reserve, mingled with general expressions of obedience and reverence both to her future mother and husband, in case they should ever assume those relations.

"Two or three times," continued this upright and noble-minded lady, "I have complained of this treatment to the Queen Mother, but she did nothing but rally me; and behind my back she makes me say quite the reverse of the real words with which I address her. I have been blamed by my friends for some speeches which in fact I never uttered; but how to give the lie to the Queen I really know not; for when I tell her that people report that I have said so and so, although these reports proceed from herself, she denies them as she would do a murder, and laughs in my face. My usage, indeed, demands more than the patience of Griselda. — — —. When I have done with the Queen, I have to talk with a crowd of Huguenots, who surround me more as spies than as assistants; and some of them are leading men with whom I must either converse or quarrel. As for others who are not less troublesome, but are a sort of religious hermaphrodites, I keep from them as much as possible. I cannot say I am without counsellors, for every body gives me advice; although no two of them agree together."

She then expressed a wish for the arrival of her Chancellor and some discreet ministers for whom she had sent; and almost prophetically anticipated sickness from the mental agitation by which her health was even at that time affected. She described the Princess as handsome, sensible, and genteel, but bred up in the most wicked and corrupt society in the world, by the contagion of which every one was tainted. Bad as she had thought the Court, she had found it much worse in reality; and grieved and shocked was she to add, that not the men, but the women, were the first tempters. "My son," she concluded, "you have rightly judged from my former letters, that their great endeavour is to separate you from me and from God; and this new account will corroborate your opinion, and show you the anxiety which I am enduring for your sake. Pray earnestly to God, whose assistance you need at all times, but especially at the present. And I too will add my fervent prayer that he will grant you all your just desires." In a short postscript, she mentioned that at length she had found an opportunity of conversing with the Princess, who had expressed herself somewhat absolutely on religion; affirming that she was much attached to the Romish faith, as those who had proposed the match very well knew. The Queen of Navarre replied, that she had been told otherwise, insomuch that she had been led to believe there was some inclination towards Protestantism. Then drawing a just conclusion from all this juggling, she added, "I have never seen her so peremptory before, and I do believe that she speaks just what she is tutored to say, and that all we have been informed concerning her favourable view of our faith, has been invented only to entrap us!"

Within three weeks after her arrival in Paris, this great, wise, and virtuous woman was no more. Her death was attributed by some to a fever, by others to poison. Those who held the latter opinion named Catherine as the authoress of the crime; her perfumer, René[*] of Milan, as the agent; and a pair of medicated gloves as the instrument. The body, on being opened, exhibited an abscess in the lungs, which the Physicians recorded as the proximate cause of death; but it is added by De Thou, that, notwithstanding the King's express orders, they forbore from examining the head, the only part which, if foul play had really occurred, would have given conclusive evidence of the crime. The Queen of Navarre died at a critical moment, and the suspicion that her days were unduly shortened, is unhappily not rebutted by the character of any one of those to whom her decease proved advantageous. Catherine herself appears to have been perplexed by her sagacity, "How shall I read this Queen?" she one day asked Tavannes. "Madam," replied that keen observer of human nature, "both of you are women; put her in a passion and keep your own temper." By her constant and familiar access to the Court circle, she might have made discoveries unfavourable to the embryo plot; and if open violence were hereafter attempted against her, it would not easily find an apology deserving of credit. It cannot be doubted that it was designed to throw the odium of the Admiral's murder upon the acknowledged enmity borne against him by the Guises; but as no similar excuse could gloss over the assassination of the Queen of Navarre, it was necessary that her removal should be secret.

Jeanne, daughter of Henri d'Albret, King of Navarre, and of Margaret of Valois, sister of Francis I. possessed moral and intellectual excellences, which in any age would have entitled her to distinction; but which stand out in singular and most prominent contrast with the habits of those evil times upon which it was her lot to be cast. She was not only a patroness of letters, but was herself also skilled in literature. Latin and Spanish were among the tongues which she spoke fluently, and her pen, whenever she had occasion to employ it, was that of a ready writer. Her Court was ever open to men of learning, whose talents she more especially directed into holy channels. Having early embraced the Reformed religion, she spared no pains to establish it in her dominions. By her zeal and energy, the Patois of Biscay, a language before unwritten, and scarcely understood beyond the immediate limits of the province in which it was spoken, became a vehicle in which sacred truths were conveyed to her subjects; and the versions of the New Testament, and of the Genevan catechism and prayers, printed under her orders at La Rochelle, are ever-during monuments of her wisdom and her piety. Her more than female courage has been often evinced in the course of the preceding narrative; and one other example of it, although not immediately arising out of our story, is too remarkable to be passed in silence. Her first two children by Antony of Bourbon died in infancy; and as the time of her delivery of Henry of Bearne and Navarre approached, the King her father promised that he would gratify a wish she had often expressed, and submit his Will to her perusal, provided she would sing during the pangs of travail. "I would not have you bear a crabbed-tempered whimperer," was the reason which the old man assigned for this unusual request. Her labour was severe; nevertheless, when she heard her father's step entering the chamber, she mastered every feeling of pain, and raising her voice commenced and finished a Bearnese Hymn to the Virgin, well adapted to her condition;

Adjouda me en aqueste houre! &c.[†]

The boy, as if partaking of his mother's noble spirit, is said not to have cried at the moment of his birth; and the grandfather, claiming him as his own, wrapped him in his cloak, and rubbed his lips with wine and a clove of garlic; an infallible receipt, as the gossips taught, for producing manliness and vigour of constitution.

The Queen of Navarre died in her forty-fourth year: and the provisions in the Will made on her death-bed, amply evinced the constancy of her attachment to that church, of which during life she had ever shown herself the nursing mother. She exhorted her son to abide unshaken in the faith which he had been taught; to shun the vices and disorders of the Court, and to preserve with exactitude the religious laws and constitutions which she had framed for his subjects. She entreated him to cherish his sister with gentleness and affection; to watch over her education in the Reformed principles; and, at a fitting age, to espouse her to some Protestant Prince of a rank equal to her own; and lastly, although perhaps with slender confidence that her request would be granted, she besought the King, the Queen Mother, and the Dukes of Anjou and Alençon to receive the Prince and Princess, her children, under their protection, and to secure to them the free exercise of their religion.

On the death of his mother, Henry assumed the title of King of Navarre; and the arrangements for his marriage proceeded rapidly. The Duke of Guise had quitted Court some time before, in seeming disgust at the confidence which the King reposed in the Admiral. The Cardinal of Lorraine still continued at Rome, under the pretext of soliciting the Papal Dispensation; and it appeared as if the palace had been cleared of the chief members of the hostile faction, expressly for the reception of the Huguenots, now basking in royal favour. During the absence of the Admiral, Charles maintained a correspondence with him by letter; and he wrote in terms of great affection and earnestness, representing that the marriage was fixed for the middle of August, and that however brilliant would be the company assembled at its solemnization, Coligny's attendance was indispensable to render the festivity complete. Although, the Huguenots, for the most part, eagerly surrendered themselves to a willing belief in these fair appearances, and dismissed with too little discretion all misgiving of the sincerity of the Court, there were still some among them in whom the marks of attachment, thus ostentatiously lavished on their chiefs, awakened suspicion; and notwithstanding the caution exercised by their enemies, signs were not wanting which corroborated this jealousy. An order was issued in Paris commanding every stranger, on pain of death, to quit the city and its suburbs, in four and twenty hours after a fixed day, unless he were engaged in necessary business, or attached to the suite of some personage in attendance upon the Court. Extraordinary pains were taken to give publicity to this remarkable mandate; it was proclaimed by the sound of the trumpet for three days successively; and it was read weekly in the churches before the celebration of Mass. The King's Bodyguard also was strengthened by a reinforcement of four thousand picked men. When the attention of Coligny was forcibly drawn by some of his confidential friends to these unusual measures, and it was argued that the exclusion from the capital of all who were not under the immediate surveillance of the Government, and the occupation of it by so large a military force, proved the existence of some ulterior and sinister design, he treated their conjectures lightly, and reproached them with entertaining thoughts injurious to the paternal care of the authorities, who were, in truth, carefully providing for public tranquillity during a season of popular license.

Five years before, when after the Peace of 1567, the King had, in like manner, urged Coligny to present himself at Court, he wisely avoided the snare; by answering that France should not supply an Egmont or a Horn—the unhappy victims of Spanish faithlessness and despotism, whose bloody fate was still fresh in remembrance. The remark of Pasquier, who furnishes this anecdote, in spite of some tinge of fatalism, is distinguished by a degree of sagacity which might almost persuade us that it was written after, rather than before the catastrophe to which it must now be referred; yet nothing is more certain than that it belongs to a familiar epistolary correspondence at the moment of the Admiral's refusal. "When our hour is not yet come, God permits us to be discreet and on our guard against the pitfalls which beset us; but when it is come, we ourselves, of our own accord, so carelessly encounter perils, that we outrun the hopes of the very traitors who are compassing our destruction."

[*] The greater portion of sudden deaths among the leading personages of the time was attributed to Maitre René, who was considered the official Court-Poisoner, and of whom it has been somewhat naively observed, that it is scarcely possible to believe all the murders in which he was said to be concerned; but that if he had committed only a quarter of them he was a most consummate villain.—Note on the Discours merveilleux de Catherine de Medicis; Journal d'Henri III. tom. ii. p. 337.

Help in this hour of trouble send.

That much apprehension existed at this season in places remote from the capital, and that it had extended itself even to the inferior classes, is plain from an incident which Pierre l'Estoile relates on the authority of an eye-witness. When the Admiral was preparing to quit Châtillon, a peasant woman belonging to his estate seized his stirrup as he was in the act of mounting his horse; and clasping his knees, besought him with prayers and tears not to put his design in execution. "Ah, my good master!" were her impassioned words, "never again shall we see you if you go to Paris;—you, and all those who accompany you, will assuredly die. If you have no regard for yourself, at least have pity upon Madame and your children, and the many people of consideration who will perish on your account!" Coligny, gently disengaging himself, remonstrated against the indiscretion of his monitress; but unchecked by his rebuke, she threw herself at the feet of the Lady of Châtillon, and importunately renewed her suit, "If he goes to Paris, he will never return, and he will occasion the death of more than ten thousand others!"

Nor were these friendly warnings discontinued on Coligny's arrival in Paris. Among other papers, an elaborate letter was placed in his hands reminding him of the decree, now admitted as a general maxim by the Romanists, that faith was not to be kept with heretics; that the remembrance of former hostility might be smothered, but could not be extinguished; that the Queen Mother, a foreigner, an Italian, a Florentine, and of Papal extraction, was gifted with both natural and hereditary powers of dissimulation, and never relaxed from her fixed purpose of vengeance upon those whom she once hated; that the King, from his tenderest youth, had been nurtured in her school; that blasphemy, execration, and perjury, had formed systematic parts of his education; that he had been habituated to perfidy, even from his mother's breast; that a naturally ferocious disposition had been encouraged by addictions to cruel pastimes, in which his chief delight was to imbrue his hands in the blood of unoffending animals; and that pains had been taken to saturate him with the Mochiavellian doctrine, that no religion but that professed by the Government should be tolerated in any well-arranged polity. These and many similar arguments were read by Coligny not without some tokens of indignation. He professed implicit confidence in the promises of his Sovereign; and declared that so many years of his long life had been harassed by alarms, that now he would rather be dragged by a hook through the streets of Paris than have recourse again to civil war for his protection. That the King was the best King with whom France had been blessed for centuries; the Duke of Anjou indeed might not be so well inclined to the Huguenots; but that even his hostility would cease when the interests of the opposing parties had once become cemented by the completion of the approaching marriage. His personal safety he felt to be guaranteed by the Royal word; since the King had demanded that himself and the Duke of Guise (who had now returned to Court, and who was the only enemy from whom he could apprehend outrage,) should mutually pledge themselves that for the future they would consider all past wrongs as obliterated. Then expressing his confident hope, that Charles having established peace at home, would direct his arms against Spain in the Netherlands (the lure which had been most successful to ensnare him,) he entreated his friends to discard these unjust suspicions; and to join with himself in earnest prayer to God that he would bring to conclusion an arrangement thus happily commenced for the prosperity both of the kingdom and of the church.

Similar attempts to inspire the King of Navarre with suspicion were equally unsuccessful, and at the commencement of August he also arrived in Paris, where he was either awaited or joined by the noblest members of his religion. We read of only two personages whose better stars or keener judgment withdrew them, in good season, from danger. Francis Montmorency had just returned from an embassy to England, and under the plea of illness after his voyage, he retired to Chantillon, leaving his three brothers at Court. Of the motive which induced the absence of the Sieur de Langoiran we have greater certainty; he told the Admiral at parting, that he did not like so much caressing, and that he had rather save his life with fools, than lose it with the wise.

All things were now ready for the marriage, with the exception of the most important preliminary, the Papal Dispensation; and Charles was well aware, by despatches from his Ambassador at Rome, that this Instrument would never be granted unless on terms which the King of Navarre would peremptorily refuse. At first he swore roundly that he would dispense by his own power with all laws affirmed either by the Pope or by Religion, and that in case of difficulty, he would himself perform the Marriage. In the end, however, in order to silence any scruples which the Cardinal of Bourbon might feel in solemnizing the nuptials without the Bull, the King exhibited a forged Letter from his Envoy, notifying that the Pope had accorded the desired permission which would be speedily forwarded in due form. That Catherine was privy to this singular imposture can be little doubted; but Charles claimed merit with the Admiral, to whom he communicated the fraud, for having deceived his mother and sister as well as the Cardinal; and he adduced it as evidence of the great interest which he felt in the welfare of the Huguenots.

On the 18th of August, the Royal Cortège escorted the bride with great pomp to the Choir of St. Denis, where the bridegroom, attended by a magnificent retinue, led her to the high altar, and withdrew during the performance of mass. The marriage service was then read, according to a form mutually approved, on a lofty scaffolding raised before the portal of the Cathedral in the full view of the populace; and Davila informs us that the bride exhibited a petulent disgust sufficiently portending future nuptial happiness. When asked if she accepted Henry as her husband, she obstinately refused to answer. Not a word could be extorted from her lips; and Charles at length placing his hand at the back of her head bowed it forward in token of assent. De Thou, at that time a youth studying the law, gained admission into the Choir, immediately after the ceremony, and fixed his gaze with eagerness upon the Admiral, who was conversing with the Maréchal de Damville. The former, after regarding some banners suspended in the Church, sad memorials to his eyes of the defeats at Bassac and Moncontour, expressed a hope that they would soon be replaced by more grateful trophies. The dream of war with Spain in the Netherlands, so long and ardently cherished, and now so confidently believed to be near its completion, was doubtless present to the veteran's imagination as he spoke; and when we call to mind the events which a few more hours were to bring forth, the anecdote is among the most striking and dramatic which distinguish that memorable time. The words of the Admiral were eagerly caught by other ears besides those of De Thou; and they were afterwards tortured by political rancour into an allusion to an intended renewal of civil conflict. Such a thought, it may be safely averred, was the last which would be entertained by Coligny in his present temper and circumstances; and assuredly if it had been entertained, it was the last to which he would have given a loose and incautious utterance.

August 20th.—The festivities in honour of the marriage were continued during the week which followed its solemnization, and in one of the spectacles, a masque exhibited in the Bourbon palace near the Louvre, it seems as if the Court intended to allegorise in grim sportiveness its unrelenting enmity against the Huguenots, at the very moment in which it was preparing to enact in reality unprecedented deeds of horror. On the right of the stage erected on this occasion, was represented Paradise guarded by the three royal brothers armed in complete mail; and by a confusion of Christian with Mythological images not unusual at the time, the Elysian fields were painted as its back-ground. A verdant garden, enamelled with various flowers, formed the abode of the blessed: and it revolved on a huge wheel, representing the Empyréan, in which the twelve signs, the seven planets, and unnumbered smaller stars, were illuminated by lamps and flambeaux disposed with much art behind. Twelve nymphs in rich attire reposed in these happy bowers. A river, on which Charon navigated his bark, formed the boundary of Elysium, and separated it from Tartarus, which occupied the left division of the stage. There also was a wheel, hoarsely clanging with innumerable bells, as it moved round; and the fiery realms were abundantly stocked with Devils and devilings, playing antic gambols, and uttering discordant noises. Scattered about were many troops of Knights errant, headed by the King of Navarre, the Prince of Condé, and other great lords, who made an assault upon Elysium in order to obtain the company of its nymphs; and who having broken their lances against its guardians, were driven back by sword-strokes into the abyss of Tartarus. The victorious brothers were then poetically addressed by Mercury and Cupid, who descended from the clouds for that purpose; and a dance with the nymphs succeeded in reward of their valour. More than an hour passed in various choric exhibitions of grace and agility, to the great contentment of the beholders; after which the gates of Tartarus were unbarred, and the prisoners being released, once again shivered their lances and fought in melée. As a finale, a train of fireworks exploded round a fountain in the centre of the stage, very much to the surprise, and perhaps somewhat to the confusion of the assembled company. "Such," adds one of the narrators, who probably was an eye-witness, "was the pastime of that day, from which you may well conjecture what were the thoughts of the King and of his secret Council amid these counterfeitings."

Meantime a strong additional body of troops advanced towards Paris; and in order to prevent any suspicion which might arise from their entrance into the capital, the King artfully stated to Coligny that he was by no means satisfied that the Duke of Guise was sincere in his promise of reconciliation. "Father"—such was the endearing title with which the arch-dissembler addressed the confiding veteran—"Father, upon your word I rely with implicit confidence, but not so upon that of the Guises. I know their pride, their desire of revenge and their ambition, and moreover how much they have courted and obtained popularity in this great city. Grieved indeed should I be if any trouble were to result to you from the powerful retinue of armed men which they have brought with them under pretext of swelling the pomp of these nuptials; for an injury to you would be felt by me as if offered to myself. With your privity and consent, therefore, I shall gladly quarter a regiment of my own guards within the walls, who may secure the public peace, and be at hand on the slightest appearance of tumult." He concluded by naming certain officers as commanders, whom he knew to be acceptable to Coligny. This smooth representation by the royal hypocrite produced its desired effect; 1200 harquebuziers were distributed in various districts of the city; the Admiral highly approved the precautionary measure; assisted in leading his friends into a deception similar to that by which himself had been entrapped; and spoke of the introduction of their future assassins as a fresh instance of the wise vigilance and affectionate solicitude of the King.

On the morning of the Friday after the marriage, Coligny having transacted business with the Duke of Anjou in the Louvre, afterwards accompanied the King to the Tennis Court of the palace. There, Charles engaged in a match with the Duke of Guise against Louis de Teligny, the Admiral's son-in-law, and another gentleman; and Coligny, after looking on for a short time, withdrew to dinner, accompanied by about a dozen friends. As he passed on foot through the Rue des Fossés St. Germain, on his way to his own abode, afterwards known as the Hotel St. Pierre, in the Rue de Bétizy, he was occupied in reading a paper which had been put into his hands, perhaps with the design of slackening his pace. At a spot scarcely a hundred yards from the Louvre, and opposite a house belonging to the Canon de Villemur, formerly tutor to the Duke of Guise, the report of fire-arms was heard, and the Admiral was struck by two bullets; one burying itself very deeply in his left arm, the other shattering the fore-finger of his right hand. Without any change of countenance, he pointed to the house from which the shots had been discharged; requested some of his attendants to inform the King of the occurrence, and with the assistance of his servants, walked on to his hotel, which was but a few paces distant. To some one who expressed a hope that the bullets might not have been poisoned, he tranquilly replied, "God's will be done!"

The doors of the suspected house were immediately forced, and in the chamber of the ground floor was found an arquebuse recently discharged. The window from which the assassin had taken aim was grated, and a sheet had been suspended before it, more effectually to conceal his person. The only individuals discovered within were a woman servant and a foot-boy. From the woman's evidence, it appeared that, a few days previously, De Chailly, a former retainer of the Duke of Guise, and at that time Maître D'Hotel to the King, had introduced a military man to the Canon de Villemur as his especial friend; and that Villemur, in consequence, had hospitably entertained his guest, sharing with him his chamber and his bed. The real name of the new lodger, it was supposed, had been purposely concealed; but the boy who had not been long engaged in his service, said that he sometimes called himself Bolland, sometimes Bondot; professed to be one of the archers of the King's guard; and had despatched a message very early that morning to De Chailly, desiring that the horses which had been promised him might be in readiness. It was soon ascertained that he had sprung upon a horse waiting for him at a back passage leading into the Cloister of St. Germain de L'Auxerrois; had ridden at full speed to the gate of St. Antoine, and there mounting a second horse, had disappeared before any alarm could be given.

The assassin, however, notwithstanding his escape, was speedily identified as a well known infamous character, François de Louviers Maurevel. Little doubt seems to have been entertained, even at the moment, that he had been employed by the Queen mother and the Duke of Anjou; and if the confession, subsequently made by the latter, is to be received as genuine (an admission which has for the most part been tacitly granted,) he was selected by them "as the fittest instrument for their purpose, because he was already much exercised and experienced in murder." Even during his education as a page in the household of the Duke of Guise, Maurevel had evinced an early propensity to blood-shedding. The tutor of the noble youths in whose society he was instructed, had chastised him for some very heavy offence, and Maurevel having in revenge waylaid and killed him, fled to the Spanish army at that time in motion against France. On the conclusion of peace he found means to become reconciled to his early patron, in whose family he remained till the price set upon the Admiral's head by the Parliament of Paris, during the second civil war, induced him to volunteer his services as an agent of its vengeance. Having first stipulated for, and received his wages of crime, he passed over to the Huguenots; and insinuated himself into the confidence of their chiefs, partly by feigning deep resentment against the Guises for some pretended injury, partly by affecting great zeal and precision in his religious observances. Opportunity however, seems to have failed him for the execution of the greater enterprise which he had undertaken; and despairing of success, and perhaps having excited suspicion, he was content to aim at an inferior mark. One of the officers, with whom he had contracted most intimacy, arising out of a former acquaintance, was Arthur de Vandray, Lord of Mouy; a tried soldier of distinguished bravery, who then held very high command in the Admiral's army. To Maurevel, during his abode in the Huguenot quarters, De Mouy had shown especial marks of kindness and generosity; but the traitor, unmoved by any compunctious visiting, found means of perpetrating his base design, mortally wounded De Mouy, and owed his escape to the fleetness of a horse, recently presented to him by his murdered benefactor. Profiting by his infamy, he appears afterwards to have been retained almost as the acknowledged Court assassin; and Brantome speaks of him as familiarly known by the title of "the King's Bravo." One of the chief inducements held out by the Duke of Anjou, when exciting this wretch to the perpetration of his new crime, was the certainty that the Admiral would avenge the assassination of the Lord of Mouy, if Maurevel should ever fall into his power; and that his own safety demanded the removal of his most notorious enemy.

From the Duke of Anjou's confession, of which we shall presently speak more at length, we learn the motives which he thought fit to avow for this foul assassination, and they exhibit a most fearful recklessness of crime. The Queen Mother and himself, he says, perceived a manifest change in the King's manner after every private audience which he granted to Coligny. On one occasion the Duke found his Royal Brother in so violent a paroxysm of fury, handling his dagger and using menacing gestures as he paced the apartment with troubled steps, that he was glad to escape from his presence; and it was then, after advising with Catherine, that they jointly resolved upon the murder, as the sole means of preventing the utter overthrow of their power. They first applied to a Gascon Captain without naming the person whom he was to remove; but the avidity with which the Bravo caught at the engagement, and his total want of forethought, satisfied them at once that he was not adapted to their purpose. "As a matter of sport," says Henry, "we made him show us the method in which he would undertake the attack, and having well weighed his movements, his words, and his looks, all of which made us laugh heartily, and were exceeding good pastime, we determined that, although brave and fearless, he was too hot-headed to undertake any enterprise which required much prudence and discretion in its execution." Maurevel was of soberer temperament; better disciplined in the rules of his Art; more expert in its practice; and to him accordingly the nefarious commission was entrusted.[*]

[*] In the Mém. d'Estat, ii. 217. Maurevil's ill-favoured physiognomy is said on one occasion to have betrayed him. He accompanied the Maréchal de Retz on an embassy to England in the year following the St. Bartholomew; and on arriving at the Court at Greenwich, the Page of an English Nobleman exclaimed at once, "that is the assassin of the Admiral!" At the words, a shout was raised, and Maureval was pursued with ex-

The King was still engaged at Tennis when he received the announcement of the attempt upon the Admiral; on hearing it, he dashed his racquet violently to the ground, and retired to the palace, exclaiming, "Shall I never have any rest! Are there always to be new troubles!" The King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé instantly repaired to their wounded friend, whom they found under the surgeon's hands. Turning to Le Mou, a Minister belonging to the service of the late Queen Jeanne d'Albret, he expressed himself satisfied with the manifestation of love which it had pleased God to grant, by suffering him to be thus wounded for His name's sake; and he then fervently prayed that he might never forget the numerous mercies which had been vouchsafed him. An immediate amputation of the shattered finger was considered necessary, and the patient's agony was greatly increased by the bluntness of the operator's instruments. Ambrose Paré, the King's body surgeon, the ablest practitioner of his time, and an avowed and sincere Huguenot, was obliged to open and close his scissors thrice, before the joint was completely severed; yet during the acute pain occasioned by this protracted torture, not a complaint escaped the sufferer's lips. While his left arm was being probed, Merlin, his own chaplain, read to him some consolatory passages from Scripture; and Coligny, ejaculating in return, "My God, abandon me not in this so great trouble, nor let thy mercy forsake me!" whispered to one of the assistants who supported the bleeding limb, an order that one hundred pieces of gold should be given to Merlin for distribution among the poor of his congregation.[*]

The King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé, having discharged this first duty, returned to the palace; and demanding audience of Charles, besought his permission for themselves and their followers to retire from the capital, in which farther abode was manifestly hazardous. The King, in return, protested with many and vehement oaths, as was his wont, that he was not less aggrieved than themselves by the late murderous outrage; that he would omit no means in his power to discover and to punish the assassin, his employers, and all who were acquainted with the plot, so as to give ample satisfaction to Coligny and his friends, and to deter their enemies from any similar violence for the future. In conclusion, he expressed his earnest wish that they would remain in Paris to witness the execution of this promise. Catherine, who was present, added farther protestations of sorrow; affirmed that she did not believe the King himself could now sleep securely, even in the Louvre; that he might be poniarded on that very day in her own arms; and that there was the most urgent necessity for strict search after the murderer. For that purpose it was ordered that the City gates should be closed, and vigilantly guarded. It was indeed no small part of the Royal policy to forbid egress at this moment. With the Princes, Charles had succeeded; they were deceived by his feigned interest in their misfortune; and they abandoned all thoughts of departure; but there were others who might possess greater foresight, against whose retreat it was not less necessary to provide.

Scarcely was this conversation finished before Charles received a message from the admiral, entreating that he would honour him with a visit; for that there were matters touching the welfare and dignity of the Crown which he wished to communicate to his private ear, and which he well knew no other person would venture to deliver. When the friends who bore the request to the King had quitted the wounded veteran's couch, the Maréchal de Cossé was the only person, except the medical attendants, who remained; and Coligny, regarding him significantly, inquired if he remembered a caution which he had given him but a few hours before. "If you are wise you will be wary." The words, says De Thou, were not understood by all; and they were perhaps interrupted by the entrance of the royal party.

By far the most graphic account of the interview which followed is contained in a document which we have before mentioned; "A narrative of the causes and motives of the St. Bartholomew," said to have been dictated by Henry III. during the horrors of a sleepless night at Cracow, to a "gentleman of honour and of quality in near attendance on his Majesty's person." It is by no means necessary that we should here moot the question concerning the authenticity of that discourse. Even if we were certain that it proceeded from the lips of Henry, no one but a blind or a designing partizan would cite it as a true representation either of the motives or of the facts of the St. Bartholomew itself. It must be received altogether as the apology of the great criminal by whom it was delivered; as a defence in which, if the particulars are not positively falsified, they are no doubt exhibited in the most favourable light and tinged with the least sombre colouring. The passage, however, which we shall quote, relates to circumstances which Henry could have little interest in falsifying; although more minute and dramatic than other accounts, it is for the most part in unison with them; and we think it bears strong internal evidence of having been derived, if not from its professed author, at least from one who had either witnessed the interview, or had obtained intimate knowledge of it from an actual bystander.

"When the King, after dinner, expressed his intention of visiting the Admiral, the Queen my mother and myself determined to accompany him. We found Coligny in bed, sorely wounded; and after we had given him hopes of recovery, urged him to keep up his spirits, and added every assurance of strict justice being executed upon the assassin and his employers (to all which he answered briefly), he expressed a wish for some private conversation with the King. The King accordingly made a sign for the Queen my mother and myself to give place; and we stepped back into the middle of the chamber. There we staid during this secret parley, not without great misgiving of its purport; and yet more so when we observed that we were in the midst of more than 200 gentlemen of the Admiral's faction, who were either in the very apartment, in one adjoining, or on the ground floor. Their mien was gloomy, their faces and gestures were full of discontent, they whispered frequently to each other, passing and repassing continually before and behind us, with little tokens of becoming respect; and, as it appeared to us, not without expressing some suspicion that we were concerned in the Admiral's injury. Be this as it may, such was our belief; although perhaps we examined their demeanour somewhat too narrowly. We were in truth thunder-struck and terrified at finding ourselves thus enclosed; and as the Queen my mother has since oftentimes told me, she had never before been in any place which occasioned her more fear, and which she quitted more to her heart's content. These apprehensions made us interrupt the Admiral's speech to the King; and the Queen my mother finding a plausible excuse, expressed a fear that too long talking might be hurtful to the weak state of the patient, and that the King had better postpone the remainder of the conversation till Coligny had recovered greater bodily strength. The King seemed much vexed at this interference, as if he very much wished to hear whatever more the Admiral had to say; but, unable to combat our representation, he withdrew with us from the chamber. The Queen my mother then pressed him with great earnestness to repeat the heads of his late conversation; but for a long time he peremptorily refused, till at last, overcome by importunity, and more to get rid of the matter than on any other account, he burst out in a quick and angry tone: "'Sdeath, Madam, what the Admiral said is true enough; that no one can be King of France unless he has the power of doing good or ill to his subjects; and that this power, and indeed the management of the whole state, has slipped out of my hands into yours; whose control and superintendence I shall one day find to be most calamitous to myself and to my kingdom. All this he bade me observe and guard against; and as one of my best and most faithful subjects and servants, he was anxious thus to advise me before his death. By the God that made me, Madam, since you are resolved upon hearing it, this is what the Admiral said to me."

A few other particulars are noticed in the Mémoires d'Estat, and the writer of that portion to which we refer (whom from his own account we suppose to be the Chaplain Merlin), evidently intends to represent himself as present at this interview. The King, he remarks, in the first instance ordered all Coligny's domestics to quit the chamber; retaining only Teligny and his lady, and "that person" (meaning himself), "who escaped the massacre, who assisted the Admiral at the time, and who took especial notice of all that was said and done, being always close to his person." But the long ecrations by the rabble, so that he never dared show himself abroad while Queen Elizabeth remained at Greenwich. In 1574, we hear of him as employed in an unsuccessful attempt to assassinate La Nouë and some other Huguenots of distinction. Four years afterwards, he lost an arm in an affray with one of his own relations in the streets of Paris; and in 1583 he met his deserved fate, in the same City, at the hands of a son of the murdered De Mouy, whose own life, however, was sacrificed in avenging his father.—Journal d'Henri III. i. 395.

speeches which he begins by reporting are too elaborate to have been either delivered under the circumstances or remembered afterwards; and it is to minor particulars that we attach greater credit. Charles and the Queen Mother, he says, at one time came so near the Admiral, and talked together in so low a tone, that although the writer was close to the bedside, he overheard no more than Catherine's last words, "Though I am but a woman, I think it should be looked to in good season." The Maréchal de Retz, who stood apart during the above scene, proposed to Teligny and Cornaton, and urged his proposal with much earnestness, that the Admiral should be removed to the Louvre as a protection against the menaced violence of the Parisian rabble. So eagerly did he press this advice, as to suggest that the chamber of the Princess Catherine of Navarre should be prepared for his reception; and that the Princess herself should be lodged in the apartment of the bride her sister. The physicians, however, objected to the risk of moving the patient so soon after his hurt, and the design was consequently abandoned. Before Charles left the room, he expressed a wish to see the bullet, which was of brass; and he particularly inquired whether the Admiral had suffered much pain during the extraction, and from the amputation of his finger. The handkerchief of Cornaton, who showed the ball, and who had supported Coligny during the operation, was still covered with blood, and the King observing it, asked if it were the Admiral's blood, and if much had been lost by him? adding that he had never seen a man of more noble or constant spirit. When the Queen looked at the bullet, she testified cordial pleasure that it had been extracted; for that when the Duke of Guise was shot at Orleans, the surgeons had assured her that even if the ball were poisoned, all danger was at an end when it was once removed from the wound. This oblique inquiry was adroit, and the murderess must have been disappointed when Cornaton replied, that they had not been so easily satisfied, but that they had already given the Admiral a medicated drink as an antidote, and to guard against the possibility of hazard.

In the course of the same day, the King despatched circular letters to his several Provincial Governors, acquainting them with the untoward event of the morning, expressing his determination to punish the outrage as it deserved, if the assassin, who was yet unknown, could be discovered; and instructing each magistrate to convey assurances both to Catholics and Huguenots, in his own peculiar district, that it was the firm intention of government strictly to observe the last edict of pacification, and most severely to chastise any one who should contravene its provisions. The Huguenot leaders meantime held a conference, and there were not a few among them who urged immediate retirement from Paris. Some stated that when on the late marriage-day the King of Navarre and his train withdrew from St. Denis at the commencement of the church service, certain priests were heard to say, as was then believed in jest, that ere long all of them would be forced to attend mass. Others affirmed that several of the chief citizens had whispered abroad that during these nuptials the streets were more likely to run with blood than with wine; and by a third party, a direct warning was reported to have been given by Montluc, bishop of Valence, before he quitted Paris on an embassy in which he was at that time engaged concerning the pretensions of the Duke of Anjou to the crown of Poland. The good bishop, whose tolerant principles forbid any suspicion that he was informed of the bloody design; but who might in some degree have penetrated it from the tenor of his diplomatic instructions, urged the Comte de la Rochefoucault by no means to confide in the flattering professions of the court; but as soon as possible to make a retreat, and to persuade all those whom he valued to accompany him. The rising inclination of the Huguenots to embrace this prudent counsel, although strongly supported by the Vidâme de Chartres, was overruled by Teligny, whose generous spirit felt that it would be disloyal to doubt the faith which had been pledged by their sovereign.

The night of the 22d passed tranquilly. On the following morning the examination of the servants arrested in Villemur's house was renewed; and some appearances of popular irritation having been observed, it was thought discreet that the King should be asked to post a few sentinels at the Admiral's Hotel. Cornaton, who was deputed to make this request, applied for six archers of the Royal Guard; he was answered by the Duke of Anjou that fifty should be sent, and that they should be placed under the command of de Cosseins, a name odious to the Huguenots, from his avowed personal hatred of the Admiral. When Cornaton would have declined the larger number, he was silenced by a peremptory command from the King, who added that there was no fitter man than De Cosseins for his purpose. Fearfully must the few but pregnant words which Thoré, Montmorency's brother, whispered to Cornaton as he retired, have struck upon his ear! "You could not have been under the protection of a bitterer enemy!" But he was forced to reply with assumed composure, "Do you not see that the King's order is positive? We must rely on his Majesty's good will; but you heard the answer which I made in the first instance."

Reports meantime had been circulated that the suspicions of the Admiral's friends were mainly directed against the Guises, whom they threatened with violence. The Dukes of Guise and of Aumale accordingly presented themselves before the King, signifying that they perceived their longer abode at court was displeasing, and that with the royal permission they would withdraw. Charles, affecting indignation, replied in a bitter tone that they might go wherever they pleased, and that if the charges against them were verified, they should not be long in hearing from him. About noon therefore, accompanied by a large retinue, they rode publicly to the gate of St. Antoine, as if for the purpose of taking their departure from Paris; but not one foot did they set without the city in reality.

The instructions given to De Cosseins enjoined him to prohibit any Catholic from entering the Admiral's house; if no secret orders were added, he exceeded his commission by turning away two Huguenot agents, and a valet who brought Teligny's cuirass for the service of his master. Under the pretext of affording yet greater security to Coligny, all Catholics were ordered by proclamation to quit their lodgings in the neighbourhood of the palace; and their place was supplied by Huguenot gentlemen, whose numbers had been previously ascertained and registered, and who were invited to repair from whatever other quarters of the city they tenanted, and to gather round the Admiral's hotel as a nucleus. The King of Navarre was advised at the same time to strengthen himself by assembling within his apartments, for the ensuing night, all the persons most attached to his service; a counsel which he accepted as an especial token of interest in his behalf. But in the more keenly sighted, who had before cherished suspicion, this movement inspired additional apprehensions of peril; and the Vidâme de Chartres once more vehemently pressed his friends to quit Paris in a body, and to convey the Admiral with them to some place of greater security. The proposal was again rejected by Teligny, who found support from the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé; and there is reason to believe that the discussion was immediately reported by a spy to the secret council at that moment sitting at the Louvre.

The evening of the 23d of August was closing when the surgeons pronounced the Admiral to be free from all immediate danger, and expressed confident hopes of his recovery. Numerous friends, overjoyed by this unexpected report, volunteered to pass the night in his house, but their services were declined by Teligny as needless. He himself retired to his own lodgings. Five Swiss halberdiers, in the King of Navarre's service, patrolled the Admiral's courtyard; his Chaplain Merlin, the Surgeon Paré, Cornaton, Labonne, Yolet, and five or six inferior attendants, slept or watched in his chamber; and the detachment of royal archers, under De Cosseins, blockaded all the approaches to his residence, when the bell of midnight proclaimed the commencement of the festival of St. Bartholomew.

Sermons on Infidelity. By Andrew Thomson, D. D., late Minister of St. Georges, Edinburgh. First American edition, with a Preliminary Essay. Windsor, Vt., Richards & Tracey: New York, Jonathan Leavitt, 1833, pp. 218. 18mo.

This very valuable volume consists of a series of sermons from Heb. 3 ch. 12 v. The author asserts, that "there is a natural connection between the disbelief of Christianity in particular, and the disbelief of religion in general;" the one leads directly to the other—the rejection of Christ will be followed by departure from the living God. 1. In proof, he first appeals to the history of Deism as found in the writings of its advocates. The name Deist was assumed about the middle of the 16th century, to avoid the odium attached to the term Atheists, a name they had hitherto borne. A change of name was not a change of principle—though they professed to admit the existence of God, and in some instances, the immortality of the soul, yet "they were nevertheless in the habit of laughing at all religion as the dream of folly, or of reprobating it as the offspring of fraud and priestcraft."

In the beginning of the 18th century, Mr. Gildon, a converted deist, composed a book for the benefit of his former associates, in which he deemed it necessary to dwell at large on the great principles of natural Theology, as their aversion to these lay at the root of their rejection of Christianity. Numerous examples of the rejection of all religion are found among infidel writers,—in their avowed attempts to build up a theory of pure Deism, "they have not scrupled to cast away as neither useful nor true, the doctrines of God's holiness and justice, of a superintending providence, and of a future retribution." The most distinguished Deists have treated Christianity and natural religion with an almost equal degree of indifference and dislike. Every important truth in each has either been called in question, or made the subject of ridicule: they may not have avowed themselves the patrons of Atheism, yet to this they must come if they follow out the course on which they have entered.

A pure theory of deism was never formed, except the materials were drawn from revelation; in such cases they had only to omit what is peculiar to the gospel as a message of pardon. In the attempts of those scorning the aid of revelation, we observe some of the fundamental principles of religion rejected, or abandoned to doubt equally hostile to their practical influence. Lord Herbert's system is not an exception. His system is comparatively pure, yet he was acquainted with and refers to the scriptures, and he has had scarcely a single follower in the ranks of Deism.

The spirit of levity and indifference with which they blot out the most important truths show that in reality they reject all religion.

Secondly, In proof of the tendency of Deism to utter unbelief, the author appeals to the prevailing infidelity of the day. It has its various garbs and diversifications, but one leading feature it never loses, "a feature of determined hostility, or of settled contempt for what is sacred, not merely for the gospel of Christ, but for all that relates to the belief and the service of the living God." Some have affected to hold the tenets of natural religion, while rejecting revelation: but their creed has no serious footing in their minds—no practical influence on their lives. Circumstances may constrain them to act so as to indicate the presence of Christian principle, but when without restraint, they give positive proof of the inefficacy of the principles of religion they have professed to retain after the rejection of Christianity. Among the uneducated; a total disregard of sacred things, among the learned; traces of an indiscriminate, universal, reckless scepticism; all acknowledgement of God as a ruler and judge being evidently and undeniably a mere accommodation to surrounding prejudices, (as they would term it,) or used for political purposes. For the truth of these assertions, appeal is made to the judgment of every man of candour and observation. Since, then, those who have rejected Christianity, have almost invariably fallen into a disregard of all religion, it is fair to infer that one species of infidelity naturally leads to the other. If not, the phenomenon must be otherwise explained; till then, it will be a foundation of legitimate argument.

3. A third argument urged by the author in proof of this tendency, is the fact that the objections brought by Deists against Christianity are equally strong against natural religion. The objections that Christianity has its mysteries, its want of universality, the controverted nature and consequent uncertainty of its articles, its implying what is miraculous, all weigh equally against natural religion.

A miracle is a fact, one of the operations of Providence, and can be proved by testimony as well as any other fact. Those who saw the miracles of Christ inferred from thence the truth of his mission. In the same way men see the ordinary phenomena or facts of nature, and infer the tenets of Theism. In many instances, natural religion is founded on facts furnished by testimony, for an extensive and minute acquaintance with the works and ways of God is necessary in order to proceed much farther than his existence and power. These facts are much oftener learned from the researches of others, than from our observations.

It is not true, that all the facts or christian miracles are learned by testimony. There is the internal evidence of the gospel which is miraculous—there is the experimental evidence which we feel and see exhibited by those around us—the predictions now in a course of fulfilment, especially in regard to the Jews. In reference to both natural and revealed religion, the facts furnished by observation and testimony are but the materials for inductions: the process in the case of Christianity is much the more simple, for once establish the truth of the christian creed, and each particular doctrine follows of consequence—whereas, in natural religion, each point requires a train of reasoning peculiar to itself for its discovery or confirmation.

The objection that miracles are contrary to experience bears equally strong against natural religion; we every day believe a thousand things for which we have no corresponding examples in our experience; to act otherwise, would put an end not only to all religion, but to all science whatever.

The last refuge of unbelievers is to deny the possibility of miracles altogether, but what then becomes of the attribute of omnipotence which natural religion ascribes to God?

4. The nature of the most prevalent causes of infidelity, shows the truth of the proposition. These are Inconsiderateness, Pride of Understanding, and Moral Depravity.

1. If men will not attend to the religion of Christ, they will not to the religion of nature; if they will not contemplate God, in the character of a compassionate Saviour, they will not as merely the author of nature—if they will not read of God in the clearness of his word, they will not in the obscurity of his creation. Let inquiry be made as to which is best fitted to affect the minds of men, christianity, or natural religion—compare the examples of both, and see if any have been led to piety by the latter, whose carelessness has been proof against the claims of the former; and in view of the facts, judge whether he who rejects Christianity, can be expected to stop short of general irreligion.

2. Intellectual pride operates chiefly among men of science and literature. They cannot brook the authority of christianity, everything must be within reach of their understandings; now, natural religion has its mysteries—things equally beyond the reach of the human intellect, it sets bounds to speculation, and would regulate the life: now, the same causes that lead to the rejection of the one, will lead to the rejection of the other.

3. Moral depravity operates both on the learned and ignorant. The former, impatient under the restraint of christianity, seek for absurdity or insufficiency in its evidence; the latter, equally impatient, resolve, without reasoning, to throw off a yoke they are unwilling to bear. This cause acts with equal power on either system, for the morality of each is essentially the same. If opposition to morality lead to rejection in one case, it will in the other. If, indeed, it be admitted that Deism is not unfriendly to vice, the argument will not hold. But this its advocates will not admit. Thus, it appears that the rejection of all religion must be the necessary consequence of the abrogation of christianity.

"But," says the author, "Atheism could not long maintain its ascendancy. This volcano of misery and of crime, after pouring forth its terrors on the scene of human life, would become exhausted by its own destructive efforts, and sink into the stillness and the dreariness of a wide-spread desolation. Man is so framed, and society is so constituted, that religion we must have in some form or another. And all the knowledge of human nature with which we are furnished by experience would lead us to expect, that whatever aspect the case might assume at the beginning, it would gradually degenerate and settle into the errors and abominations of heathenism. Christianity rescued us from heathenism, and if we extinguish the light of christianity, I see not how we can avoid the inference, that to the darkness of heathenism we must return. This is the final and unavoidable result.

"It is in vain to tell us here of our means of improvement being so superior to those which were anciently enjoyed, and of their being a sufficient security against such a degeneracy as that which we have supposed. They may, indeed, prevent any decline in the arts and sciences of human wisdom, and may still be instrumental, not only in perpetuating, but in carrying forward the mere secular civilization of the world. Or they may be employed, as indeed they are with gratifying success, in upholding the existence, and vindicating the purity, and extending the dominion of that system which is contained in a written record, and has the image and superscription of divinity stamped upon it. But when they are applied to the preservation of religion, in the circumstances in which we suppose religion to be placed after Christianity is abolished, they have quite a different task to achieve from that which is assigned to them in the two cases just mentioned. And it is a task to which the history of our race demonstrates them to be totally inadequate.

"There might remain among a few of the more enlightened, some occasional glimpses of religious truth, as we find to have been the case in the pagan world. But the degradation of the great mass of the people to that ignorance, and idolatry, and superstition, out of which the gospel had emancipated them, would be certain and complete. This retrograde movement might be retarded by the advantages which we have derived from that system, whose influence we should continue to feel long after we had ceased to acknowledge the divinity of its source. But these advantages would, by degrees, lose their efficacy, even as matters of speculation, and give place to the workings of fancy, and credulity, and corruption. A radiance might still glow upon the high places of the earth, after the sun of revelation had gone down; and the brighter and the longer it had shone, the more gradual would be the decay of that light and warmth which it had left behind it. But everywhere there would be the sad tokens of a departed glory and of a coming night. Twilight might be protracted through the course of many generations, and still our unhappy race might be able to read, though dimly, many of the wonders of the eternal godhead, and to wind a dubious way through the perils of the wilderness. But it would be twilight still; shade would thicken after shade; every succeeding age would come wrapped in a deeper and a deeper gloom;—till at last, that flood of glory which the Gospel is now pouring upon the world, would be lost and buried in impenetrable darkness."

These consequences are alarming, and give an importance to the faith not usually attached to it.

Now contemplate the effects of infidelity on the conduct and character. Infidelity is in every respect, hostile to the interests of morality. For proof that there is a connexion between principle and practice (which is denied by some) we may appeal to the history of the world and to individual experience.

The tendency of Christianity is to make those who submit to it, morally good, it provides a complete rule of duty, furnishes the best motives to the cultivation of holiness, addresses itself to all the powers and susceptibilities of our nature. "It operates through the decisions of the understanding, and through the affections of the heart. It speaks to our hatred and our love; to our hope and our fear; to our gratitude and our interest. And in the arguments by which it works upon these, there is a grandeur, and an authority, and a pathos, which no mind can altogether or continually resist. It represents us as placed under the government of that great Being who created and sustains the universe; whose glory is concerned in punishing the rebellious, and rewarding the obedient; and whose piercing eye looks through every corner of the soul, and follows us into our deepest retirements, "beholding the evil and the good." It brings before us, in the work of redemption, such a manifestation of his justice and of his mercy, as is admirably calculated, on the one hand, to restrain from the excesses of licentiousness and crime, those upon whom the tenderness of a Saviour might have been lavished in vain; and on the other hand, to charm and allure into the very devotedness of virtue, such as would have set their face as adamant against all the terrors of a broken law, and all the majesty of an avenging God. It unfolds to our view a scene of future retribution, the most awful and impressive which imagination can paint,—whose throne is to be occupied by the King of kings; whose transactions are to embrace the character and the fate of every individual of our race; and whose awards are those of immutable rectitude, and stretch into the boundless duration of eternity. And while it thus fences round the interests of moral purity by the magnificent representations of a God who rules over all, and who will bring everything into judgment, it sets itself to secure them still more minutely, and still more effectually, by never losing sight of its votaries for a moment in the path of life—by directing them in every step they take—fortifying them against every temptation to which they are exposed—administering to them every aid which they require—putting an appropriate check on every evil propensity—presenting a suitable stimulus to every good affection—and making all the doctrines which it reveals, and all the precepts which it enjoins, and all the sanctions by which it enforces them, bear with a sanctifying energy upon every department of the character. So that, making allowance for these imperfections which adhere to everything that is connected with humanity in its present state, they who have imbibed its spirit, and conformed themselves to its dictates, must be distinguished by the highest attainments in moral excellence. And that this is the tendency of Christianity, is not only abundantly evident to every one who is acquainted with its nature, but has been explicitly and frequently acknowledged by almost all those who have nevertheless discarded the system itself, as not substantiated by sufficient proof. This is their testimony; and though we do not need it, and would not rest our argument upon it, yet it is valuable as proceeding from adversaries, and may be allowed to put the statement beyond controversy, that true religion is of high importance to the morality of the world."

Infidelity "gives us the fear of feeble man, who lives but for a day, for the fear of the mighty and everlasting God. It gives us the good opinion of creatures like ourselves, for the approbation of Him whose favour is pregnant with innumerable blessings. It gives us a regard to the little transitory interests of time, for the prospect of that happiness and glory which is commensurate with eternity. These, and such as these, are the principles by which it would make us holy. But can any one say, or can any one suppose, that they are adequate to the production of such an effect? That they are capable of leading men to any high degrees of virtue? That they are powerful enough to deter or dissuade them even from the lowest vices, or from the most atrocious crimes? No, my friends; if you root out from their minds the conviction that there is a just God who reigns over them, and bring them to believe that when they die they have nothing more to fear or to suffer, it is impossible to say how far they will proceed in criminal indulgence. These mighty fetters being removed, all the other restraints imposed upon their passions would be like the cords with which Samson was bound, and which, when he put forth his strength, 'became as flax that had been burnt with fire.'"

As a general remark it is true, that infidels as individuals are wicked, that nations deeply tinctured with infidelity, are pre-eminent in profligacy and crime.

History, and especially the confessions of criminals, show that men become adepts in wickedness, by throwing off the restraints of religion. Irreligion and immorality have a natural connection.

But, it is said, immorality is found among Christians: not so; immoral persons professing Christianity, are infidels in disguise, and "it just furnishes an additional evidence of the immoral tendency of infidelity, when we see infidelity breaking through all the decencies which that garb should have imposed and deliberately trying to cover its impurities and its guilt with the robe of Sanctity."

Christians are not impeccable, but their sins are the subject of regret—their system tends to keep them moral.

It is said that religion has done but little in restraining crime; that more has been done by human laws. But this does not show the inefficacy of religion, but only its want of prevalence. Those who urge this objection are exerting themselves to check its progress, to impair its authority, and to destroy its very existence. "If a remedy has been prescribed, and by terror or by sophistry I prevail upon the patient not to refuse it, it is with a bad grace that I quote the agonizing death which ensues, as a proof that the physician is without skill, and that his medicine is without effect."

In regard to human laws, the objectors forget that the best laws have been founded on Christian principles, and have appealed to the authority and sanction of the Christian religion. Again, human virtue does not wholly consist in the absence of crime, in a state of conduct produced by mere terror of penal inflictions; "a great proportion of it is made up of feelings and actions, which human laws are neither competent nor intended to govern, and which it is the prerogative of religion alone to generate, to foster, and to diffuse." Religion arrests iniquity at the fountain.

We are told that all infidels are not immoral; it is granted that there are a few exceptions, and the causes can be pointed out, so as to leave the general truth in all its force. The infidel philosopher may be free from heinous crime, yet look at its influence on the great mass of mankind: and where is that philosopher's love of morality, when he is publishing principles hostile to its existence!

Infidelity is further destructive of the comfort and the happiness of those who embrace it. Experience and observation prove the connection between virtue and happiness—vice and misery. Infidelity not only occasions positive suffering, but takes away consolations. Its "baneful touch withers the charm of every earthly blessing, reduces it to the degraded level of a mere animal gratification, and leaves us to feed upon it like the beasts that perish, without a thought that rises above the dust, and without a hope that points beyond the grave.

"It is, however, amidst trials and sorrows, that infidelity appears in its justest and most frightful aspect. When subjected to the multifarious ills which flesh is heir to, what is there to uphold our spirit, but the discoveries and the prospects that are unfolded to us by revelation? What, for this purpose, can be compared with the belief that everything here below is under the management of infinite wisdom and goodness, and that there is an immortality of bliss awaiting us in another world? If this conviction be taken away, what is it that we can have recourse to, on which the mind may patiently and safely repose in the season of adversity? Where is the balm which I may apply with effect to my wounded heart, after I have rejected the aid of the Almighty physician? Impose upon me whatever hardships you please; give me nothing but the bread of sorrow to eat; take from me the friends in whom I had placed my confidence; lay me in the cold hut of poverty, and on the thorny bed of disease; set death before me in all its terrors; do all this—only let me trust in my Saviour, and 'pillow my head on the bosom of Omnipotence;' and I will 'fear no evil,'—I will rise superior to affliction—I will 'rejoice in my tribulation.' But let infidelity interpose between God and my soul, and draw its impenetrable veil over a future state of existence, and limit all my trust to the creatures of a day, and all my expectations to a few years as uncertain as they are short; and how shall I bear up, with fortitude or with cheerfulness, under the burden of distress? Or, where shall I find one drop of consolation, to put into the bitter draught which has been given me to drink? I look over the whole range of this wilderness in which I dwell, but I see not one covert from the storm, nor one leaf for the healing of my soul, nor one cup of cold water to refresh me in the weariness and the faintings of my pilgrimage. O! what can I be but comfortless and wretched, when I am without Christ, without God, and without hope?

"My friends, you cannot be in affliction—you cannot suppose yourselves to be in affliction, without feeling that infidelity is destructive of your only solid comfort. It may be true, that as infidels have their pleasures while life is prosperous with them, so there may be many circumstances which tend to mitigate their sorrows under the pressure of adversity. But their principles shut them out from the best and highest consolations which the human mind can have recourse to amidst its multiplied distresses, and are peculiarly calculated indeed to aggravate the most painful and most inevitable of those evils to which humanity is liable.

"I might say to one of you, You see death approaching; but you are prepared for the event, from which nature so instinctively recoils, by living like a Christian, in the faith and the hope of the Gospel—in the faith which reposes on a mighty Saviour, and in the hope which 'enters into that within the veil;' and under the powerful influence of these principles you are not only tranquil, but triumphant. But the infidel would rob you at once of your tranquillity and your triumph, and cast a shade of annihilation over the glory that is now before you, and plunge you into the gulf of darkness and despair.

"I might say to another, You have an only child, endeared to you by every Christian virtue and by every filial affection. A hopeless disease has begun its ravages on his frame. The tie which has hitherto united your heart to his, and from which your sweetest earthly comforts have flowed, is about to be dissolved. You feel as if your own existence were drawing to its close. And yet your spirit does not sink under the sore calamity. It is 'cast down, but not destroyed.' You see the child of your bosom ripe for the immortality on which his own hopes had been early placed, and you anticipate, through the mercy of your God, and the merits of your Saviour, a blessed and indissoluble reunion with him in the regions of everlasting light, and life, and glory. But the infidel would tear up all your anticipations by the root; he would persuade you that the virtues and the hopes of your child are equally vain; he would make you bury every consolatory expectation in the grave where you are to lay him, and either cause a parent's tears to flow for ever, or steel a parent's heart against all the best and tenderest sympathies of nature.

"I might say to a third, You are about to die, and to leave your wife and your family amidst the difficulties, the snares, and the sorrows of that world, from which you are ready to depart for ever. Bitter is the pang of separation. But you are comforted when you think of Him who rules over the affairs of men; who takes care of all who are committed to him in the confidence of faith; who spreads his protecting wings over the faithful that are cast, destitute and forlorn, upon his bounty; and who says to the dying saint, 'Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive, and let thy widow trust in me.' But the infidel would embitter your last hour; he would wring your bosom with the most poignant distress, at the very moment that you stand most in need of consolation; and he would do this by telling you, that when you trust your nearest and dearest friends to Providence, you indulge in a foolish delusion—that they must lie at the mercy of a fatherless, forsaken, and ungoverned world—that vain is every prayer that you put up for them, and vain every hope that you cherish for them, in your departing moments.

"I might say to all of you, As you pass through the vale of tears, you meet with much to pain and distress you. Disappointments, losses, sickness, calumny, persecution, ingratitude, treachery, a thousand ills beset your path, giving you wearisome days and sleepless nights, and sometimes filling your souls with indescribable anguish. Amidst them all, though you may not be so presumptuous as to say that 'patience has had its perfect work,' yet you have been comforted and upheld by what Christianity tells you of the origin, the design, and the end of your afflictions. It tells you that they originate in the appointment of a Being infinitely wise, holy, powerful, and good; that their design is to promote your best interests, and that their end is an 'exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' But the infidel would have you to ascribe them to unmeaning chance or to relentless fate; he would take away from them the character of a wise and salutary discipline; he would teach you to regard them as proofs that we live in a chaos of good and evil, over which no benignant intelligence presides; and when you look forward to another state, where all that is now mysterious in your afflictions shall be satisfactorily explained, and all that is now sad in your condition shall be exchanged for endless bliss, he would convince you that such a consummation is but the vision of poetry or of superstition, and that if death must be represented under the pleasing image of sleep, it is a sleep from which you are never, never to awake.

"Now, in circumstances such as I have supposed, what is the aspect which infidelity wears? Is it that of a friend, or of a foe? Is there one pang which it alleviates, or one comfort which it brings? Or rather, does it not aggravate every affliction a thousand-fold, and render it insupportable and overwhelming? Is not this its obvious tendency? Is not this its common effect?

"It is easy, indeed, to deride or disregard all this, when no calamity is felt or seen. In health and prosperity the consoling power of religion is not so much needed; its value is not so readily prized; its necessity is not so fully acknowledged. And those who are free from bodily distress and untouched by outward misfortune—who are wallowing in wealth and pleasure, and never allow their eyes to settle on a scene of misery, or their ears to listen to a tale of woe from which they can turn away, may flatter themselves that there is not much occasion for comfort, and that, therefore, infidelity, in this respect, cannot do much harm. But take a more extended view of human life; think of the frailty of man, the dangers to which he is exposed, the misfortunes to which he is liable; remember the days of his darkness, which experience testifies to be many and evil; leave the house of feasting, and visit the house of mourning; enter the dwellings of the poor, who are struggling with the united hardships of indigence and sickness; go to the chamber of disease, and see its victim, after having suffered for years, still looking forward to years of suffering more; behold the dying parent surrounded with his destitute weeping family, and regarding them with looks that would melt a heart of stone; and say, without affectation or reserve, whether would you send to them the Christian or the infidel; whether would you address to them the language of faith or of unbelief; whether would you tell them that they are under the administration of a wise and gracious God, and that their distresses shall be made to 'work together for their good,' and that there is a land of rest, an unsuffering kingdom, an everlasting habitation, into which the faithful shall be ere long introduced—or, that there is no God who concerns himself about their fate; no benevolent intention in the afflictions to which they are subjected; no joy in which their sorrows are to terminate; no immortality to enlighten the dark 'valley of the shadow of death?' There is but one answer that the heart of the most careless and the most hardened of you will allow you to give. And having given it, and borne your testimony to the truth, go back again, if you will, to the gaieties and the pleasures of the world, but never repeat the assertion—never harbour the thought. that infidelity is any thing else than a stern, relentless enemy to the comfort of man, who is 'born to trouble as the sparks fly upward.'

"And are we to forget, amidst our contemplations, the horrors and the distresses of a guilty conscience? No, my friends, in spite of all the attempts that are made, and all the ingenuity that is exercised, to efface the impressions of a God, who has given a law for the regulation of our conduct, and who will 'judge the world in righteousness,' moments will occur when the sinner shall be filled with 'the terrors of the Lord,' and unable to shake off the consciousness of transgression, and the fear of punishment. In these awful moments, religion has the power of speaking peace to him—'a peace, too, which passeth all understanding.' It tells him that the God whom he has offended is a merciful God. It tells him of one who is 'mighty and able to save him to the very uttermost.' It discloses to him a redemption suited to all his need. It invites him to partake of it 'without money and without price.' And it inspires him with the hope that is 'full of immortality.' But mark the cruelty and the baseness of infidelity to an awakened sinner. After it has encouraged him in his crimes—after it has prompted and seduced him to those indulgences which now fill him with compunction and sorrow, it would abandon him to the misery in which it has involved him. It has not succeeded in effectually convincing him that there is no God, and no retribution, and in preventing him from feeling the agonies of remorse, and the apprehensions of divine wrath; but it has banished from his creed all that could have soothed those agonies, and removed these apprehensions; it has blotted the very name of a Saviour from the tablet of his heart; it has formed a great gulf between him and the throne of mercy, over which his prayers and his hopes can never pass; it makes a mock of his wretchedness, and leaves him to perish in despair."

Such are some of the consequences of infidelity to which too little attention is paid.

"We read the books which contain it, and regard them as curious abstract speculations, which display acute and subtle talents, and provoke us to give some ingenious reasoning in return. We meet with those by whom it is maintained, and in the brilliancy of their wit, or the agreeableness of their manners, or the extent of their information, we forget that they are unbelievers, or that their unbelief has any malignant influence. We see, and we admire, and we applaud the services which they render to the cause of science, or to the cause of humanity, and dream not, that from the same fountain which has enlarged the boundaries of learning and of knowledge, there can flow a stream so foul and so devouring as that of infidelity.

"Now, to break this delusion, natural enough, but incalculably pernicious, I say, look to the consequence of infidelity. See how it covers the scene of human life with all the abominations of licentiousness and crime: and how, while it destroys the present comforts, it darkens and desolates all the future prospects of our species. Witness its frightful doings, not merely in the higher classes of society, where its hideousness and its mischief are moderated by the influence of superior education, or glossed over by the elegances of polished life; but in every inferior condition, down to the lowest and the neediest of the people, among whom it assumes its most forbidding aspect, and produces its most cruel and most ruinous effects. If you go into a poor man's cottage, for instance, you may perhaps see vice and misery reigning in it and it may not occur to you that his evils are the direct and legitimate offspring of infidelity. He may not know very distinctly what infidelity is, or be able to speak about it with understanding. But after all, you may find that he is its victim; that he has been brought into his wicked course by the influence of example; and that the criminal example, to which he owes his guilt and his ruin, has resulted solely from a rejection of the Christian faith. Nay, you may be able to trace it to the interference of another, as poor as himself, who had discovered by the help of his superiors, that the gospel is a fable, and who, unwilling to limit the knowledge or the benefit of such a discovery, had plied him, among others, with the consideration of its importance, and its happy bearings on his conduct and condition, till he had prevailed upon him to become as unbelieving as himself; and for a doctrine that gives full play to his strongest passions, and unbounded latitude to his political dissatisfactions, to renounce that which had hitherto guided him in the path of righteousness, and comforted him in the midst of his adversities, and brought contentment, and peace, and joy, to dwell under his humble roof.

"Infidelity is not confined to books of philosophy or to men of learning. It does not slumber on the shelves of an inaccessible library, or lie concealed in disquisitions which are intelligible to none but scientific adepts. It once bore this stately and secluded character; but it bears it no longer. It has become more condescending, more open, more active. There is a kind of it which itinerates through our cities, and our villages, our market-places, and our workshops. It is not accompanied by the subtleties of metaphysical language, and does not carry along with it the reasons or arguments that you find in the works of Bolingbroke and Hume: but it moves in all the various forms of artful objections, and profane maxims, and significant sneers, and vulgar wit. It is divested of those refinements with which taste, and ingenuity, and eloquence, had clothed it in the pages of the man of literature or science: but it is not less substantial, it is not less malignant, it is not less destructive of all that is fair, and good, and happy, in the world. And wherever it finds its way, and holds its dominion, there does it invariably degrade the character, and wanton with the miseries of those whom it has seduced and enslaved.

"As, then, you tender your own welfare, and would promote the welfare of your fellow-men, 'take heed, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief.' Let infidelity be the object of your decided and interminable abhorrence, and let Christianity, to which it stands in frowning and everlasting opposition, be the object of your highest reverance and your most cordial attachment."

The author proceeds to show that there is no foundation in truth for the gradations of infidelity—that they are all modifications of the same great evil, and expressions of the same radical principle. This is illustrated, 1st, in those who admit one part of revelation and reject another; 2d, in those who lead impious and immoral lives, yet profess to hold the doctrines of Christianity; 3d, in those who live a reputed good life, but without regard to the principles of the gospel; 4th, in those who are worldly-minded; 5th, in those who neglect religious ordinances; 6th, in those who are indifferent to the success of Christianity in the world.

The author next treats of the sinful nature and awful consequences of unbelief, and concludes by an application; 1st, to parents; 2d, to young men; 3d, to those in the higher stations in society; 4th, to those in inferior stations; 5th, to ministers.

Such is a brief outline of the train of thought that runs through this volume. The style is characterized by clearness, purity, strength, and elevation.

The Active Christian.—A series of Lectures, by John Howard Hinton, A. M. First American edition, with an Introduction by the Rev. Ezra Stiles Ely, D. D. Philadelphia, French & Perkins, 1833, pp. 235, 18mo.

Mr. Hinton is already known as a pleasant, sensible, and pious writer. The present work will sustain his reputation and increase his usefulness. It consists of twelve lectures under the following heads: I. "Surveying the field of labour." This duty is urged on those who would become active Christians, by the considerations that it will give a definite and practical character to our general sense of obligation—will yield important information and rectify many mistakes—and will supply valuable impulses to labour. The field should be surveyed in its extent; on the principle that our duty is equal to our opportunity—its condition, and its peculiarities. II. "Estimating his resources." These are stated to be character—knowledge of divine truth, and of the way of salvation—capacity for communication—property—influence and time. III. "Cultivating fitness for labour." None are to suppose that they have such deficiencies as totally disqualify them for action, nor to allow themselves to judge of their deficiencies hastily, or with a willingness to exaggerate them: ascertained deficiencies should be regarded with sorrow—not with complacency as excusing from duty; there should be an earnest desire that all impediments to action should be removed. Much may be done in cultivating fitness to labour for God. In this, as in everything, man improves by considerate and repeated effort. IV. "Preparing for action." Here the objects chiefly to be attended to are the formation of the purpose—the selection of the means, which should be those most wisely adapted—the spirit with which we engage, including the motives from which, and the manner in which we act—supplication for the divine blessing. V. "Habitual action." Christians should habitually act for the good of souls, by an amiable deportment, and well regulated temper;—a devotional habit, by constant exhibition of right principles of action—by consistency of conduct in their varied relations, especially by a conversation at all times well directed. VI. "Specific action." Besides habitual exertion for the conversion of men, there are opportunities for direct and specific action for the same end. In such efforts the object should be, to convey a just knowledge of duty—to add a deep conviction of sin, not only of particular sins, but of the plague of the heart; and when an acknowledgement of sin is induced, it is indispensable to inspire humiliation, and to give a right appreciation of the Saviour. It is also of great importance to induce a habit of meditation. In such efforts; resolution, promptness, watchfulness, patience and perseverance are necessary. VII. "Treatment of various cases." There will be found cases of deep ignorance—of unmeaning acquiescence—of tenacious mistake—of sophistical entanglement—of fallacious confidence—of intentional deceit—of ill-directed effort—of cherished neglect, and of direct resentment. In regard to each of these, directions are given as to the course to be pursued. VIII. "Direct exercises after labour." When the above efforts have been made, our work is not done. Sacred exercises should follow, as well as precede our efforts. We must lay our endeavours at our master's feet, and implore his gracious acceptance, and looking to him, expect success. Our desires for it should be comprehensive and importunate, having the glory of God for their ultimate object. IX. "Indirect exercises after labour." Our efforts have an influence upon our personal piety which demands attention; they may be accompanied with self-neglect, which is in itself sinful, and leads to declension. They may give rise to self-complacency or spiritual pride. We should guard against these effects by remembering that in all that we have done that is aright, we were moved by the spirit of God, and that we have still come far short of our obligations. Again, our efforts may be attended with conflicts, and a painful sense of indifference and hardness, but it is not certain that we are really more indifferent—it may be owing to greater light and a clearer discernment of sin. X. "Success expected." In our labours for the conversion of sinners, success should be earnestly desired—may be cheerfully expected, and should be justly estimated. XI. "Success wanting." Want of success will cause unfeigned grief to the Christian, inasmuch as he has failed in his efforts to promote the highest interests of men—his labours are without one of the most satisfactory tokens of God's acceptance—the spiritual wretchedness of men continues, and perpetual dishonour is done God. If these considerations do not occasion pain, something is wrong. To those who are sincerely concerned for want of success, it may be said, you cannot yet form a true judgment on the case, as sufficient time has not elapsed, and you are far from knowing everything that has occurred. Examine seriously if your motives have been correct, if you have used the divinely adapted and appointed means, and in a proper manner; if so, you have reason to hope that your labours contain something on which your heavenly Father might smile; and if yet you do not see the blessing, conclude that he has been pleased in his wise sovereignty to withhold it. Your labours are not lost, nor will you loose your reward. XII. "Success granted." The feelings proper to be cherished are, joy for the change in the mind of the sinner, once dark and subject to appetite, and now enlightened and governed by conscience—in his condition, once under the wrath, now enjoying the smile of God, and an account of your immediate connection with it. Gratitude should be awakened by the condescending kindness of God thus shown us. Success should cause enlargement both of desire and exertion, as it demonstrates the practicability of the object—facilitates the attainment—realises the anticipated pleasures of success—supplies evidence of God's faithfulness to his promises, and gives a pleasant recompense to toil.

The topics above enumerated are discussed with judgment, clearness, and copiousness, at the expense, indeed, of frequent repetition. Many of his remarks, as will be seen from the brief abstract we have given, might with equal propriety have been arranged under the same, or other heads; but as it is not a philosophical treatise but a popular course of lectures, this is less censurable. The person who desires to know his duty, (and what Christian does not!) cannot fail of being profited by the perusal of this volume.

Cow,
To in*ener.—By Caroline Fry, author of 'The Assistant of* press it in*n,' &c. Second American edition. Philadelphia,* developeme*imer & Co.,* 1833, 2 vols. 12mo.

These volumes belong to the same class of compositions with the Spectator, Rambler, and the 'Contributions' of Jane Taylor, to which last they bear a very near resemblance. They consist of short, lively, original, essays on well chosen themes relating to life and manners, and are strictly evangelical in their tendency. We adopt the following remarks from the London Christian Observer. "The Listener listens to excellent purpose, and her remarks on what she hears will deserve to be carefully weighed. She is domesticated in families; she is a Rambler, a Spectator, and a Tattler, and we may add, a Christian Observer: and few of us are so wise or so good that we may not be improved by her observations on life and manners, and on those minor morals of social intercourse, as well as those higher points of duty, and that devout regulation of the heart, to which she aspires to conduct those who listen to her honest and salutary advice. Her incidents and remarks, we ought to add, are given in a lively and interesting style; and her monitions are likely to be the more kindly received, as she is always cheerful and good-humoured. We wish her, by the blessing of God, every success in her pious and benevolent undertaking; and, above all, that best reward of turning many to righteousness; not only converting their general habits, and purifying and sweetening human intercourse, but leading them in those blessed paths which conduct to everlasting life." These volumes will prove alike interesting to the young and aged, and ought to be possessed by every family.

Scripture principles of Education. By Caroline Fry, author of the Listener, &c. Revised from the London edition. Philadelphia: George, Latimer & Co., 1833, pp. 160, 18mo.—Christ our Example. By Caroline Fry, author of the Listener, &c. Philadelphia, George, Latimer & Co., 1833, pp. 267, 18mo.

The object of the first-named work is the development and enforcement of the true, because Scriptural principles of education, in opposition to those of the systems too current even among Christians. Few parents and guardians of youth can, we think, read this book without being convinced that they have often departed from the true principles of education, or without gaining clearer views as to the course to be pursued in future.

"Christ our Example" is written in the same spirit, but with less power. The object is to treat of the Saviour as our example, "In the object of life," "In the rule of life," "In his intercourse with the world," "In the condition of life," "In his sorrows," "In his joys," and "In his death." The thoughts under these heads are sound and evangelical, always clearly, and not unfrequently eloquently expressed.

Conversations on Religion, with Lord Byron and others, in Cephalonia, a short time previous to his Lordship's death. By the late James Kennedy, M. D. Philadelphia, Carey & Lea, 1833, pp. 258, 12mo.

To a certain, and we suspect a pretty large class of readers, every thing connected with the name of Byron will awaken interest. We shall not stop to remark on the propriety of this fact, but content ourselves with expressing the hope that those who have waded through the pollutions of his poetry, and have devoured every thing in the shape of Memoirs, Recollections, Reminiscences, &c., which have borne his name, will be induced to read this volume, that for once they may be in the way of receiving benefit.

In Cephalonia, Dr. Kennedy who was a Scotchman, fell in with four of his countrymen, who made no secret of their sceptical principles. It was proposed and agreed to, that they should meet at times and listen to the arguments which Dr. Kennedy might adduce in support of the Christian faith. Lord Byron hearing of the arrangement, requested, and was allowed, to form one of the party. The volume before us consists chiefly of records of the conversations held at these meetings, and at a few private interviews of Dr. K. and Lord B. The Doctor appears to have been a sincere believer, but not a man of very vigorous intellect; at least, his arguments are by no means the strongest that might have been urged. Perhaps he was awed by the presence of Byron; at any rate, his admiration for the poet, led him to a very inaccurate estimate of his moral character. He speaks of the "slight spinkling of infidelity" that appears in his poems! The book throws no new light on the character of Byron, or on the evidences of Christianity: parts of it, however, are quite interesting and worthy of perusal.

The Valley of Bones, or Ezekiel's Vision, considered in a course of Lectures. By G. T. Bedell, D. D., Rector of St. Andrew's Church, Philad. French & Perkins. 1833, pp. 140, 32mo.

This is one of the many useful volumes which Dr. Bedell has, in rapid succession, given to the public. That in addition to the faithful discharge of the duties of the pastoral office to a large congregation, (while suffering almost constantly from feeble health) he should be able to accomplish so much of good through the medium of the press, is a matter of surprise to all, and of joy to those who are interested in the cause of Christ.

"Can these bones live?" is the text or motto of these lectures. After noticing and repeating the magnificent language of the context, the author remarks that "in the vision of the valley full of bones, there is offered to our consideration, three great leading topics of discussion: I. The primary reference of the vision; viz., The condition of the Jewish people, at the time contemplated by the prophet. II. The secondary reference of the vision; viz., The entire condition of the world, anterior to the period of Millenial rest. III. The accommodated reference of the vision; viz., The actual personal condition of every unconverted sinner, anterior to the great change in his moral nature, styled a resurrection to newness of life."

Having discussed these at large, he returns to the interrogatory of the text, "Can these bones live? will all these things be accomplished?" The question is answered by a reference to the word of God. These things are to be brought about by the subordinate and intermediate instrumentality of Christians. What then are they to do? 1. Information is to be gained as to the condition of the world. 2. Effort is to be made. 3. Prayer for the out-pouring of the Spirit is to be superadded. These duties are explained and enforced with clearness, simplicity and power. The lectures form a fair specimen of the author's pulpit ministrations.

Memoir of Julius Charles Rieu. From the French of Frederic Monod, jun., one of the Pastors of the Reformed French Church of Paris. With Introductory Remarks by the Rev. A. Alexander, D. D. Philadelphia: French & Perkins, 1833, pp. 65, 18mo.

The following from tho introductory remarks of the Rev. Dr. Alexander will show in what estimation this little volume ought to be held. "There is something exceedingly interesting in the whole narrative; but more especially in the last scene of this pious and heavenly-minded young man. It is rarely the case, that a minister of the gospel is permitted to express so fully his evangelical views and exercises, in his last moments, as was this devoted servant of Jesus Christ; and it is still more rare, to witness such a triumph of faith, and such a perfection of gospel peace, as are here exhibited. His farewell letter to his beloved elders and parishioners, is one of the most solemn and delightful discourses I have ever seen. It was, indeed, a sermon not only from the very heart of an affectionate pastor, but from the mouth of the sepulchre. His farewell to his mother and other relatives, who were at a distance, is exquisitely tender. All the ideas of terror and distress, which usually crowd around the deathbed, were banished from the scene here described. We are permitted to contemplate a minister of Christ, though in the flower of his life, and in the midst of useful and delightful labours, not only willing to die, but ardently desiring to depart. Not that he was weary of his master's service, for he was contented to remain and endure the combat; but his love to his Lord was so great that he felt an ineffable desire to be present with him; and esteemed it an extraordinary and unexpected favour, to be released from toil, and called to his reward after so short a conflict. Seldom, indeed, has a deathbed scene been witnessed, in which the sting of death appeared to be more completely extracted, and in which the sweet peace of God, which passeth all understanding, seemed more perfectly to expel from the mind every doubt, fear, and unpleasant emotion. Well may every reader exclaim, 'O let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.'"

Domestic Portraiture, or the Successful application of Religious Principle in the Education of a Family, exemplified in the Memoirs of three of the deceased children of the Rev. Legh Richmond. New York: J. Leavitt. Boston: Crocker & Brewster. 1833. pp. 291.

The nature of this book may be learned from its title, its value only from a perusal. It makes us more intimately acquainted with Legh Richmond, especially in his domestic relations; and the result is increased admiration for his character, and regret for his loss. Seldom has there lived a more lovely and exalted character. The memoirs contained in this volume are exceedingly interesting, and form a happy commentary on the system of religious education which he pursued. The book should be found in every domestic circle.

THE

COMPILED

CONTAINING

NEVER BEFORE PUBLISHED.

BY THOMAS TAYLOR.

PREFACE.

Many lives of Cowper have already been published. Why, then, it may be asked, add to their number? Simply because, in the opinion of competent judges, no memoir of him has yet appeared that gives a full, fair, and unbiassed view of his character.

It is remarked by Dr. Johnson, the poet's kinsman, in his preface to the two volumes of Cowper's Private Correspondence, "that Mr. Hayley omitted the insertion of several interesting letters in his excellent Life of the pōet, out of kindness to his readers." In doing this, however amiable and considerate as his caution must appear, the gloominess which he has taken from the mind of Cowper, has the effect of involving his character in obscurity. People read 'The Letters' with 'The Task' in their recollection, (and vice versa,) and are perplexed. They look for the Cowper of each in the other, and find him not. Hence the character of Cowper is undetermined; mystery hangs over it; and the opinions formed of him are as various as the minds of the inquirers.

In alluding to these suppressed letters, the late highly-esteemed Rev. Legh Richmond once emphatically remarked—"Cowper's character will never be clearly and satisfactorily understood without them, and they should be permitted to exist for the demonstration of the case. I know the importance of it from numerous conversations I have had both in Scotland and in England, on this most interesting subject. Persons of truly religious principles, as well as those of little or no religion at all, have greatly erred in their estimate of this great and good man."

Dr. Johnson's two volumes of Private Correspondence satisfactorily supplied this deficiency to all those who have the means of consulting them, and the four volumes by Mr. Hayley. The author of this memoir has attempted not only to bring the substance of these six volumes into one, but to communicate information respecting the poet which cannot be found in either of those works. He is fully aware of the peculiarities of Cowper's case, and has endeavoured to exhibit them as prominently as was compatible with his design, without giving the memoir too much of that melancholy tinge by which the life of its subject was so painfully distinguished.

In every instance where he could well accomplish it, he has made Cowper his own biographer, convinced that it is utterly impossible to narrate any circumstance in a manner more striking, or in a style more chaste and elegant, than Cowper has employed in his inimitable letters.

To impart ease and perspicuity to the memoir, and to compress it into as small a compass as was consistent with a full developement and faithful record of the most interesting particulars of Cowper's life, the author has, in a few cases, inserted in one paragraph, remarks extracted from different letters, addressed more frequently, though not invariably, to the same individual. He has, however, taken care to avoid doing this where it could lead to any obscurity.

He has made a free use of all the published records of Cowper within his reach, besides availing himself of the valuable advice of the Rev. Dr. Johnson, Cowper's kinsman, to whom he hereby respectfully tenders his grateful acknowledgments for his condescension and kindness, in undertaking to examine the manuscript, and for the useful and judicious hints respecting it he was pleased to suggest.

Without concealing a single fact of real importance, the author has carefully avoided giving that degree of prominence to any painful circumstance in the poet's life, which would be likely to excite regret in the minds of any of his surviving relatives, and which, for reasons the most amiable and perfectly excusable, they might have wished had been suppressed; and he hopes it will be found that he has admitted nothing that can justly offend the most fastidious.

It is particularly the wish of the author to state, that he makes no pretensions to originality in this memoir. He wishes it to be regarded only as a compilation; and all the merit he claims for it, if, indeed, it has any, is for the arrangement of those materials which were already furnished for his use.

He has attempted to make the work interesting to all classes, especially to the lovers of literature and genuine piety, and to place within the reach of general readers, many of whom have neither the means nor the leisure to consult larger works, all that is really interesting respecting that singularly afflicted individual, whose productions, both poetic and prose, can never be read but with delight.

CHAPTER I.

His parentage—Loss of his mother—Poetic description of her character—First school—Cruelty he experienced there—First serious impressions—Is placed under the care of an eminent oculist—Entrance upon Westminster School—Character while there—Removal thence—Entrance upon an attorney's office—Want of employment there—Unfitness for his profession—Early melancholy impressions.

William Cowper was born at Great Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, November 15, 1731. His father, Dr. John Cowper, chaplain to King George the Second, was the second son of Spencer Cowper, who was Chief Justice of Cheshire, and afterwards a Judge in the Court of Common Pleas, and whose brother William, first Earl Cowper, was, at the same time, Lord High Chancellor of England. His mother was Anne, daughter of Roger Donne, Esq. of Ludham Hall, Norfolk, who had a common ancestry with the celebrated Dr. Donne, Dean of St. Paul's.

In reference to this lady, it has been justly observed, by one of the poet's best biographers, "That the highest blood in the realm flowed in the veins of the modest and unassuming Cowper; his mother having descended through the families of Hippesley of Throughley, in Sussex, and Pellet, of Bolney, in the same county, from the several noble houses of West, Knollys, Carey, Bullen, Howard, and Mowbray, and so, by four different lines, from Henry the Third, King of England." Though, as the same writer properly remarks, "distinctions of this nature can shed no additional lustre on the memory of Cowper, yet genius, however exalted, disdains not, while it boasts not, the splendour of ancestry; and royalty itself may be pleased, and perhaps benefited, by discovering its kindred to such piety, such purity, and such talents as his."

Very little is known of the habits and disposition of Cowper's mother. From the following epitaph, however, inscribed on a monument, erected by her husband in the chancel of St. Peter's church, Great Berkhamstead, and composed by her niece, who afterwards became Lady Walsingham, she appears to have been a lady of the most amiable temper and agreeable manners:—

Here lies, in early years bereft of life,
The best of mothers, and the kindest wife,
Who neither knew nor practised any art,
Secure in all she wished—her husband's heart.
Her love to him still prevalent in death,
Pray'd Heaven to bless him with her latest breath.
Still was she studious never to offend,
And glad of an occasion to commend;
With ease would pardon injuries received,
Nor e'er was cheerful when another grieved.
Despising state, with her own lot content,
Enjoyed the comforts of a life well spent;
Resigned when Heaven demanded back her breath,
Her mind heroic 'midst the pangs of death.
Whoe'er thou art that dost this tomb draw near,
O, stay awhile, and shed a friendly tear;
These lines, though weak, are as herself sincere.

After giving birth to several children, this lady died in child-bed, in her thirty-seventh year; leaving only two sons, John the younger, and William the elder, who is the subject of this memoir. Cowper was only six years old when he lost his mother; and how deeply he was affected by her early death, may be inferred from the following exquisitely tender lines, composed more than fifty years afterwards, on the receipt of her portrait from a relation in Norfolk:—

"My mother! when I learned that thou wast dead,
Say, wast thou conscious of the tears I shed?
Hovered thy spirit o'er thy sorrowing son,
Wretch even then, life's journey just begun?
Perhaps thou gav'st me, though unseen, a kiss:
Perhaps a tear, if souls can weep in bliss!
I heard the bell tolled on thy burial day,
I saw the hearse that bore thee far away,
And, turning from my nursery-window, drew
A long, long sigh, and wept a last adieu!
But was it such? It was—Where thou art gone
Adieus and farewells are a sound unknown.
May I but meet thee on that peaceful shore,
The parting sound shall pass my lips no more!
Thy maidens grieved themselves at my concern,
Oft gave me promise of a quick return.
What ardently I wished, I long believed,
And, disappointed still, was still deceived.
By disappointment every day beguiled,
Dupe of to-morrow, even from a child.
Thus many a sad to-morrow came and went,
Till, all my stock of infant sorrow spent,
I learned at last submission to my lot,
But though I less deplored thee, ne'er forgot.
Could Time, his flight reversed, restore the hours
When playing with thy vesture's tissued flowers,
The violet, the pink, and jessamine,
I pricked them into paper with a pin,
(And thou wast happier than myself the while,
Would softly speak, and stroke my head, and smile,)
Could these few pleasant hours again appear,
Might one wish bring them, would I wish them here?
I would not trust my heart, the dear delight
Seems so to be desired, perhaps I might;
But no—what here we call our life is such,
So little to be loved, and thou so much,
That I should ill requite thee to constrain
Thy unbound spirit into bonds again.
Thou, as a gallant bark from Albion's coast
(The storm all weathered and the ocean crossed)
Shoots into port at some well-havened isle,
Where spices breathe, and brighter seasons smile,
There sits quiescent on the floods, that show
Her beauteous form reflected clear below,
While airs impregnated with incense play
Around her, fanning light her streamers gay:
So thou, with sails how swift! hast reached the shore
Where tempests never beat, nor billows roar.
And thy loved consort on the dangerous tide
Of life, long since, has anchored at thy side.
But me, scarce hoping to attain that rest,
Always from port withheld, always distressed—
Me, howling winds drive devious, tempest tost;
Sails ript, seams opening wide, and compass lost,
And day by day some current's thwarting force
Sets me more distant from a prosperous course.
But, oh! the thought that thou art safe, and he!
That thought is joy, arrive what may to me:
My boast is not that I deduce my birth
From loins enthroned and rulers of the earth,
But higher far my proud pretensions rise—
The son of parents passed into the skies!"

Deprived thus early of his excellent and most affectionate parent, he was sent, at this tender age, to a large school at Market-street, Hertfordshire, under the care of Dr. Pitman. Here he had hardships of different kinds to conflict with, which he felt more sensibly, in consequence of the tender manner in which he had been treated at home. His chief sorrow, however, arose from the cruel treatment he met with from a boy in the same school, about fifteen years of age, who on all occasions persecuted him with the most unrelenting barbarity; and who never seemed pleased except when he was tormenting him. This savage treatment impressed such a dread upon Cowper's tender mind of this boy, that he was afraid to lift up his eyes upon him higher than his knees; and he knew him better by his shoe-buckles than by any other part of his dress.

It was at this school, and on one of these painful occasions, that the mind of Cowper, which was afterwards to become imbued with religious feelings of the highest order, received its first impressions—a circumstance which cannot fail to be interesting to every Christian reader, and the more so as detailed in his own words.

"One day, as I was sitting alone on a bench in the school, melancholy, and almost ready to weep at the recollection of what I had already suffered, and expecting at the same time my tormentor every moment, these words of the Psalmist came into my mind—'I will not be afraid of what man can do unto me.' I applied this to my own case, with a degree of trust and confidence in God, that would have been no disgrace to a much more experienced Christian. Instantly I perceived in myself a briskness and a cheerfulness of spirit which I had never before experienced, and took several paces up and down the room with joyful alacrity. Happy had it been for me, if this early effort towards a dependance on the blessed God, had been frequently repeated. But, alas! it was the first and the last, between infancy and manhood."

From this school he was removed in his eighth year; and having at that time specks on both his eyes, which threatened to cover them, his father, alarmed for the consequences, placed him under the care of an eminent female oculist in London; in whose house he abode nearly two years. In this lady's family, religion was neither known nor practised; the slightest appearance of it, in any shape, was carefully concealed, even its outward forms were entirely unobserved. In a situation like this, it was not to be expected that young Cowper would long retain those serious impressions he had experienced; nor is it surprising, that before his removal thence he should have lost them entirely.

In his ninth year, he was sent to Westminster School, then under the care of Dr. Nicholls; who, though an ingenious and learned man, was nevertheless a negligent tutor; and one that encouraged his pupils in habits of indolence, not a little injurious to their future welfare. Here he remained seven years, and had frequent reason to complain of the same unkind treatment from some of his school-fellows, which he had before experienced. His timid, meek, and inoffensive spirit totally unfitted him for the hardships of a public school; and in all probability, the treatment he there received, produced in him an insuperable aversion to this method of instruction. We know but little of the actual progress he made while under the care of Dr. Nicholls; his subsequent eminence, however, as a scholar, proves that he must have been an attentive pupil, and must have made, at this period, a highly creditable proficiency in his studies.

While at this school, he was roused a second time to serious consideration. Crossing a churchyard late one evening, he saw a glimmering light in rather a remote part of it, which so excited his curiosity, as to induce him to approach it. Just as he arrived at the spot, a grave-digger, who was at work by the light of his lanthorn, threw up a skull-bone, which struck him on the leg. This little incident alarmed his conscience, and drew from him many painful reflections. The impression, however, was only temporary, and in a short time the event was entirely forgotten.

On another occasion, not long afterwards, he again at this early age, became the subject of religious impressions. It was the laudable practice ef Dr. Nicholls to take great pains to prepare his pupils for confirmation. The Doctor acquitted himself of this duty like one who had a deep sense of its importance, and young Cowper was struck by his manner, and much affected by his exhortations. He now, for the first time in his life, attempted prayer in secret, but being little accustomed to that exercise of the heart, and having very childish notions of religion, he found it a difficult and painful task, and was even then alarmed at his own insensibility. These impressions, however, like those made upon his mind before, soon wore off, and he relapsed into a total forgetfulness of God, with the usual disadvantage of being more hardened, for having been softened to no purpose. This was evidently the case with him, for on being afterwards seized with the small-pox, though he was in the most imminent danger, yet neither in the course of the disease, nor during his recovery from it, had he any sentiments of contrition, or any thoughts of God or eternity. He, however, derived one advantage from it—it removed, to a great degree, if it did not entirely cure, the disease in his eyes, proving, as he afterwards observed in a letter to Mr. Hayley, 'a better oculist than the lady who had him under her care.'

Such was the character of young Cowper, in his eighteenth year, when he left Westminster school. He had made a respectable proficiency in all his studies; but notwithstanding his previous serious impressions, he seems not to have had any more knowledge of the nature of religion, nor even to have discovered any more concern about it, than many other individuals have been known to feel, at an early age, who have never afterwards given it any attention. After spending six months at home, he was articled to a solicitor, with whom he was engaged to remain three years. In this gentleman's family, he neither saw nor heard any thing that could remind him of a single Christian duty; and here he might have lived utterly ignorant of the God that made him, had he not been providentially situated near his uncle's, in Southampton-row. At this favourite retreat, he was permitted to spend all his leisure time, and so seldom was he employed, that this was by far the greater part of it. With his uncle's family he passed nearly all his Sundays, and with some part of it he regularly attended public worship, but for which, probably, he would otherwise, owing to the force of evil example, have entirely neglected.

The choice of a profession for a youth is ever of paramount importance; if injudiciously made, it not unfrequently lays the foundation for much future disappointment and sorrow. It would certainly have been difficult, and perhaps impossible, to have selected one more unsuitable to the mind of Cowper than that of the law. As Mr. Hayley justly observes, "the law is a kind of soldiership, and, like the profession of arms, it may be said to require for the constitution of its heroes,

"The soul of Cowper had, indeed, its fire, but fire so refined and ethereal, that it could not be expected to shine in the gross atmosphere of wordly contention." Reserved to an unusual and extraordinary degree, he was ill-qualified to contend with the activity unavoidably connected with this profession. Though he possessed the strongest powers of mind, and a richly-cultivated understanding, yet were they combined with such extreme sensibility, as totally disqualified him for the bustle of a court. An excessive tenderness, associated with a degree of shyness, not easily to be accounted for, utterly unfitted him for a profession that would often have placed him before the public, and brought him into contact with individuals not remarkable for such qualities. His extreme modesty, however, while it precluded the possibility of his being successful in this profession, endeared him inexpressibly to all who had the felicity to enjoy his society. Never was there a mind more admirably formed for communicating to others, in private life, the richest sources of enjoyment; and yet, such were the peculiarities of his nature, that often, while he delighted and interested all around him, he was himself extremely unhappy. The following lines, composed by him about this time, are not less valuable, for the developement they give of the state of his mind at that period, than they are remarkable for their exquisite tenderness and poetic beauty:—

"Doomed as I am in solitude to waste
The present moments, and regret the past;
Deprived of every joy I valued most,
My friend torn from me, and my mistress lost;
Call not this gloom I wear, this anxious mien,
The dull effect of humour or of spleen.
Still, still I mourn, with each returning day,
Him* snatched by fate in early youth away;
And her through tedious years of doubt and pain,
Fix'd in her choice, and faithful—but in vain!
O, prone to pity, generous, and sincere,
Whose eye ne'er yet refused the wretch a tear;
Whose heart the real claim of friendship knows,
Nor thinks a lover's are but fancied woes;
See me,—ere yet my destined course half done,
Cast forth a wanderer on the world unknown!
See me neglected on the world's rude coast,
Each dear companion of my voyage lost!
Nor ask why clouds of sorrow shade my brow,
And ready tears wait only leave to flow!
Why all that soothes a heart from anguish free,
All that delights the happy, palls with me!"

CHAPTER II.

Entrance into the Temple—Employment there—Depression of his mind—Religious impressions—Visit to Southampton—Sudden removal of sorrow—Death of his father—Appointment to the office of reading clerk in the House of Lords—Dread of appearing in public—Consequent abandonment of the situation—Is proposed as clerk of the Journals—Feelings on the occasion—Visit to Margate—Return to London—Preparation for entering upon his office—Distressing sensations on the occasion—Is compelled to relinquish it for ever—Serious attack of depression—Visit of his brother.

At the age of 21, in 1752, Cowper left the solicitor's house, and took possession of a complete set of chambers in the Inner Temple. Here he remained nearly twelve years. And as this may justly be considered the most valuable part of life, it must ever be regretted that he suffered it to pass away so unprofitably. During this important and lengthened period he scarcely did anything more than compose a few essays and poems, either to gratify, or to assist some literary friend. Prompted by benevolent motives, he furnished several pieces for a work, entitled "The Connoisseur," edited by Robert Lloyd, Esq., to whom he was sincerely and warmly attached.

The following extract from a most playful poetic epistle, addressed to that gentleman, will be read with interest, as it shows that he began at that time to feel symptoms of the depressive malady, which afterwards became to him a source of so much misery.

"'Tis not that I design to rob
Thee of thy birthright, gentle Bob,
For thou art born sole heir, and single,
Of dear Mat Prior's easy jingle;
Nor that I mean, while thus I knit
My thread-bare sentiments together,
To show my genius, or my wit,
When God and you know I have neither;

* Sir William Russell, Bart., a favourite friend of the young poet.

Or such as might be better shown,
By letting poetry alone.
'Tis not with either of these views
That I presume to address the muse;
But to divert a fierce banditti
(Sworn foes to every thing that's witty;)
That with a black infernal train,
Make cruel inroads on my brain,
And daily threatens to drive thence
My little garrison of sense;
The fierce banditti which I mean,
Are gloomy thoughts, led on by spleen."

While he remained in the Temple he cultivated the friendship of the most distinguished writers of the day; and took a lively interest in their publications, as they appeared. Instead, however, of applying his richly furnished mind to the composition of some original work, for which, the pieces he incidentally wrote, proved him fully competent, his timid spirit contented itself with occasional displays of its rich and varied capabilities. Translation from ancient and modern poets was one of his most favourite amusements. So far, however, was he from deriving any benefit from these compositions, most of which were masterly productions, that he invariably distributed them gratuitously among his friends, as they might happen to request them. In this way he assisted his amiable friend and scholar, Mr. Duncombe; for we find in Duncombe's Horace, published by him in 1759, that two of the satires were translated by Cowper.

When Cowper entered the Temple he paid little or no attention to religion; all those serious impressions which he had once experienced were gone; and he was left, at that dangerous and critical season of life, surrounded by innumerable most powerful temptations, without any other principles for his guide, than the corrupt affections of our common nature. It pleased God, however, at the very outset, to prevent him from pursuing that rash and ruinous career of wickedness, into which many plunge with heedless and awful insensibility. The feelings of his peculiarly sensitive mind on this occasion he thus describes.

"Not long after my settlement in the Temple, I was struck with such a dejection of spirits, as none but those who have felt the same can have the least conception of. Day and night I was upon the rack, lying down in horror, and rising up in despair. I presently lost all relish for those studies to which I had before been closely attached; the classics had no longer any charms for me; I had need of something more salutary than amusement, but I had no one to direct me where to find it."

"At length I met with Herbert's poems; and, gothic and uncouth as they are, I yet found in them a strain of piety which I could not but admire. This was the only author I had any delight in reading. I pored over him all day long; and though I found not in his work what I might have found—a cure for my malady, yet my mind never seemed so much alleviated as while I was reading it. At length I was advised, by a very near and dear relative, to lay it aside, for he thought such an author more likely to nourish my disorder than to remove it."

"In this state of mind I continued near a twelvemonth; when, having experienced the inefficacy of all human means, I at length betook myself to God in prayer. Such is the rank our Redeemer holds in our esteem, that we never resort to him but in the last instance, when all creatures have failed to succour us! My hard heart was at length softened, and my stubborn knees brought to bow. I composed a set of prayers, and made frequent use of them. Weak as my faith was, the Almighty, who will not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax, was graciously pleased to listen to my cry, instead of frowning me away in anger."

"A change of scene was recommended to me; and I embraced an opportunity of going with some friends to Southampton, where I spent several months. Soon after our arrival, we walked to a place called Freemantle, about a mile from the town; the morning was clear and calm; the sun shone brightly upon the sea, and the country on the border of it was the most beautiful I had ever seen. We sat down upon an eminence, at the end of that arm of the sea which runs between Southampton and the New Forrest. Here it was, that on a sudden, as if another sun had been created that instant in the heavens on purpose to dispel sorrow and vexation of spirit, I felt the weight of all my misery taken off; my heart became light and joyful in a moment; I could have wept with transport had I been alone. I must needs believe that nothing less than the Almighty fiat could have filled me with such inexpressible delight; not by a gradual dawning of peace, but, as it were, with a flash of his life-giving countenance. I felt a glow of gratitude to the Father of mercies for this unexpected blessing, and ascribed it, at first, to his gracious acceptance of my prayers; but Satan and my own wicked heart quickly persuaded me that I was indebted for my deliverance to nothing but a change of scene, and the amusing varieties of the place. By this means, he turned the blessing into a poison; teaching me to conclude, that nothing but a continued circle of diversion, and indulgence of appetite, could secure me from a relapse. Acting upon this false and pernicious principle, as soon as I returned to London, I burnt my prayers, and away went all my thoughts of devotion, and of dependence upon God my Saviour. Surely, it was of his mercy that I was not consumed. Glory be to his grace."

"I obtained, at length, so complete a victory over my conscience, that all remonstrances from that quarter were in vain, and in a manner silenced, though sometimes, indeed, a question would arise in my mind, whether it were safe to proceed any farther in a course so plainly and utterly condemned in the Scriptures. I saw clearly, that if the gospel were true, such a conduct must inevitably end in my destruction; but I saw not by what means I could change my Ethiopian complexion, or overcome such an inveterate habit of rebelling against God."

"The next thing that occurred to me, at such a time, was a doubt whether the gospel were true or false. To this succeeded many an anxious wish for the decision of this important question; for I foolishly thought that obedience would follow, were I but convinced that it was worth while to attend to it. Having no reason to expect a miracle, and not hoping to be satisfied with any thing less, I acquiesced, at length, in favour of that impious conclusion, that the only course I could take to secure my present peace, was to wink hard against the prospects of future misery, and to resolve to banish all thoughts of a subject upon which I thought to so little purpose. Nevertheless, when I was in the company of deists, and heard the gospel blasphemed, I never failed to assert the truth of it with much vehemence of disputation, for which I was the better qualified, having been always an industrious and diligent inquirer into the evidences by which it is externally supported. I think I once went so far into a controversy of this kind as to assert, that I would gladly submit to have my right hand cut off, so that I might but be enabled to live according to the gospel. Thus have I been employed in vindicating the truth of Scripture, while in the very act of rebelling against its dictates. Lamentable inconsistency of a convinced judgment with an unsanctified heart!—an inconsistency, indeed, evident to others as well as to myself; inasmuch as a deistical companion of mine, with whom I was disputing upon the subject, cut short the matter by alleging, that if what I said were true, I was certainly condemned, by my own showing."

In 1756, Cowper sustained a heavy domestic loss, in the death of his excellent father, towards whom he had always felt the strongest parental regard. Such, however, was the depressed state of his mind at this season, that he was much less affected by the solemn event, than he would probably have been had it occurred at any earlier or later period of his life. Perceiving that he should inherit but little fortune from his father, he now found it necessary to adopt some plan to augment his income. It became every day more apparent to his friends, as well as to himself, that his extreme diffidence precluded the possibility of his being successful in his profession. After much anxiety of mind on this subject, he at length mentioned it to a friend, who had two situations at his disposal, the Reading Clerk, and Clerk of the Journals in the House of Lords—situations, either of which Cowper then thought would suit him, and one of which he expressed a desire to obtain, should a vacancy occur. Quite unexpectedly to him, as well as to his friend, both these places, in a short time afterwards, became vacant; and as the Reading Clerk's was much the more valuable of the two, his friend generously offered it to him, which offer he gladly and gratefully accepted, and he was accordingly appointed to it in his thirty-first year.

All his friends were delighted with this providential opening: he himself, at first, looked forward to it with pleasure, intending, as soon as he was settled, to unite himself with an amiable and accomplished young lady, one of his cousins, for whom he had long cherished a tender attachment. These fond hopes, however, were never realized. The situation required him to appear at the bar of the House of Peers; and the apprehension of this public exhibition quite overwhelmed his meek and gentle spirit. So acute were his distressing apprehensions, that, notwithstanding the previous efforts he made to qualify himself for the office, long before the day arrived that he was to enter upon it, such was the embarrassed and melancholy state of his mind, that he was compelled to relinquish it entirely. His harassed and dejected feelings on this occasion he thus affectingly describes :—

"All the considerations by which I endeavoured to compose my mind to its former tranquillity, did but torment me the more, proving miserable comforters, and counsellors of no value. I returned to my chambers, thoughtful and unhappy; my countenance fell ; and my friend was astonished, instead of that additional cheerfulness which he might have so reasonably expected, to find an air of deep melancholy in all I said or did. Having been harassed in this manner, by day and night, for the space of a week, perplexed between the apparent folly of casting away the only visible chance I had of being well provided for, and the impossibility of retaining it, I determined at length to write a letter to my friend, though he lodged, in a manner, at the next door, and we generally spent the day together. I did so, and begged him to accept my resignation of the Reading Clerk's place, and to appoint me to the other situation. I was well aware of the disproportion between the value of the appointments, but my peace was gone : pecuniary advantages were not equivalent to what I had lost ; and I flattered myself that the Clerkship of the Journals would fall, fairly and easily, within the scope of my abilities. Like a man in a fever, I thought a change of posture would relieve my pain, and, as the event will show, was equally disappointed. My friend, at length, after considerable reluctance, accepted of my resignation, and appointed me to the least profitable office. The matter being thus settled, something like a calm took place in my mind : I was, indeed, not a little concerned about my character, being aware that it must needs suffer by the strange appearance of my proceeding. This, however, being but a small part of the anxiety I had laboured under, was hardly felt when the rest was taken off. I thought my path towards an easy maintenance was now plain and open, and, for a day or two, was tolerably cheerful : but behold, the storm was gathering all the while, and the fury of it was not the less violent from this gleam of sunshine."

"A strong opposition to my friend's right of nomination began to show itself. A powerful party was formed among the lords to thwart it, and it appeared plain, that if we succeeded at last, it could only be by fighting our ground by inches. Every advantage, I was told, would be sought for, and eagerly seized, to disconcert us. I was led to expect an examination at the bar of the house, touching my sufficiency for the post I had taken. Being necessarily ignorant of the nature of that business, it became expedient that I should visit the office daily, in order to qualify myself for the strictest scrutiny. All the horror of my fears and perplexities now returned ; a thunderbolt would have been as welcome to me as this intelligence. I knew that, upon such terms, the Clerkship of the Journals was no place for me. To require my attendance at the bar of the House, that I might there publicly entitle myself to the office, was, in effect, to exclude me from it. In the mean time, the interest of my friend, the causes of his choice, and my own reputation and circumstances, all urged me forward, and pressed me to undertake that which I saw to be impracticable. They whose spirits are formed like mine, to whom a public exhibition of themselves, on any occasion, is mortal poison, may have some idea of the horror of my situation—others can have none. My continual misery at length brought on a nervous fever : quiet forsook me by day, and peace by night ; even a finger raised against me seemed more than I could bear."

"In this posture of mind, I attended regularly at the office, where, instead of a soul upon the rack, the most active spirits were essential to my purpose. I expected no assistance from any one there, all the inferior clerks being under the influence of my opponents ; accordingly, I received none. The Journal books were, indeed, thrown open to me, a thing which could not be refused, and from which, perhaps, a man in health, with a head turned to business, might have gained all the information wanted. But it was not so with me. I read without perception, and was so distressed, that had every clerk in the office been my friend, it would have availed me little, for I was not in a condition to receive instruction, much less to elicit it from manuscripts, without direction."

The following extract from a letter to his amiable cousin, Lady Hesketh, written 9th August, 1763, through which runs that happy mixture, of what may not perhaps improperly be termed, playful seriousness, which distinguishes almost the whole of his epistolary productions, and imparts to them a charm superior to that of almost any other writer, will illustrate the state of his mind at that period. "Having promised to write to you, I make haste to be as good as my word. I have a pleasure in writing to you at any time, but especially at the present, when my days are spent in reading the Journals, and my nights in dreaming of them, an employment not very agreeable to a head that has long been habituated to the luxury of choosing its subject, and has been as little employed upon business, as if it had grown upon the shoulders of a much wealthier gentleman. But the numscull pays for it now, and will not presently forget the discipline it has undergone lately. If I succeed in this doubtful piece of promotion, I shall have at least the satisfaction to reflect upon, that the volumes I write will be treasured up with the utmost care for ages, and will last as long as the English constitution, a duration which ought to satisfy the vanity of any author. Oh my good cousin ! If I was to open my heart to you, I could show you strange sights ; nothing, I flatter myself, that would shock you, but a good deal that would make you wonder. I am of a very singular temper, and very unlike all the men that I have ever conversed with. Certainly I am not an absolute fool ; but I have more weakness than the greatest of all fools I can recollect at present. In short, if I was as fit for the next world as I am unfit for this —and God forbid that I should speak it in vanity—I would not change conditions with any saint in Christendom. Ever since I was born, I have been good at disappointing the most natural expectations. Many years ago, cousin, there was a possibility that I might prove a very different thing from what I am at present. My character is now fixed, and riveted fast upon me ; and, between friends, is not a very splendid one, or likely to be guilty of much fascination."

Many months was Cowper thus employed, constant in the use of means to qualify himself for the office, yet despairing as to the issue. At length he says,

"The vacation being pretty far advanced, I repaired to Margate. There, by the help of cheerful company, a new scene, and the intermission of my painful employment, I presently began to recover my spirits ; though even here, for some time after my arrival, (notwithstanding, perhaps, the preceding day had been spent agreeably, and without any disturbing recollection of my circumstances,) my first reflections, when I awoke in the morning, were horrible and full of wretchedness. I looked forward to the approaching winter, and regretted the flight of every moment which brought it nearer, like a man borne away, by a rapid torrent, into a stormy sea, whence he sees no possibility of returning, and where he knows he cannot subsist. By degrees, I acquired such a facility in turning away my thoughts from the ensuing crisis, that, for weeks together, I hardly adverted to it at all : but the stress of the tempest was yet to come, and was not to be avoided by any resolution of mine to look another way."

"How wonderful are the works of the Lord, and his ways past finding out ! Thus was he preparing me for an event which I least of all expected, even the reception of his blessed gospel, working by means which, in all human contemplation, must needs seem directly opposite to that purpose, but which, in his wise and gracious disposal, have, I trust, effectually accomplished it."

In October, 1763, Cowper was again required to attend the office, and prepare for the final push. This recalled all his fears, and produced a renewal of all his former misery. On revisiting the scene of his previous ineffectual labours, he felt himself pressed by difficulties on either side, with nothing before him but prospects of gloom and despair. He saw that he must either keep possession of the situation to the last extremity, and thus expose himself to the risk of public rejection for his insufficiency, or relinquish it at once, and thus run the hazard of ruining his benefactor's right of appointment, and losing the only chance he seemed to have of procuring for himself a comfortable competence for life, and of being united to the individual to whom he was most tenderly and affectionately attached.

His terrors on this occasion had become so overwhelming, as to induce that lamented aberration of mind under which he is generally known to have suffered. The dreadful apprehensions which for so long a time had haunted him day and night, leaving him not a moment's interval of peace, had, at length, wound him up to the highest pitch of mental agony. The anguish of his lacerated spirit was inconceivable. The idea of appearing in public was, to his gentle but amiable mind, even more bitter than death. To his disordered perception there appeared no possibility for him to escape from the horrors of his situation, but by an escape from life itself. Death, which he had always shuddered at before, he began ardently to wish for now. He could see nothing before him but difficulties perfectly insurmountable. The supposed ruined state of his pecuniary circumstances—the imagined contempt of his relations and acquaintance—and the apprehended prejudice he should do his patron, urged the fatal expedient upon his shattered intellect, which he now meditated with inexpressible energy.

At this important crisis, when it pleased God, who giveth not to man an account of his proceedings, to permit a cloud, darker than midnight, to gather round the mind of the poet, so that he saw no possible way of escape but the one above alluded to, and when he peculiarly needed the counsel of some judicious and kind friend, it so happended that he fell successively into the company of two most unhappy sophists, who both advanced claims to the right of self-destruction, and whose fallacious arguments won him over to their pernicious views. This was, unhappily, rendered more easy than it otherwise would have been, by his recollection of an impious book which he had read when very young, the arguments of which, though they then appeared to him, in their true light, as utterly inconclusive and perfectly contemptible, now came afresh to his disordered mind, and seemed irrefutable; the situation in which he was now placed, inducing him to catch eagerly at anything that would justify the means of relief to which he wished to resort. How careful ought all to be, who are entrusted with the education of youth, that no pernicious books may fall into their hands! No evil consequences may, perhaps, arise from it at the time, but who can calculate what may be the future result?

The disordered state of Cowper's mind, at this period, will be seen by the following anecdote. Taking up a newspaper for the day, his eye caught a satirical letter which it happened to contain, and though it had no relation whatever to his case, he doubted not but the writer was fully acquainted with his purpose, and in fact, intended to hasten its execution. Wrought up to a degree of anguish almost unbearable, he now experienced a convulsive agitation that in a manner deprived him of all his powers. Hurried on by the deplorable inducements above related, and perceiving no possibility of escaping from his misery by any other means, all around him wearing only an aspect of gloom and despair, it will be no wonder to the reader, that before the tremendous day approached, the day on which his tender spirit was to have encountered an examination before the House of Lords, he had made several attempts at the escape above alluded to. Most happily, indeed, and most mercifully, for himself and for others, they were only attempts; for it was the will of a gracious Providence, not only to preserve his life for the exercise of a sound and vigorous mind, but to make that mind an instrument of incalculable benefit to his country, and, we may almost say, to the world, by advancing and promoting the best interests of mankind, morality, and religion.

The depths of affliction and sorrow which the amiable sufferer now endured were such, that he might truly say with the Psalmist, "All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me, I am troubled. I am bowed down greatly, my heart is pained within me, my sorrow is continually before me; fearfulness and trembling are come upon me. I sink in deep mire where is no standing, I am come into deep waters where the floods overflow me." When at length the long-dreaded day arrived, the approach of which he had feared more than he feared death itself, such were the melancholy results of his distress, that all his friends immediately acquiesced in the propriety of his relinquishing the situation for ever. Thus ended, his connexion with the House of Lords; unhappily, however, his sufferings did not end here. Despair still inflicted on him its deadliest sting, and he saw not how it could be extracted; Grief poured its full tide of anguish into his heart, and he could perceive nothing before him but one interminable prospect of misery.

"O Providence! mysterious are thy ways!
Inflexible thine everlasting plans!
The finite power of man can ne'er resist
The unseen hand which guides, protects, preserves,
Nor penetrates the inscrutable design
Of Him, whose council is his sovereign will.
Prosperity's bright sun withdraws his beams,
Thick clouds and tempests gather round the sky,
The winds of fierce temptations, and the waves
Of trials fell, assault the feeble bark,
And drive it headlong 'midst the cragged rocks.
We look with wonder on, but seek in vain
The deep designs of Heaven herein to scan;
The sacred page itself reveals not this.
Yet who that knows there is a Power above
Would not 'assert eternal Providence,
And justify the works of God to man?'"

At this period of the poet's history, it appears desirable to remark, in confutation of those who attribute, or at least endeavour to attribute his malady to his religion, that, viewed either as an originating cause, or in any other light, it can never be proved to have had any connection with it. It will not be denied, that those sacred truths, which, in all cases where they are properly received, prove an unfailing source of the most salutary contemplation to the underanged mind, were in his case, through the distorting medium of his malady, converted into a vehicle of intellectual poison. It is, however, as Dr. Johnson well observes, "a most erroneous and unhappy idea to suppose, that those views of Christianity which Cowper adopted, and of which, when enjoying the intervals of reason, after he was brought to the knowledge of them, he was so bright an ornament, had in any degree contributed to excite the malady with which he was afflicted. It is capable of the clearest demonstration that nothing was further from the truth. On the contrary, all those alleviations of sorrow, those delightful anticipations of heavenly rest, those healing consolations to a wounded spirit, of which he was permitted to taste, at the period when interrupted reason resumed its sway, were unequivocally to be ascribed to the operation of those very principles and views of religion, which, in the instance before us have been charged with producing so opposite an effect. The primary aberration of his mental faculties were wholly to be attributed to other causes," as indeed will satisfactorily appear, by the following affecting description he has given of himself at this period.

"To this moment I had felt no concern of a spiritual kind: ignorant of original sin; insensible of the guilt of actual transgression, I understood neither the law nor the gospel—the condemning nature of the one, nor the restoring mercies of the other. I was as much unacquainted with Christ in all his saving offices, as if his name had never reached me. Now, therefore, a new scene opened upon me."

"My sins were set in array against me, and I began to see and feel that I had lived without God in the world. One moment I thought myself shut out from mercy by one chapter, and the next by another. The sword of the Spirit seemed to guard the tree of life against my touch, and to flame against me in every avenue by which I attempted to approach it. I particularly remember, that the parable of the barren fig-tree was to me an inconceivable source of anguish. I applied it to my case, with a strong persuasion that it was a curse pronounced on me by the Saviour."

"In every volume I opened I found something that struck me to the heart. I remember taking up one; and the first sentence I saw condemned me. Every thing seemed to preach to me, not the gospel of mercy, but the curse of the law. In a word, I saw myself a sinner altogether; but I saw not yet a glimpse of the mercy of God in Christ Jesus the Lord."

Cowper now wrote to his brother to inform him of the afflicting circumstances in which he was placed. His brother immediately paid him a visit, and employed every means in his power to alleviate his distress. All his efforts, however, proved unavailing; he found him almost overwhelmed with despair, pertinaciously maintaining, in spite of all remonstrances to the contrary, that he had been guilty of the unpardonable sin, in not properly improving the mercy of God towards him at Southampton. No favourable construction put upon his conduct, in that instance by his brother, nor any argument he employed, afforded him a moment's alleviation of his distress. He rashly concluded that he had no longer any interest in the atonement, or in the gifts of the Spirit, and that nothing was left for him but the dismal prospect of eternally enduring the wrath of God. His brother pierced to the heart at the sight of his misery, used every means to comfort him, but all to no purpose, so deeply seated was his depression, that it rendered utterly useless all the soothing reflections that were suggested.

At this trying period Cowper remembered his friend and relative, the Rev. Martin Madan; and, though he had always considered him an enthusiast, he was now convinced that, if there was any balm in Gilead for him, Mr. Madan was the only person who could administer it. His friend lost no time in paying him a visit; and perceiving the state of his mind, he began immediately to declare unto him the gospel of Christ. He spoke of original sin, of the corruption of every man born into the world; of the efficacy of the atonement made by Jesus Christ; of the Redeemer's compassion for lost sinners, and of the full salvation provided for them in the gospel. He then adverted to the Saviour's intercession; described him as a compassionate Redeemer, who felt deeply interested in the welfare of every true penitent, who could sympathize with those who were in distress, and who was able to save unto the uttermost all that come unto God by him. To this important information Cowper listened with the greatest attention; hope seemed to dawn upon his disconsolate mind; his heart burned within him while he listened to the word of life; his soul was pierced with a sense of his great ingratitude to so merciful a Saviour; tears of contrition burst from his eyes; he saw clearly that this was the remedy his case required; and felt fully persuaded that this was indeed the gospel of salvation. He, however, wanted that faith without which he could not recover its blessings. He saw the suitability of this gospel to his circumstances, but saw not yet how one, so vile as he conceived himself to be, could hope to partake of its benefits.

Mr. Madan urged the necessity of a lively faith in the Redeemer, not as an assent of the understanding only, but as the cordial belief of the heart unto righteousness; assured him, that though faith was the gift of God, yet was it a gift that our heavenly Father was most willing to bestow, not on one only, but on all that sought it by earnest and persevering prayer. Cowper deeply deplored the want of this faith, and could only reply to his friend's remarks, in a brief but very sincere petition, "Most earnestly do I wish it would please God to bestow it on me."

His brother, perceiving he had received some benefit from this interview, in his desire to relieve the poet's depressed mind, wisely overlooked the difference of sentiments on the great subjects of religion, which then existed between himself and Mr. Madan, and discovered the greatest anxiety, that he should embrace the earliest opportunity to converse with him again. He now urged Cowper to visit Mr. Madan at his own house, and offered to accompany him thither. After much entreaty Cowper consented; and though the conversation was not then the means of affording him any permanent relief, it was not without its use. He was easier, but not easy; the wounded spirit within him was less in pain, but by no means healed. A long train of still greater terrors than any he had yet endured was at hand; and when he awoke the next morning, after a few hours' sleep, he seemed to feel a stronger alienation from God than ever. He was now again the subject of the deepest mental anguish; the sorrows of death seemed to encompass, and the pains of hell to get hold of him; his ears rang with the sound of the torments that seemed to await him; his terrified imagination presented to him many horrible visions, and led him to conceive that he heard many horrible sounds; his heart seemed at every pulse to beat its last; his conscience scared him; the avenger of blood seemed to pursue him; and he saw no city of refuge into which he could flee; every moment he expected the earth would open, and swallow him up.

He was now suddenly attacked with that nervous affection, of which the peculiar form of his mind seemed to have made him susceptible, which, on several subsequent occasions darkened his brightest prospects, and which, ultimately overwhelmed his meek and gentle spirit, and caused him to end his days in circumstances the most gloomy and sorrowful. So violent was the attack on this occasion, that his friends instantly perceived the change, and consulted on the best manner to dispose of him. Dr. Cotton then kept an establishment at St. Alban's for the reception of such patients. His skill as a physician, his well-known humanity and sweetness of temper, and the acquaintance that had subsisted between him and the afflicted patient, slight as it was, determined them to place him under the doctor's care. No determination could have been more wisely taken; and subsequent events proved it to have been under His superintendence, who orders all things according to the councils of his own will, and who, with the tenderest solicitude, watches over his people; managing those events which to us appear contingent, on principles of unerring wisdom; and overruling them for the accomplishment of his gracious and benevolent intentions.

"An anxious world may sigh in vain for what Kind Heaven decrees in goodness to withhold;
But the momentous volume of his mind,
When seen in yonder world, shall be approved,
And all its plans pronounced unerring love."

CHAPTER III.

His removal to St. Albans—Painful state of his mind there—Receives a visit from his brother—Good effects of it—His recovery—How it was effected—His subsequent happiness—Pleasing conversation with Dr. Cotton—The delightful manner in which he now passed his time—Description of his experience—His gratitude to God—Employs his brother to look out for him a new residence—Leaves St. Albans—Feelings on the occasion.

On the 7th December, 1763, he was removed to St. Albans, and placed under the care of Dr. Cotton. And, notwithstanding the skilful and judicious treatment pursued to effect his restoratron, he remained in the same gloomy and desponding state for five months. Every means that ingenuity could devise, and that benevolence and tenderness could prompt, were resorted to for this protracted period in vain. To describe in lengthened detail the state of his mind during this long interval, would justly be deemed injudicious. As Mr. Hayley very properly remarks, "Mental derangement is a topic of such awful delicacy, that it is the duty of a biographer, rather to sink in tender silence, than to proclaim with offensive temerity, the minute particulars of a calamity to which all human beings are exposed, and, perhaps, in proportion as they have received from nature, those delightful but dangerous gifts—a heart of exquisite tenderness, and a mind of creative energy." This, as Cowper most beautifully sings;—

"This is a sight for pity to peruse,
Till she resembles faintly what she views;
This, of all maladies that man infest,
Claims most compassion, and receives the least."

Without, however, entering minutely into particulars, on this painful subject, it will not be deemed improper to mention some of the leading facts respecting it, and here we shall allow the poet again to become his own biographer.

"The accuser of the brethren was ever busy with me night and day, bringing to my recollection, the commission of long-forgotten sins, and charging upon my conscience, things of an indifferent nature as atrocious crimes. Conviction of sin and despair of mercy, were the two prominent evils with which I was continually tormented. But, blessed be the God of my salvation for every sigh I drew, and for every tear I shed, since thus it pleased him to judge me here, that I might not be judged hereafter."

"After five months' continued expectation that the divine vengeance would plunge me into the bottomless pit, I became so familiar with despair, as to have contracted a sort of hardiness and indifference as to the event. I began to persuade myself, that while the execution of the sentence was suspended, it would be for my interest to indulge a less horrible train of ideas, than I had been accustomed to muse upon. I entered into conversation with the doctor, laughed at his stories, and told him some of my own to match them; still, however, carrying a sentence of irrevocable doom in my heart. He observed the seeming alteration with pleasure, and began to think my recovery well nigh completed; but the only thing that could promote and effectuate my cure, was yet wanting; an experimental knowledge of the redemption which is in Christ Jesus."

"About this time my brother came from Cambridge to pay me a visit. Dr. C. having informed him, that he thought me better, he was disappointed at finding me almost as silent and reserved as ever. As soon as we were left alone, he asked me how I found myself; I answered, as much better as despair can make me. We went together into the garden. Here, on my expressing a settled assurance of sudden judgment, he protested to me that it was all a delusion; and protested so strongly, that I could not help giving some attention to him. I burst into tears, and cried out, If it be a delusion, then am I the happiest of beings. Something like a ray of hope was now shot into my heart; but still I was afraid to indulge it. We dined together, and I spent the afternoon in a more cheerful manner. Something seemed to whisper to me, every moment, still there is mercy. Even after he left me, this change of sentiment gathered ground continually; yet, my mind was in such a fluctuating state, that I can only call it a vague presage of better things at hand, without being able to assign any reason for it."

."A few days after my arrival at St. Albans, I had thrown aside the Bible as a book in which I had no longer any interest or portion. The only instance in which I can recollect reading a single chapter, was about two months before my recovery. Having found a Bible on the bench in the garden, I opened it upon the 11th of John, where the miracle of Lazarus being raised from the dead is described; and I saw so much benevolence, goodness, and mercy, in the Saviour's conduct, that I almost shed tears at the relation, little thinking that it was an exact type of the mercy, which Jesus was on the point of extending towards myself. I sighed, and said, Oh, that I had not rejected so good a Redeemer, that I had not forfeited all his favour! Thus was my hard heart softened; and though my mind was not yet enlightened, God was gradually preparing me for the light of his countenance, and the joys of his salvation."

"The cloud of horror which had so long hung over my mind began rapidly to pass away, every moment came fraught with hopes. I felt persuaded that I was not utterly doomed to destruction. The way of salvation was still, however, hid from my eyes; nor did I see it clearer than before my illness, I only thought, that if it pleased God to spare me, I would lead a better life; and that I would yet escape hell, if a religious observance of my duty would secure me from it. Thus, may the terror of the Lord make a pharisee; but only the sweet voice of mercy in the gospel can make a Christian."

"But the happy period, which was to shake off my fetters, and afford me a clear discovery of the free mercy of God in Christ Jesus, was now arrived. I flung myself into a chair, near the window, and seeing a Bible there, ventured once more to apply to it for comfort and instruction. The first verse I saw, was, the 25th of the 3rd of Romans: 'Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God.' Immediately I received strength to believe, and the full beams of the sun of righteousness shone upon me. I saw the sufficiency of the atonement he had made for my pardon and complete justification. In a moment I believed, and received the peace of the gospel. Whatever my friend Madan had said to me, long before, revived in all its clearness, with the demonstration of the spirit, and with power."

"Unless the Almighty arm had been under me, I think I should have been overwhelmed with gratitude and joy. My eyes filled with tears, and my voice choked with transport. I could only look up to heaven in silent fear, overwhelmed with love and wonder. But the work of the Holy Spirit is best described in his own words:—it is 'Joy unspeakable and full of glory.' Thus was my heavenly Father in Christ Jesus, pleased to give me the full assurance of faith; and, out of a strong, unbelieving heart, to raise up a child unto Abraham. How glad should I now have been to have spent every moment in prayer and thanksgiving! I lost no opportunity of repairing to a throne of grace; but flew to it with an earnestness irresistible, and never to be satisfied. Could I help it? Could I do otherwise than love and rejoice in my reconciled Father in Christ Jesus? The Lord had enlarged my heart, and I could now cheerfully run in the way of his commandments."

"For many succeeding weeks tears would be ready to flow if I did but speak of the gospel, or mention the name of Jesus. To rejoice day and night was all my employment; too happy to sleep much, I thought it but lost time that was thus spent. Oh, that the ardour of my first love had continued! But I have known many a lifeless and unhallowed hour since; long intervals of darkness, interrupted by short returns of peace and joy in believing."

His excellent physician, ever watchful and apprehensive for his welfare, now became alarmed, lest the sudden transition, from despair to joy, should wholly overpower his mind; but the Lord was his strength and his song, and had become his salvation. Christ was now formed in his heart, the hope of glory; his fears were all dispelled; despair, with its horrid train of evils, was banished from his mind; a new and delightful scene was now opened before him; he became the subject of new affections, new desires, and new joys; in a word, old things were passed away, and all things were become new. God had brought him up out of the horrible pit, and out of the miry clay, and had put a new song into his mouth, even praise to his God. He felt the full force of that liberty, of which he afterwards so sweetly sung—

————— "A liberty unsung
By poets, and by senators unpraised,
. . . .
E'en liberty of heart, derived from heaven;
Bought with his blood who gave it to mankind,
And sealed with the same token!"

The apprehensions of Dr. C. soon subsided; he saw with delight undoubted proofs of his patient's perfect recovery, became satisfied with the soundness of his cure, and subsequently had much sweet communion with him in conversing about the great things of salvation. He now visited him every morning, as long as he remained under his care, which was near twelve months after his recovery, and the gospel was invariably the delightful theme of their conversation. The patient and the physician became thus every day more endeared to each other; and Cowper often afterwards looked back upon this period, as among the happiest days he had ever spent.

His time no longer hung heavily upon his hands; but every moment of it that he could command was employed in seeking to acquire more comprehensive views of the gospel. The Bible became his constant companion; from this pure fountain of truth he drank of that living water, which was in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life. Conversation on spiritual subjects afforded him a high degree of enjoyment. Many delightful seasons did he spend thus employed, while he remained with his beloved physician. His first transports of joy having subsided, a sweet serenity of spirit succeeded, uninterrupted by any of those distressing sensations which he had before experienced; prayer and praise were his daily employment; his heart overflowed with love to his Redeemer, and his meditation of him was sweet. In his own expressive and beautiful lines, he felt—

"Ere yet mortality's fine threads gave way,
A clear escape from tyrannizing sin,
And full immunity from penal woe."

His application to the study of the Scriptures must at this time have been intense; for in the short space of twelve months he acquired comprehensive and scriptural views of the great plan of redemption; and, in addition to this, his conceptions of real Christian experience, as distinguished from delusion and hypocrisy, were accurate and striking, and such as one would only have expected from an experienced Christian. He now composed two hymns, which exhibit an interesting proof of the scriptural character of those religious views he had then embraced. These hymns he himself styles specimens of his first Christian thoughts. Delightful specimens indeed they are; and the circumstances under which they were composed will greatly enhance their value in the minds of those to whom they have long been endeared by their own intrinsic excellence. The first is upon Revelations xxi. 5.; the second is entitled Retirement. The following lines of it are so touchingly beautiful, so correctly descriptive of the overflowings of his heart in solitude, while he walked with God, and was a stranger in the earth, having left his own connections, and not yet found new ones in the church; and breathe throughout in strains so pure, tender, and unreserved, the language of the Christian's first love, that they cannot fail to be read with deep interest.

"The calm retreat, the silent shade,
With prayer and praise agree;
And seem by thy sweet bounty made
For those who follow thee.

There, if thy Spirit touch the soul,
And grace her mean abode,
Oh, with what peace, and joy, and love,
She communes with her God.

There like the nightingale she pours
Her solitary lays;
Nor asks a witness of her song,
Nor thirsts for human praise."

His letters, written about this period, as well as those of a subsequent date, abound with proofs of his deep acquaintance with Christian experience. The following remarks are taken from a letter to Mrs. Cowper. "The deceitfulness of the natural heart is inconceivable. I know well that I passed among my friends for a person at least religiously inclined, if not actually religious; and what is more wonderful, I thought myself a Christian when I had no faith in Christ, and when I saw no beauty in him that I should desire him; in short, when I had neither faith, nor love, nor any Christian grace whatever, but a thousand seeds of rebellion instead, evermore springing up in enmity against him; but, blessed be the God of my salvation, the hail of affliction and rebuke has swept away the refuge of lies. It pleased the Almighty, in great mercy, to set all my misdeeds before me. At length the storm being past, a quick and peaceful serenity of soul succeeded, such as ever attends the gift of a lively faith in the all-sufficient atonement, and the sweet sense of mercy and pardon purchased by the blood of Christ. Thus did he break me and bind me up; thus did he wound me and make me whole. This, however, is but a summary account of my conversion; neither would a volume contain the astonishing particulars of it. If we meet again in this world I will relate them to you; if not, they will serve for the subject of a conference in the next, where, I doubt not, we shall remember, and record them with a gratitude better suited to the subject."

In another letter to his amiable and accomplished cousin, Lady Hesketh, he thus writes. "Since the visit you were so kind as to pay me in the Temple, (the only time I ever saw you without pleasure,) what have I not suffered? And since it has pleased God to restore me to the use of my reason, what have I not enjoyed? You know by experience how pleasant it is to feel the first approaches of health after a fever; but, oh! the fever of the brain! to feel the quenching of that fire, is indeed a blessing which I think it impossible to receive without the most consummate gratitude. Terrible as this chastisement is, I acknowledge in it the hand of infinite justice; nor is it at all more difficult for me to perceive in it the hand of infinite mercy; when I consider the effect it has had upon me, I am exceedingly thankful for it, and esteem it the greatest blessing, next to life itself, I ever received from the divine bounty. I pray God I may ever retain the sense of it, and then I am sure I shall continue to be, as I am at present, really happy. My affliction has taught me a road to happiness, which, without it, I should never have found; and I know, and have experience of it every day, that the mercy of God to the believer is more than sufficient to compensate for the loss of every other blessing. You will believe that my happiness is no dream, because I have told you the foundation on which it is built. What I have written would appear like enthusiasm to many, for we are apt to give that name to every warm affection of the mind in others, which we have not experienced ourselves; but to you, who have so much to be thankful for, and a temper inclined to gratitude, it will not appear so."

To the same lady, a day or two afterwards, he writes—"How naturally does affliction make us Christians! and how impossible is it, when all human help is vain, and the whole earth too poor and trifling to furnish us with one moment's peace, how impossible is it then to avoid looking at the gospel. It gives me some concern, though at the same time it increases my gratitude to reflect, that a convert made in Bedlam is more likely to be a stumbling-block to others than to advance their faith. But if it have that effect upon any, it is owing to their reasoning amiss, and drawing their conclusion from false premises. He who can ascribe an amendment of life and manners, and a reformation of the heart itself, to madness, is guilty of an absurdity, that in any other case would fasten the imputation of madness upon himself; for, by so doing, he ascribes a reasonable effect to an unreasonable cause, and a positive effect to a negative. But when Christianity only is to be sacrificed, he that stabs deepest is always the wisest man. You, my dear cousin yourself, will be apt to think I carry the matter too far; and that in the present warmth of my heart, I make too ample a concession in saying that I am only now a convert. You think I always believed, and I thought so too; but you were deceived, and so was I. I called myself indeed a Christian, but he who knows my heart knows that I never did a right thing, nor abstained from a wrong one, because I was so; but if I did either, it was under the influence of some other motive. And it is such seeming Christians, such pretending believers, that do most mischief in the cause, and furnish the strongest arguments to support the infidelity of its enemies: unless profession and conduct go together, the man's life is a lie, and the validity of what he professes itself, is called in question. The difference between a Christian and an unbeliever, would be so striking, if the treacherous allies of the church would go over at once to the other side, that I am satisfied religion would be no loser by the bargain. You say, you hope it is not necessary for salvation to undergo the same affliction that I have undergone. No! my dear Cousin. God deals with his children as a merciful father; he does not, as he himself tells us, afflict us willingly. Doubtless there are many, who, having been placed by his good providence out of the reach of evil, and the influence of bad example, have, from their very infancy, been partakers of the grace of his Holy Spirit, in such a manner, as never to have allowed themselves in any grievous offence against him. May you love him more and more, day by day, as every day while you think of him you will find him more worthy of your love, and may you be finally accepted by him for his sake, whose intercession for all his faithful servants cannot but prevail."

In the same letter he thus expresses his gratitude to God for placing him under the care of Dr. Cotton:—"I reckon it one instance of the providence that has attended me through this whole event, that I was not delivered into the hands of some London physician, but was carried to Dr. Cotton. I was not only treated by him with the greatest tenderness while I was ill, and attended with the utmost diligence, but when my reason was restored to me, and I had so much need of a religious friend to converse with, to whom I could open my mind upon the subject without reserve, I could hardly have found a better person for the purpose. My eagerness and anxiety to settle my opinions upon that long neglected point, made it necessary, that while my mind was yet weak, and my spirits uncertain, I should have some assistance. The doctor was as ready to administer relief to me in this article likewise, and as well qualified to do it, as in that which was more immediately his province. How many physicians would have thought this an irregular appetite, and a symptom of remaining madness! But if it were so, my friend was as mad as myself, and it is well for me that he was so. My dear Cousin, you know not half the deliverances I have received; my brother is the only one in the family who does. My recovery is indeed a signal one, and my future life must express my thankfulness, for by words I cannot do it."

He now employed his brother to seek out for him an abode somewhere in the neighbourhood of Cambridge, as he had determined to leave London, the scene of his former misery; and that nothing might induce him to return thither, he resigned the office of commissioner of bankrupts, worth about 60*l.* per annum, which he still held. By this means, he reduced himself to an income barely sufficient for his maintenance; but he relied upon the gracious promise of God, that bread should be given him, and water should be sure.

On being informed that his brother had made many unsuccessful attempts to procure him a suitable dwelling, he, one day, poured out his soul in prayer to God, beseeching him, that wherever he should be pleased, in his fatherly mercy, to place him, it might be in the society of those who feared his name, and loved the Lord Jesus in sincerity. This prayer, God was pleased, graciously to answer. In the beginning of June, 1765, he received a letter from his brother, to say, he had engaged such lodgings for him at Huntingdon, as he thought would suit him. Though this was farther from Cambridge, where his brother then resided, than he wished, yet, as he was now in perfect health, and as his circumstances required a less expensive way of life than his present, he resolved to take them, and arranged his affairs accordingly.

On the 17th of June, 1765, having spent more than eighteen months at St. Albans, partly in the bondage of despair, and partly in the liberty of the gospel, he took leave of the place, at four in the morning, and set out for Cambridge, taking with him the servant who had attended him while he remained with Dr. Cotton, and who had maintained an affectionate watchfulness over him during the whole of his illness, waiting upon him, on all occasions, with the greatest patience, and invariably treating him with the greatest kindness. The mingled emotions of his mind on leaving the place were painful and pleasing; he regarded it as the place of second nativity; he had here passed from death unto life—had been favoured with much leisure to study the word of God—had enjoyed much happiness in conversing upon its great truths with his esteemed physician; and he left it with considerable reluctance; offering up many prayers to God, that his richest blessings might rest upon its worthy manager, and upon all its inmates.

The state of his mind on this occasion he thus affectionately describes:—I remembered the pollution which is in the world and the sad share I had in it myself, and my heart ached at the thought of entering it again. The blessed God had endowed me with some concern for his glory, and I was fearful of hearing his name traduced by oaths and blasphemies, the common language of this highly-favoured but ungrateful country; but the promise of God, 'Fear not, I am with thee,' was my comfort. I passed the whole of my journey in fervent prayer to God, earnestly but silently entreating Him to be my guardian and counsellor in all my future journey through life, and to bring me in safety, when he had accomplished his purposes of grace and mercy towards me, to eternal glory."

CHAPTER IV.

Removal to Huntingdon—Sensations there—Engages in public worship for the first time after his recovery—Delight it afforded him—Commences a regular correspondence with some of his friends—Pleasure he experienced in writing on religious subjects—Anxiety of his mind for the spiritual welfare of his former associates—Attributes their continuance in sin chiefly to infidelity—Folly of this—Beauty of the Scriptures—Absurdity of attributing events to second causes, instead of to the overruling providence of God—Dependence upon Divine direction the best support in affliction—Forms some new connections—Becomes acquainted with the Unwin family—Happiness he experienced in their company.

After spending a few days with his brother at Cambridge, Cowper repaired to Huntingdon, and entered upon his new abode, on Saturday, the 22d of June, 1765; taking with him the servant he had brought from St. Albans, to whom he had become strongly attached for the great kindness he had shown him in his affliction. His brother, who had accompanied him thither, had no sooner left him, than finding himself alone, surrounded by strangers, in a strange place, his spirits began to sink, and he felt like a traveller in the midst of an inhospitable desert; without a friend to comfort, or a guide to direct him. He walked forth, towards the close of the day, in this melancholy frame of mind, and having wandered about a mile from the town, he found his heart so powerfully drawn towards the Lord, that on gaining a secret and retired nook in the corner of a field, he kneeled down under a bank, and poured out his complaints unto God. It pleased his merciful Father to hear him; the load was removed from his mind, and he was enabled to trust in Him that careth for the stranger; to roll his burden upon Him, and to rest assured, that wherever God might cast his lot, he would still be his guardian and shield.

The following day he went to church, for the first time after his recovery. Throughout the whole of the service, his emotions were so powerfully affecting, that it was with much difficulty he could restrain them, so much did he see of the beauty and glory of the Lord while thus worshipping Him in his temple. His heart was full of love to all the congregation, especially to such as seemed serious and attentive. Such was the goodness of God to him, that he gave him the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; and, though he joined not with the congregation in singing the praises of his God, being prevented by the intenseness of his feelings, yet his soul sung within him, and leaped for joy. The parable of the prodigal son was the portion of scripture read in the gospel appointed for the day. He saw himself in that glass so clearly, and the loving kindness of his slighted and forgotten Lord, that the whole scene was realized by him, and acted over in his heart. And he thus describes his feelings on hearing it:—"When the gospel for the day was read, it seemed more than I could well support. Oh, what a word is the word of God, when the Spirit quickens us to receive it, and gives the hearing ear, and the understanding heart! The harmony of heaven is in it, and discovers clearly and satisfactorily its author."

Immediately after church he repaired to the place where he had prayed the day before, and found the relief he had there received was but the earnest of a richer blessing. The Lord was pleased to visit him with his gracious presence, he seemed to speak to him face to face, as a man speaketh to his friend; He made all His goodness pass before him, and constrained him to say with Jacob, not "how dreadful," but "how lovely is this place! This is the house of God, and the gate of heaven."

He remained four months in the lodgings procured for him by his brother, secluded from the bustling and active scenes of life, and receiving only an occasional visit from some of his neighbours. Though he had little intercourse with men, yet he enjoyed much fellowship with God in Christ Jesus. Living by faith, and thus tasting the joys of the unseen world, his solitude was sweet, his meditations were delightful, and he wanted no other enjoyments. He now regularly corresponded with all his intimate friends, and his letters furnish the clearest proofs of the happy, and indeed, almost enviable state of his mind, during this period. To Lady Hesketh, in a letter dated July 5, 1765, he thus discloses his feelings:—"I should have written to you from St. Albans long ago, but was willing to perform quarantine, as well for my own sake, as because I thought my letters would be more satisfactory to you from any other quarter. You will perceive I allowed myself a sufficient time for the purpose, for I date my recovery from the latter end of last July, having been ill seven, and well twelve months. About that time, my brother came to see me; I was far from well when he arrived, yet, though he only remained one day, his company served to put to flight, a thousand deliriums and delusions which I still laboured under."

"As far as I am acquainted with my new residence, I like it extremely. Mr. Hodgson, the minister of the parish, made me a visit yesterday. He is very sensible, a good preacher, and conscientious in the discharge of his duty: he is well known to Dr. Newton, Bishop of Bristol, the author of the treatise on the Prophecies, the most demonstrable proof of the truth of Christianity, in my mind, that was ever published."

In another letter, a few days afterwards, to the same lady, he thus writes;—"Mentioning Newton's Treatise on the Prophecies brings to my mind an anecdote of Dr. Young, who you know died lately at Welwyn. Dr. Cotton, who was intimate with him, paid him a visit about a fortnight before he was seized with his last illness. The old man was then in perfect health; the antiquity of his person, the gravity of his utterance, and the earnestness with which he discoursed about religion, gave him, in the doctor's eye, the appearance of a prophet. They had been delivering their sentiments on Newton's Treatise, when Young closed the conference thus—'My friend, there are two considerations upon which my faith in Christ is built as upon a rock: first, the fall of man, the redemption of man, and the resurrection of man; these three cardinal articles of our holy religion are such as human ingenuity could never have invented, therefore they must be divine: the other is the fulfilment of prophecy, of which there is abundant demonstration. This proves that the scripture must be the word of God, and if so, Christianity must be true.'"

Cowper now lived in the full enjoyment of religion. Its truths supported his mind, and furnished him with an ample field for meditation; its promises consoled him, freed him from every distressing sensation, and filled him with joy unspeakable and full of glory; its duties regulated all his conduct, and his chief anxiety was to live entirely to the glory of God. The following beautiful lines of the poet are strikingly descriptive of his feelings at this period:—

> Long since; with many an arrow deep enfix'd
> My panting sides were charged, when I withdrew
> To seek a tranquil death in distant shades.
> There was I found by one who had himself
> Been hurt by th' archers: in his sides he bore,
> And in his hands and feet, the cruel scars.
> With gentle force soliciting the darts,
> He drew them forth, and heal'd, and bade me live.
> Since then, with few associates, in remote
> And silent woods I wander, far from those
> My former partners of the peopled scene;
> With few associates, and not wishing more,
> Here much I ruminate, as much I may,
> With other views of men and manners now
> Than once; and others of a life to come."

On all affairs connected with religion, Cowper now delighted to think and to converse, and his best letters were those in which he could freely introduce them to his correspondents. In the close of the letter from which we made the above extract, he thus writes:—"My dear cousin, how happy am I in having a friend to whom I can open my heart upon these subjects! I have many intimates in the world, and have had many more than I shall have hereafter, to whom a long letter upon those most important articles would appear tiresome at least, if not impertinent. But I am not afraid of meeting with that reception from you, who have never yet made it your interest that there should be no truth in the word of God. May this everlasting truth be your comfort while you live, and attend you with peace and joy in your last moments. I love you too well not to make this a part of my prayers; and when I remember my friends on these occasions, there is no likelihood that you can be forgotten."

In another letter to Lady Hesketh, dated 1st of August, 1765, he thus adverts to the character of his former associates, and feelingly expresses his anxiety for their spiritual welfare:—"I have great reason to be thankful I have lost none of my acquaintance but those whom I determined not to keep: I am sorry this class is so numerous. What would I not give, that every friend I have in the world were not almost, but altogether Christians! My dear cousin, I am half afraid to talk to you in this style, lest I should seem to indulge a censorious humour, instead of hoping, as I ought, the best of all men. But what can be said against ocular proof, and what is hope when built upon presumption? To use the most holy name in the universe for no purpose, or a bad one, contrary to his own express commandment, to pass the day and the succeeding days, weeks, and months, and years, without one act of private devotion, one confession of our sins, or one thanksgiving for the numberless blessings we enjoy; to hear the word of God in public with a distracted attention, or with none at all; to absent ourselves voluntarily from the blessed communion, and to live in the total neglect of it, are the common and ordinary liberties, which the generality of professors allow themselves: and what is this, but to live without God in the world. Many causes might be assigned for this anti-christian spirit so prevalent among professors, but one of the principal I take to be their utter forgetfulness, that the Bible which they have in their possession, is, in reality, the Word of God. My friend, Sir William Russell, was distantly related to a very accomplished man, who, though he never believed the gospel, admired the scriptures as the sublimest compositions in the world, and read them often. I have myself been intimate with a man of fine taste, who has confessed to me, that though he could not subscribe to the truth of Christianity itself, yet he never could read St. Luke's account of our Saviour's appearance to his two disciples going to Emmaus, without being wonderfully affected by it; and he thought, that if the stamp of divinity was anywhere to be found in scripture, it was strongly marked and visibly impressed upon that passage. If these men, whose hearts were chilled with the darkness of infidelity, could find such charms in the mere style of scripture, what must those find whose eyes could penetrate deeper than the letter, and who firmly believed themselves interested in all the invaluable privileges of the gospel? Had this mere man of taste searched a little further, he might have found other parts of the sacred history as strongly marked with the characters of Divinity as that he mentioned. The parable of the prodigal son, the most beautiful fiction that ever was invented; our Saviour's speech to his disciples, with which he closes his earthly ministration, full of the sublimest dignity and tenderest affection, surpass every thing that I ever read, and, like the spirit with which they were dictated, fly directly to the heart. If the scripture did not disdain all affectation of ornament, one should call such as these its ornamental parts; but the matter of it is that upon which it principally stakes its credit with us, and the style, however excellent, is only one of the many external evidences by which it recommends itself to our belief."

The warmest expressions of his gratitude to God for his distinguishing goodness to him, during his affliction, were frequently employed in his letters. In one, dated 4th September, 1765, he thus writes to his cousin:—"Two of my friends have been cut off during my illness, in the midst of such a life as it is frightful to reflect upon, and here am I, in better health and spirits, than I can ever remember to have enjoyed, after having spent months in the apprehension of instant death. How mysterious are the ways of Providence! Why did I receive grace and mercy? Why was I preserved, afflicted for my good, received, as I trust, into favour, and blessed with the greatest happiness I can ever know, or hope for in this life, while these were overtaken by the great arrest, unawakened, unrepenting, and every way unprepared for it? His infinite wisdom, to whose infinite mercy I owe it all, can solve these questions, and none else. A freethinker, as many a man miscals himself, would, without doubt, say, 'Sir, you were in great danger, and had, indeed, a most fortunate escape.' How excessively foolish, as well as shocking, is such language! As if life depended upon luck, and all that we are, or can be, all that we have now, or can hope for hereafter, could possibly be referred to accident. To this freedom of thought it is owing, that he, who is thoroughly apprized of the death of the meanest of his creatures, is supposed to leave those whom he has made in his own image, to the mercy of chance; and to this it is likewise owing, that the correction which our heavenly Father bestows upon us, that we may be fitted to receive his blessing, is so often disappointed of its benevolent intention. Fevers, and all diseases, are regarded as accidents; and long life, health, recovery from sickness, as the gift of the physician. No man can be a greater friend to the use of means upon these occasions than myself; for it were presumption and enthusiasm to neglect them. God has endued them with salutary properties on purpose that we might avail ourselves of them. But to impute our recovery to the medicine, and to carry our views no further, is to rob God of his honour. He that thinks thus, may as well fall upon his knees at once, and return thanks to the medicine that cured him, for it was certainly more immediately instrumental in his recovery than either the apothecary or the doctor."

No one ever watched more carefully the providence of God than Cowper. His views of it were just and scriptural, as is abundantly evident by the above remarks, and, if possible, more clearly evinced by the following extracts from the same excellent letter:—"My dear cousin, a firm persuasion of the superintendence of Providence over all our concerns, is absolutely necessary to our happiness. Without it we cannot be said to believe in the scripture, or practise any thing like resignation to his will. If I am convinced that no affliction can befall me without the permission of God, I am convinced likewise that he sees, and knows, that I am afflicted; believing this, I must, in the same degree, believe that, if I pray to him for deliverance, he hears me; I must needs know likewise, with equal assurance, that if he hears, he will deliver me, I may rest well assured that he has none but the most benevolent intention in declining it. He made us, not because we could add to his happiness, which was always perfect, but that we might be happy ourselves; and will he not in all his dispensations towards us, even in the minutest, consult that end for which he made us? To suppose the contrary, is to affront every one of his attributes, and to renounce utterly our dependence upon him. In this view it will appear plainly, that the line of duty is not stretched too tight, when we are told that we ought to accept everything at his hands as a blessing, and to be thankful even when we smart under the rod of iron with which he sometimes rules us. Without this persuasion, every blessing, however we may think ourselves happy in the possession of it, loses its greatest recommendation, and every affliction is intolerable. Death itself must be welcome to him who has this faith; and he who has it not must aim at it, if he is not a madman." The excellence of these extracts from Cowper's correspondence will, it is hoped, be admitted by every reader as a sufficient apology for the interruption they may occasion to our narrative. They might be greatly enlarged; but it is not intended to admit any, except such as will, in some degree at least, serve to describe his character.

It was not to be expected that a person like Cowper could remain long unnoticed, how reserved soever was his conduct. Accordingly, he had been at Huntingdon only a short time before he was visited by several persons, and introduced into several families, all eminently distinguished for their respectability, and general consistency of conduct. This soon endeared him to the place, and he thus communicated his sentiments respecting it to his correspondents;—"The longer I live here the better I like the place, and the people who belong to it. I am upon very good terms with five families, all of whom receive me with the utmost cordiality. You may recollect that I had but very uncomfortable expectations of the accommodations I should meet with in Huntingdon. How much better is it to take our lot, where it shall please Providence to cast it, without anxiety! Had I chosen for myself, it is impossible I could have fixed upon a place so agreeable to me in all respects. I so much dreaded the thought of having a new acquaintance to make with no other recommendation than that of being a perfect stranger, that I heartily wished no creature here might take the least notice of me. Instead of which, in about two months after my arrival, I became known to all the visitable people here, and do verily think it the most agreeable neighbourhood I ever saw. My brother and I meet every week by an alternate reciprocation of intercourse, as Sam Johnson would express it. As to my own personal condition, I am much happier than the day is long; and sunshine and candle-light alike, see me perfectly contented. I get books in abundance, as much company as I choose, a deal of comfortable leisure, and enjoy better health, I think, than for many years past. What is there wanting to make me happy? Nothing, if I can but be as thankful as I ought; and I trust that He, who has bestowed so many blessings on me, will give me gratitude to crown them all. I thank God for all the pleasing circumstances here, for my health of body, and perfect serenity of mind. To recollect the past, and compare it with the present, is all that I need to fill me with gratitude; and to be grateful is to be happy. I am far from thinking myself sufficiently grateful, or from indulging the hope that I shall ever be so in the present life. The warmest heart, perhaps, only feels by fits, and is often as insensible as the coldest. This, at least, is frequently the case with mine, and much oftener than it should be."

Among the families with whom Cowper was on terms of intimacy, there were none so entirely congenial to his taste as that of the Reverend Mr. Unwin. This worthy divine, who was now far advanced in years, had formerly been master of a free school in Huntingdon. On obtaining, however, from his college at Cambridge, the living of Grimston, he married Miss Cawthorne, the daughter of a very respectable draper in Ely, by whom he had two children, a son and a daughter. Disliking their residence at Grimston, they removed to Huntingdon, where they had now resided for many years.

Cowper became acquainted with this interesting family, which was afterwards, almost to the close of his life, a source of comfort to him, in the following rather singular manner. The Unwins frequently noticed Mr. C. and remarked the degree of piety and intelligence he seemed to possess; this induced them to wish for farther acquaintance with the interesting stranger: his manners, however, were so reserved, that an introduction to him seemed wholly out of their reach. After waiting some time, with no apparent prospect of success, their eldest son, Mr. W. Unwin, though dissuaded from it by his mother, lest it should be thought too intrusive, ventured to speak to Mr. Cowper one day, when they were coming out of church, after morning prayers, and to engage himself to take tea with Mr. C. that afternoon. This was perfectly agreeable to Cowper, who, in one of his letters some time afterwards, thus describes his new-made acquaintance:—"To my inexpressible joy, I found him one, whose notions of religion were spiritual and lively; one, whom the Lord had been training up from his infancy for the temple. We opened our hearts to each other at the first interview; and when he parted, I immediately retired to my chamber, and prayed the Lord, who had been the author, to be the guardian of our friendship, and to grant to it fervency and perpetuity, even unto death; and I doubt not that my gracious Father heard this prayer." A friendship thus formed was not likely to be soon interrupted; accordingly it continued with unabated affection through life, and became to both parties a source of much real enjoyment. Well would it be for Christians, were they, in making choice of their friends, to follow the example of Cowper! Entering upon it by earnest prayer to God for his blessing, they might then hope to derive all those invaluable benefits from it, which it is adapted and designed to convey.

The following Sabbath Cowper dined with the Unwin's, and was treated with so much cordiality and real affection, that he ever after felt the warmest attachment to this interesting family. In his letters on the subject he thus writes:—"The last acquaintance I have made here is of the race of the Unwins, consisting of father and mother, son and daughter; they are the most agreeable people imaginable; quite sociable, and as free from the ceremonious civility of country gentlefolks as I ever met with. They treat me more like a near relation than a stranger, and their house is always open to me. The old gentleman carries me to Cambridge in his chaise; he is a man of learning and good sense, and as simple as parson Adams. His wife has a very uncommon understanding, has read much to excellent purpose, and is more polite than a duchess; she treats me with an affection so truly Christian, that I could almost fancy my own mother restored to life again, to compensate me for all my lost friends, and broken connections. She has a son, in all respects, worthy of such a mother, the most amiable young man I ever knew; he is not yet arrived at that time of life when suspicion recommends itself to us in the form of wisdom, and sets everything but our own dear selves at an immeasurable distance from our esteem and confidence. Consequently he is known almost as soon as seen; and having nothing in his heart that makes it necessary for him to keep it barred and bolted, opens it to the perusal even of a stranger. His natural and acquired endowments are very considerable, and as to his virtues, I need only say that he is a Christian. Miss Unwin resembles her mother in her great piety, who is one of the most remarkable instances of it I ever knew. They are altogether the most cheerful and engaging family it is possible to conceive. They see but little company, which suits me exactly; go when I will, I find a house full of peace and cordiality in all its parts, and am sure to hear no scandal, but such discourse instead of it as we are all the better for. Now I know them, I wonder that I liked Huntingdon so well before, and am apt to think I should find every place disagreeable that had not an Unwin belonging to it."

CHAPTER V.

Cowper becomes an inmate with Mr. Unwin's family—Is much delighted with their society—Describes the manner in which they spent their time—His opinion respecting the knowledge which Christians will have of each other in Heaven—What will engage their thoughts there—Just Views of Christian friendship—Strength of his religious affections—Humbling views of himself—Melancholy death of Mr. Unwin—Cowper's reflections upon it—Mr. Newton's unexpected but providential visit to Mrs. Unwin—Cowper's determination to remain with the family—Their removal from Huntingdon to Olney.

Towards the end of October, 1765, Cowper began to fear that his solitary and lonely situation, would not be agreeable to him during the winter; and finding his present method of living, though he was strictly economical, rather too expensive for his limited income, he judged it expedient to look out for a family, with which he might become an inmate, where he might enjoy the advantage of social and familiar intercourse, and be subject to a less expensive establishment. It providentially occurred to him, that he might probably be admitted, on such terms, into Mr. Unwin's family. He knew that a young gentleman, who had lived with them as a pupil, had just left them for Cambridge, and it appeared not improbable, that he might be allowed to succeed him, not as a pupil, but as an inmate. This subject occasioned him a tumult of anxious solicitude, and for some days, he could not possibly divert his attention from it. He at length, made it the subject of earnest prayer to his Heavenly Father, that he would be pleased to bring this affair to such an issue, as would be most calculated to promote His own glory; and he had the satisfaction, in a short time, to receive a gracious answer to his petitions. A few days afterwards he mentioned the subject to Mrs. Unwin, a satisfactory arrangement was very speedily made with the family, and he entered upon his new abode, the eleventh of November, 1765.

The manner in which he spent his time while associated with this exemplary family, and the high degree of enjoyment he there experienced, will be seen by the following extracts from his correspondence with his two amiable cousins, Lady Hesketh and Mrs. Cowper. To the former he thus writes:—

"My dear Cousin,—The frequency of your letters to me, while I lived alone, was occasioned, I am sure, by your regard for my welfare, and was an act of particular charity. I bless God, however, that I was happy even then; solitude has nothing gloomy in it, if the soul points upwards. St. Paul tells his Hebrew converts, 'Ye are come,' (already come) 'to Mount Sion, to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly of the first born, which are written in heaven, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant.' When this is the case, as surely as it was with them, or the Spirit of truth would never have spoken it, there is an end to the melancholy and dulness of life at once. You will not suspect me, my dear cousin, of a design to understand this passage literally; but this, however, it certainly means, that a lively faith is able to anticipate, in some measure, the joys of that heavenly society which the soul shall actually possess hereafter.

"Since I have changed my situation, I have found still greater cause of thanksgiving to the Father of all mercies. The family with whom I live are Christians, and it has pleased the Almighty to bring me to the knowledge of them, that I may want no means of improvement in that temper and conduct which he requires of all his servants. My dear cousin! one-half of the Christian world would call this madness, fanaticism, and folly; but are not these things warranted by the word of God. If we have no communion with God here, surely we can expect none hereafter. A faith that does not place our conversation in heaven; that does not warm the heart, and purify it too; that does not, in short, govern our thoughts, words, and deeds, is not Christian faith, nor can we procure it by any spiritual blessing, here or hereafter. Let us therefore see that we do not deceive ourselves in a matter of such infinite moment. The world will be ever telling us that we are good enough, and the world will vilify us behind our backs: but it is not the world which tries the heart—that is the prerogative of God alone. My dear cousin! I have often prayed for you behind your back, and now I pray for you to your face. There are many who would not forgive me this wrong, but I have known you so long, and so well, that I am not afraid of telling you how sincerely I wish for your growth in every Christian grace, in every thing that may promote and secure your everlasting welfare."

To his cousin, Mrs. Cowper, he thus writes:—"I am obliged to you for the interest you take in my welfare, and for your inquiring so particularly after the manner in which my time passes here. As to amusements—I mean what the world calls such—we have none; the place, indeed, swarms with them, and cards and dancing are the professed business of almost all the gentle inhabitants of Huntingdon. We refuse to take part in them, or to be accessaries to this way of murdering our time, and by so doing have acquired the name of Methodists. Having told you how we do not spend our time, I will next say how we do. We breakfast commonly between eight and nine; till eleven, we read either the scripture or the sermons of some faithful preacher; at eleven, we attend divine service, which is performed here every day; and from twelve to three, we separate, and amuse ourselves as we please. During that interval, I read in my own apartment, or walk, or ride, or work in the garden. We seldom sit an hour after dinner, but if the weather permits, adjourn into the garden, where, with Mrs. Unwin and her son, I have generally the pleasure of religious conversation till tea-time. If it rains, or is too windy for walking, we either converse within doors, or sing some hymns of Martin's collection, and by the help of Mrs. Unwin's harpsichord, make up a tolerable concert, in which our hearts are the best and the most musical performers. After tea, we sally forth to take a walk in good earnest, and we have generally travelled four miles before we see home again. At night we read and converse till supper, and commonly finish the evening either with hymns, or with a sermon; and last of all, the family are called to prayers. I need not tell you that such a life as this is consistent with the utmost cheerfulness; accordingly, we are all happy, and dwell together in unity as brethren. Mrs. Unwin has almost a maternal affection for me, and I have something very like a filial one for her, and her son and I are brothers. Blessed be the God of our salvation for such companions, and for such a life; above all, for a heart to relish it."

It was during his residence with this family, while they resided at Huntingdon, that he wrote some of those excellent letters to Mrs. Cowper, with extracts from which it is our intention to enrich this part of his memoirs. Speaking of the knowledge which Christians will have of each other hereafter, he remarks—"Reason is able to form many plausible conjectures concerning the possibility of our knowing each other in a future state; and the scripture has, here and there, favoured us with an expression that looks at least like a slight intimation of it; but because a conjecture can never amount to a proof, and a slight intimation cannot be construed into a positive assertion, therefore I think we can never come to any absolute conclusion upon the subject. We may, indeed, reason about the plausibility of our conjectures, and we may discuss, with great industry and shrewdness of argument, those passages in the scripture which seem to favour this opinion; but still no certain means having been afforded us, no certain end can be attained; and after all that can be said, it will still be doubtful whether we shall know each other or not. Both reason and scripture, however, furnish us with a great number of arguments on the affirmative side. In the parable of Dives and Lazarus, Dives is represented as knowing Lazarus, and Abraham as knowing them both, and the discourse between them is entirely concerning their respective characters and circumstances upon earth. Here, therefore, our Saviour seems to countenance the notion of a mutual knowledge and recollection; and if a soul that has perished shall know a soul that is saved, surely the heirs of salvation shall know and recollect each other.

"Paul, in the first epistle to the Thessalonians, encourages the faithful and laborious minister of Christ to expect that a knowledge of those who had been converted by their instrumentality would contribute greatly to augment their felicity in a future state, when each minister should appear before the throne of God, saying, 'Here am I, with the children thou hast given me.' This seems to imply, that the apostle should know the converts, and the converts the apostle, at least at the day of judgment, and if then, why not afterwards?"

In another letter, the following excellent remarks occur respecting what will engage our thoughts and form part of our communications in heaven:—"The common and ordinary occurrences of life, no doubt, and even the ties of kindred, and of all temporal interests, will be entirely discarded from that happy society, and possibly even the remembrance of them done away; but it does not therefore follow that our spiritual concerns, even in this life, will be forgotten, neither do I think that they can ever appear trifling to us, in any the most distant period of eternity. God will then be all in all; our whole nature, the soul, and all its faculties, will be employed in praising and adoring him; and if so, will it not furnish us with a theme of thanksgiving, to recollect 'The rock whence we were hewn, and the hole of the pit whence we were digged?'—To recollect the time when our faith, which, under the tuition and nurture of the Holy Spirit, has produced such a plentiful harvest of immortal bliss, was as a grain of mustard-seed, small in itself, promising but little fruit, and producing less?—to recollect the various attempts that were made upon it by the world, the flesh, and the devil, and his various triumphs over all, by the assistance of God, through our Lord Jesus Christ? At present, whatever our convictions may be of the sinfulness and corruptions of our nature, we can make but a very imperfect estimate either of our weakness or our guilt. Then, no doubt, we shall understand the full value of the wonderful salvation wrought out for us by our exalted Redeemer; and it seems reasonable to suppose, that in order to form a just idea of our redemption, we shall be able to form a just one of the danger we have escaped; when we know how weak and frail we were, we shall be more able to render due praise and honour to his strength who fought for us; when we know completely the hatefulness of sin in the sight of God, and how deeply we were tainted with it, we shall know how to value the blood by which we were cleansed, as we ought."

In the following letter to the same lady, he says:—"I am not sorry that what I have said concerning our knowledge of each other, in a future state, has a little inclined you to the affirmative. For, though the redeemed of the Lord will be sure of being happy in that state, as infinite power, employed by infinite goodness, can make them, and therefore, it may seem immaterial, whether we shall, or shall not, recollect each other hereafter; yet, our present happiness, at least, is a little interested in the question. A parent, a friend, a wife, must needs, I think, feel a little heart-ache at the thought of an eternal separation from the objects of her regard: and not to know them when she meets them in another state, or never to meet them at all, amounts, though not altogether, yet nearly to the same thing. Remember and recognize them, I have no doubt we shall; and to believe that they are happy will, indeed, be no small addition to our own felicity; but to see them so, will surely be a greater. Thus, at least, it appears to our present human apprehension; consequently, therefore, to think, that when we leave them, we lose them for ever, and must remain eternally ignorant, whether those, who were flesh of our flesh, and bone of our bone, partake with us of celestial glory, or are disinherited of their heavenly portion, must shed a dismal gloom over all our present connections. For my own part, this life is such a momentary thing, and all its interests have so shrunk in my estimation, since, by the grace of our Lord Jesus, I became attentive to the things of another; that, like a worm in the bud of all my friendships and affections, this very thought would eat out the heart of them all, had I a thousand; and were their date to terminate in this life, I think I should have no inclination to cultivate and improve such a fugitive business. Yet friendship is necessary to our happiness here, and built upon Christian principles, upon which only it can stand, is a thing even of religious sanction—for what is that love, which the Holy Spirit speaking by St. John, so much inculcates, but friendship? The only love which deserves the name, is a love which can enable the Christian to toil, and watch, and deny himself, and risk, even exposure to death, for his brother. Worldly friendships are a poor weed compared with this; and even this union of the spirit in the bond of peace, would suffer, in my mind at least, could I think it were only coeval with our earthly mansions. It may possibly argue great weakness in me, in this instance, to stand so much in need of future hopes, to support me in the discharge of present duty, but so it is. I am far, I know, very far, from being perfect in Christian love, or any other divine attainment, and am, therefore, unwilling to forego whatever may help me on my progress."

The anxiety of his mind respecting religion, and the progress he had made, and was still making in it, will appear from the following extract. "You are so kind as to inquire after my health, for which reason I must tell you what otherwise would not be worth mentioning, that I have lately been just enough indisposed to convince me, that not only human life in general, but mine in particular, hangs by a slender thread. I am stout enough in appearance, yet a little illness demolishes me. I have had a serious shake, and the building is not so firm as it was. But I bless God for it, with all my heart. If the inner man be but strengthened day by day, as I hope, under the renewing influences of the Holy Spirit, it will be, no matter how soon the outward is dissolved. He who has, in a manner, raised me from the dead, in a literal sense, has given me the grace, I trust, to be ready, at the shortest notice, to surrender up to him that life, which I have twice received from him. Whether I live or die, I desire it may be to his glory, and then it must be to my happiness. I thank God, that I have those amongst my kindred, to whom I can write, without reserve, my sentiments on this subject. A letter upon any other subject, is more insipid to me than ever my task was, when a school-boy. I say not this in vain glory. God forbid! but to show what the Almighty, whose name I am unworthy to mention, has done for me, the chief of sinners. Once he was a terror to me; and his service, oh, what a weariness it was! Now I can say, I love him, and his Holy name, and am never so happy as when I speak of his mercies to me."

To the same correspondent he again writes. "To find those whom I love, clearly and strongly persuaded of evangelical truth, gives me a pleasure superior to any this world can afford. Judge then, whether your letter, in which the body and substance of saving faith is so evidently set forth, could meet with a lukewarm reception at my hands, or be entertained with indifference! Do not imagine that I shall ever hear from you upon this delightful theme, without real joy, or without prayer to God to prosper you in the way of his truth. The book you mention, lies now upon my table; Marshall is an old acquaintance of mine; I have both read him, and heard him read with pleasure and edification. The doctrines he maintains are, under the influence of the spirit of Christ, the very life of my soul, and the soul of all my happiness. That Jesus is a present Saviour from the guilt of sin, by his most precious blood, and from the power of it by his Spirit; that, corrupt and wretched in ourselves, in Him, and in Him only, we are complete; that being united to Jesus by a lively faith, we have a solid and eternal interest in his obedience and sufferings, to justify us before the face of our Heavenly Father; and that all this inestimable treasure, the earnest of which is in grace, and its consummation in glory, is given, freely given to us by God; in short, that he hath freely opened the kingdom of Heaven to all believers; are truths which cannot be disproved, though they have been disputed. These are the truths, which, by the grace of God, shall be dearer to me than life itself; shall ever be placed next my heart, as the throne, whereon the Saviour himself shall sit, to sway all its motions, and reduce that world of iniquity and rebellion to a state of filial and affectionate obedience to the will of the most Holy."

"These, my dear Cousin, are the truths to which, by nature, we are enemies; they debase the sinner, and exalt the Saviour, to a degree, which the pride of our hearts, while unsubdued by grace, is determined never to allow. May the Almighty reveal his Son in our hearts, continually more and more, and teach us ever to increase in love towards him for having given us the unspeakable riches of Christ."

In the following letter to the same lady he again writes:—"I think Marshall one of the best writers, and the most spiritual expositors of Scripture I ever read. I admire the strength of his argument, and the clearness of his reasonings, upon those points of our most holy religion which are generally least understood (even by real Christians) as master-pieces of the kind. His section upon the union of the soul with Christ is an instance of what I mean; in which he has spoken of a most mysterious truth, with admirable perspicuity, and with great good sense, making it all the while subservient to his main purport, of proving holiness to be the fruit and effect of faith. I never met with an author who understood the plan of salvation better, or was more happy in explaining it."

That Cowper inspected very closely, and watched very narrowly his own heart, will appear by the following extract from a letter to the same lady:—"Oh pride! pride! it deceives with the subtlety of a serpent, and seems to walk erect, though it crawls upon the earth. How will it twist and twine itself about to get from under the cross, which it is the glory of our Christian calling to be able to bear with patience and good will. Those who can guess at the heart of a stranger, and you especially, who are of a compassionate temper, will be more ready to excuse me than I can be to excuse myself. But, in good truth, I am too frequently guilty of the abominable vice. How should such a creature be admitted into those pure and sinless mansions were nothing shall enter that defileth; did not the blood of Christ, applied by faith, take away the guilt of sin, and leave no spot or stain behind it! O what continual need have I of an almighty, all-sufficient Saviour! I am glad you are acquainted so particularly with all the circumstances of my story, for I know that your secrecy and discretion may be trusted with anything. A thread of mercy ran through all the intricate maze of those afflictive providences, so mysterious to myself at the time, and which must ever remain so to all who will not see what was the great design of them; at the judgment-seat of Christ the whole shall be laid open. How is the rod of iron changed into a sceptre of love!"

"I have so much cause for humility, and so much need of it too, and every little sneaking resentment is such an enemy to it, that I hope I shall never give quarter to anything that appears in the shape of sullenness or self-consequence hereafter. Alas! if my best friend, who laid down his life for me, were to remember all the instances in which I have neglected him, and to plead them against me in judgment, where should I hide my guilty head in the day of recompense? I will pray therefore for blessings upon my friends though they cease to be so, and upon my enemies, though they continue such."

Cowper had now been an inmate with the Unwin family a little more than eighteen months; and the above extracts, taken from his confidential letters, describe the happy frame of his mind, and the great progress he made in divine knowledge, during this period. Living in the enjoyment of the divine presence himself, and associated with those who experienced the same invaluable privilege, he tranquilly pursued the even tenor of his Christian course with undiverted attention, and with holy zeal; nor did there appear the slightest reason to suppose that any alteration was likely to take place in his circumstances, or in the circumstances of the family. He might fairly have calculated upon the uninterrupted continuance, for many years, of the same distinguished privileges; but the dispensations of Divine Providence are sometimes awfully mysterious. Events unforeseen, and unexpected, are often occurring, which give a bias to our affairs quite different to any that we had ever conceived. Such was the melancholy occurrence which happened in this family, about this time, and which, at no distant period, led to Cowper's removal from Huntingdon.

Mr. Unwin, proceeding to his church, one Sunday morning in July, 1767, was flung from his horse, and received a dreadful fracture on the back part of his skull, under which he languished till the following Thursday, and then died. Cowper, in relating this melancholy event to his cousin, remarks:—"This awful dispensation has left an impression upon our spirits which will not presently be worn off. May it be a lesson to us to watch, since we know not the day, nor the hour, when our Lord cometh. At nine o'clock last Sunday morning Mr. Unwin was in perfect health, and as likely to live twenty years as either of us, and by the following Thursday he was a corpse. The few short intervals of sense that were indulged him, he spent in earnest prayer, and in expressions of a firm trust and confidence in the only Saviour. To that strong hold we must resort at last, if we would hope in death; when every other refuge fails, we are glad to fly to the only shelter to which we can repair to any purpose; and happy is it for us, when the false ground we have chosen for ourselves, breaks under us, and we find ourselves obliged to have recourse to that Rock which can never be shaken; when this is our lot, we receive great and undeserved mercy."

"The effect of this very distressing event will only be a change of my abode; for I shall still, by God's leave, continue with Mrs. Unwin, whose behaviour to me has always been that of a mother to a son. We know not yet where we shall settle, but we trust that the Lord, whom we seek, will go before us, and prepare a rest for us. We have employed our friends, Mr. Hawes, Dr. Conyers, and Mr. Newton, to look out a place for us, but at present are entirely ignorant under which of the three we shall settle, or whether under any one of them."

Just after this melancholy event had occurred, and while the family were in the midst of their distress, Mr. Newton, then curate of Olney, while on his way home from Cambridge, providentially called upon Mrs. Unwin. The late Dr. Conyers had learned from Mrs. Unwin's son, the change that had taken place in her mind, on the subject of religion; and he accordingly requested Mr. Newton to embrace the earliest opportunity of having some conversation with her on the subject. His visit could not possibly have been made at a more seasonable juncture. Mrs. Unwin was now almost overwhelmed with sorrow; and though the strength of her Christian principles, preserved her from losing that confidence in the Almighty, which can alone support the mind under such distressing circumstances, yet, both she and Mr.

Cowper, stood in need of some judicious Christian friend, to administer to them the consolations of the gospel. Their Heavenly Father could not have sent them one more capable of binding up their wounds, and soothing their sorrow, than Mr. Newton. He knew when, instrumentally, to pour the oil of consolation into their wounded spirits; and his providential visit, proved as useful as it was seasonable. He invited them to fix their future abode at Olney, whither they repaired, in the following October, to a house he had provided for them, so near the vicarage in which he lived, that by opening a door in the garden wall, they could exchange mutual visits, without entering the street. Mrs. Unwin kept the house, and Cowper continued to board with her, as he had done during her husband's life.

CHAPTER VI.

Commencement of Cowper's intimacy with Mr. Newton—Pleasure it afforded him—His charitable disposition—Means provided for its indulgence, by the munificence of the late J. Thornton, Esq.—Mr. Thornton's death—Cowper's poetic tribute to his memory—Remarks on the insufficiency of earthly objects to afford peace to the mind—His great anxiety for the spiritual welfare of his correspondents—Consolatory remarks addressed to his cousin—Severe affliction of his brother—Cowper's great concern on his behalf—Happy change that takes place in his brother's sentiments on religious subjects—His death—Cowper's reflections on it—Deep impression it made upon his mind—Description of his brother's character—Engages with Mr. Newton to write the Olney Hymns—Marriage of Mr. Unwin's son and daughter—Cowper's severe indisposition.

Great as were the advantages enjoyed by Cowper, while inmated with the Unwin family at Huntingdon, they were not to be compared with those which he experienced in his new situation at Olney. He spent his time nearly in the same manner as at Huntingdon, having the additional advantage of frequent religious intercourse with his friend, Mr. Newton, with whom he was now upon terms of the closest intimacy. The amiable manners, and exemplary piety of Cowper, greatly endeared him to all with whom he was acquainted. He gladly availed himself of the benefits of religious conversation with the pious persons in Mr. Newton's congregation, and was particularly attentive to those among them, who were in circumstances of poverty. He regularly visited the sick, and, to the utmost extent of his power, afforded them relief. He attended the social meetings for prayer established by Mr. Newton; and at such seasons, when he was occasionally required to conduct the service, agitated as were his feelings before he commenced, he no sooner began, than he poured forth his heart unto God in earnest intercession, with a devotion equally simple, sublime, and fervent, affording to all who were present on these occasions proofs of the unusual combination of elevated genius, exquisite sensibility, and profound piety, by which he was pre-eminently distinguished. His conduct in private was consistent with the solemnity and fervor of these social devotional engagements. Three times a day he prayed, and gave thanks unto God, in retirement, besides the regular practice of domestic worship. His familiar acquaintance with, and experimental knowledge of the gospel, relieved him from all terror and anxiety of the mind; his soul was stayed upon God; the divine promise and faithfulness were his support; and he lived in the enjoyment of perfect peace.

His hymns, most of which were composed at this period, prove that he was no stranger to those corrupt dispositions, which the best of men have to bewail, and which have so strong a tendency to draw away the mind from God. Against these dispositions, however, he was constantly upon the watch, and by the cultivation of devotional habits, with the gracious aid of the Divine Spirit, he suppressed every irregular desire, restrained every corrupt inclination, and ultimately came off successful in his spiritual warfare.

The first few years of his residence at Olney, may, perhaps, be regarded as the happiest of his life. Associated intimately with his beloved friend, Mr. Newton, and availing himself of his valuable assistance, in his efforts to acquire divine knowledge, his heart became established in the truth, and he experienced that degree of confidence in God, which alone can insure peace of mind, and real tranquillity. Aware of the pleasure which he took in visiting the poor, in his neighbourhood, and contributing to their relief, Mr. Newton procured for him, a liberal annual allowance of cash, for the purpose of distribution, from the late excellent John Thornton, Esq. It is almost needless to add, that becoming the almoner of this distinguished philanthropist, was to Cowper a source of the greatest enjoyment. No individual was ever more alive to the cry of distress; he seemed, indeed, to possess almost an excess of this amiable sensibility. Nothing gladdened his heart more than to be the means of drying up the widow's tears, and assuaging the orphan's grief; which the liberality of this great philanthropist allowed him often to accomplish. The decease of Mr. Thornton took place in 1790, and Cowper has immortalized his memory, by the following beautiful and sublime eulogy:—

"Thee, Thornton, worthy in some page to shine
As honest, and more eloquent than mine,
I mourn; or, since thrice happy thou must be,
The world, no longer thy abode, not thee:
Thee to deplore were grief mis-spent indeed;
It were to weep, that goodness has its meed,
That there is bliss prepared in yonder sky,
And glory for the virtuous when they die.

What pleasure can the miser's fondled hoard,
Or spendthrift's prodigal excess afford,
Sweet as the privilege of healing woe,
Suffered by virtue, combating below.
That privilege was thine; Heaven gave thee means
To illumine with delight the saddest scenes,
Till thy appearance chased the gloom, forlorn
As midnight, and despairing of a morn.
Thou had'st an industry in doing good,
Restless as his who toils and sweats for food;
Avarice in thee was the desire of wealth,
By rust unperishable, or by stealth;
And if the genuine worth of gold depend
On application to its noblest end,
Thine had a value in the scales of Heaven,
Surpassing all that mine or mint has given;
And though God made thee of a nature prone
To distribution, boundless, of thy own.
And still, by motives of religious force,
Impelled thee more to that heroic course,
Yet was thy liberality discreet,
Nice in its choice, and of a temperate heat;
And, though an act unwearied, secret still
As, in some solitude, the summer rill
Refreshes, where it winds, the faded green,
And cheers the drooping flowers, unheard, unseen.
Such was thy charity; no sudden start,
After long sleep, of passion in the heart;
But stedfast principle, and in its kind
Of close alliance with the eternal mind,
Traced easily to its true source above,
To Him whose works bespeak his nature, love.
Thy bounties all were Christian, and I make
This record of thee for the gospel's sake,
That the incredulous themselves may see
Its use and power exemplified in thee."

Owing to some cause, for which we are unable to account, Cowper's correspondence with his friends became much less frequent after his settlement at Olney, than it had been formerly: probably it might be attributed, in some degree at least, to his close intimacy with Mr. Newton, for they were seldom seven waking hours, apart from each other. The same vein of genuine and unaffected piety, however, runs through those letters which he did write, and they abound with remarks of uncommon excellence. To his cousin, Mrs. Cowper, he thus expresses his feelings:—"You live in the centre of a world, I know you do not delight in. Happy are you, my dear friend, in being able to discern the insufficiency of all it can afford, to fill and satisfy the desires of an immortal soul. That God, who created us for the enjoyment of himself, has determined in mercy that it shall fail us here, in order that the blessed result of all our inquiries after happiness in the creature, may be a warm pursuit, and a close attachment to our true interests, in fellowship with him, through the mediation of our dear Redeemer. I bless his goodness, and his grace, that I have any reason to hope I am a partaker with you in the desire after better things, than are to be found in a world polluted by sin, and therefore, devoted to destruction. May he enable us both to consider our present life in its only true light, as an opportunity put into our hands to glorify him amongst men, by a conduct suited to his word and will. I am miserably defective in this holy and blessed art, but I hope there is, at the bottom of all my sinful infirmities, a desire to live just so long as I may be enabled to answer, in some measure, at least, the end of my existence, in this respect; and then to obey the summons, and attend him in a world, where they who are his servants here, shall pay him an unsinful obedience for ever."

The lively interest which Cowper took, in the spiritual welfare of his correspondents, will appear in the following letter to his esteemed friend, Joseph Hill, Esq., dated 21st January, 1769:—"Dear Joe: I rejoice with you in your recovery, and that you have escaped from the hands of one, from whose hands you will not always escape. Death is either the most formidable, or most comfortable thing, we have in prospect, on this side of eternity. To be brought near to him, and to discern neither of these features in his face, would argue a degree of insensibility, of which I will not suspect my friend, whom I know to be a thinking man. You have been brought down to the sides of the grave, and you have been raised up again by him, who has the keys of the invisible world; who opens, and none can shut, who shuts and none can open. I do not forget to return thanks to him on your behalf, and to pray that your life, which he has spared, may be devoted to his service. 'Behold! I stand at the door, and knock,' is the word of him, in whom both our mortal and immortal life depend, and blessed be his name; it is the word of one who wounds only that he may heal, and who waits to be gracious. The language of every such dispensation is, 'Prepare to meet thy God.' It speaks with the voice of mercy and goodness, for without such notices, whatever preparation we might make for other events, we should make none for this. My dear friend, I desire and pray, that when this last enemy shall come to execute an unlimited commission on us, we may be found ready, being established and rooted in a well-grounded faith in his name who conquered death, and triumphed over him on the cross. If I am ever enabled to look forward to death with comfort, which I thank God is sometimes the case, I do not take my view of it from the top of my own works and deservings, though God is witness, that the labour of my life is to keep a conscience void of offence towards him. Death is always formidable to me, but when I see him disarmed of his sting by having it sheathed in the body of Christ Jesus."

To the same friend, on another occasion, he thus writes:—"I take a friend's share in all your concerns, so far as they come to my knowledge, and consequently, did not receive the news of your marriage with indifference. I wish you and your bride all the happiness that belongs to the state; and the still greater felicity of that state, which marriage is only a type of. All those connections shall be dissolved; but there is an indissoluble bond between Christ and his church, the subject of derision to an unthinking world, but the glory and happiness of all his people."

No one knew better how to administer consolation to those who were in distress, and certainly no one ever took a greater delight in doing it than Cowper. To his amiable cousin, Mrs. Cowper, who had been called to sustain a severe domestic affliction, he writes as follows:—"A letter from your brother, brought me yesterday, the most afflicting intelligence that has reached me these many years. I pray God to comfort you, and to enable you to sustain this heavy stroke with that resignation to his will, which none but himself can give, and which he gives to none but his own children. How blessed and happy is your lot, my dear friend, beyond the lot of the greater part of mankind: that you know what it is to draw near to God in prayer, and are acquainted with a throne of grace! You have resources in the infinite love of a dear Redeemer, which are withheld from millions: and the promises of God, which are, yea and amen in Christ Jesus, are sufficient to answer all your necessities, and to sweeten the bitterest cup which your Heavenly Father will ever put into your hand. May he now give you liberty to drink at these wells of salvation till you are filled with consolation and peace, in the midst of trouble. He has said, When thou passest through the fire, I will be with thee, and when through the floods, they shall not overflow thee. You have need of such a word as this, and he knows your need of it; and the time of necessity is the time when he will be sure to appear in behalf of those who trust in him. I bear you and yours upon my heart before him, night and day. For I never expect to hear of distress, which shall call upon me with a louder voice to pray for the sufferer. I know the Lord hears me for myself, vile and sinful as I am, and believe, and am sure, that he will hear me for you also. He is the friend of the widow, and the father of the fatherless, even God in his holy habitation; in all our afflictions he is afflicted; and when he chastens us, it is in mercy. Surely he will sanctify this dispensation to you, do you great and everlasting good by it, make the world appear like dust and vanity in your sight, as it truly is, and open to your view the glories of a better country, where there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor pain; but God shall wipe away all tears from your eyes for ever. O that comfortable word! 'I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction;' so that our very sorrows are evidences of our calling, and he chastens us because we are his children. My dear cousin, I commit you to the word of his grace, and to the comforts of his Holy Spirit. Your life is needful for your family; may God, in mercy to them, prolong it, and may he preserve you from the dangerous effects which a stroke like this might have upon a frame so tender as yours. I grieve for you, I pray for you, could I do more I would, but God must comfort you."

Cowper had scarcely forwarded this consolatory and truly Christian letter, when he was himself visited with a trial so severe as to call into exercise all that confidence in the Almighty which he had endeavoured to excite in the mind of his amiable relative. He received a letter from his brother, then residing as a Fellow in Bene't College, Cambridge, between whom and himself there had always existed an affection truly fraternal, stating that he was seriously indisposed. No brothers were ever more warmly interested in each other's welfare. At the commencement of Cowper's affliction, which led to his removal to St. Albans, his brother had watched over him with the tenderest solicitude; and it was doubtless owing, in a great degree, to this tenderness, that Cowper was placed under the care of Dr. Cotton. While he remained at St. Albans, his brother visited him, and, as has been related above, became the means of contributing materially to his recovery. On Cowper's removal to Huntingdon, these affectionate brothers adopted a plan for a frequent and regular interchange of visits, so that they were seldom many days without seeing each other, though the distance between their places of abode was fifteen miles; and, even after Cowper's removal to Olney, his brother, during the first two years, paid him several visits; they seemed, indeed, mutually delighted with an opportunity of being in each other's company.

Cowper, on hearing of his brother's illness, immediately repaired to Cambridge. To his inexpressible grief he found him in a condition that left little or no hopes of his recovery. In a letter to Mrs. Cowper, he thus describes his case:—"My brother continues much as he was. His case is a very dangerous one—an imposthume of the liver, attended by an asthma, and dropsy. The physician has little hopes of his recovery; indeed, I might say none at all, only, being a friend, he does not formally give him over by ceasing to visit him, lest it should sink his spirits. For my own part, I have no expectation of it, except by a signal interposition of Providence in answer to prayer. His case is clearly out of the reach of medicine, but I have seen many a sickness healed, where the danger has been equally threatening, by the only Physician of value. I doubt not he will have an interest in your prayers, as he has in the prayers of many. May the Lord incline his ear, and give an answer of peace. I know it is good to be afflicted; I trust you have found it so, and that under the teaching of the spirit of God, we shall both be purified. It is the desire of my soul to seek a better country, where God shall wipe away all tears from the eyes of his people, and where, looking back upon the ways by which he has led us, we shall be filled with everlasting wonder, love, and praise."

Finding his brother on the verge of the grave, Cowper discovered the greatest anxiety respecting his everlasting welfare. He knew that his sentiments on some of the most important truths of religion had been long unsettled; and fully aware that while such was the case, he could experience no solid enjoyment in the present life, whatever might be his condition in future, he laboured diligently to give him those views of the gospel, which he had himself found, so singularly beneficial; nor did he labour in vain. He had the unspeakable gratification to witness the complete triumph of the truth, and its consolatory influence upon the mind of his beloved brother, in his dying moments. Writing to Mr. Hill, he says:—"It pleased God to cut short my brother's connections and expectations here, yet, not without giving him lively and glorious views, of a better happiness, than any he could propose to himself in such a world as this. Notwithstanding his great learning, (for he was one of the chief men in the university in that respect,) he was candid and sincere in his inquiries after truth. Though he could not agree to my sentiments when I first acquainted him with them, nor in many conversations, which I afterwards had with him upon the subject, could he be brought to acquiesce in them as scriptural and true, yet I had no sooner left St. Albans, than he began to study with the deepest attention those points on which we differed, and to furnish himself with the best writers upon them. His mind was kept open to conviction for five years, during all which time he laboured in this pursuit with unwearied diligence, whilst leisure and opportunity were afforded. Amongst his dying words were these:—'Brother, I thought you wrong, yet wanted to believe as you did. I found myself not able to believe, yet always thought I should be one day brought to do so.' From the study of books he was brought, upon his death-bed, to the study of himself, and there learnt to renounce his righteousness, and his own most amiable character, and to submit himself to the righteousness which is of God by faith. With these views, he was desirous of death: satisfied of his interest in the blessing purchased by the blood of Christ, he prayed for death with earnestness, felt the approaches of it with joy, and died in peace."

It afforded Cowper inexpressible delight, to witness, in his brother's case, the consoling and animating power of those principles, which he had himself found to be so highly beneficial. This had been the object of his most anxious solicitude, from the period that God was pleased to visit him with the consolations of his grace. From that time he took occasion to declare to his brother what God had done for his soul; and neglected no opportunity of attempting to engage him in conversation of a spiritual kind. On his first visit to him at Cambridge, after he left St. Albans, his heart being then full of the subject, he poured it out to his brother without reserve, taking care to show him, that what he had received was not merely a new set of notions, but a real impression of the truths of the gospel. His brother listened to his statements at first with some attention, and often laboured to convince him, that the difference in their sentiments was much less real than verbal. Subsequently, however, he became more reserved; and though he heard patiently, he never replied, nor ever discovered a desire to converse on the subject. At the commencement of his affliction, little as was the concern he then felt for his spiritual interests, the thoughts of God, and of eternity, would sometimes force themselves upon his mind; at every little prospect of recovery, however, he found it no difficult matter to thrust them out again. It was evident that his mind was very far from being set on things spiritual and heavenly, as on almost every subject, but that of religion, he could converse fluently. At every suitable opportunity Cowper endeavoured to give a serious turn to the discourse, but without any apparent success. Having obtained his permission, he prayed with him frequently; still, however, he seemed as careless and unconcerned as ever.

On one occasion, after his brother had, with much difficulty, survived a severe paroxysm of his disorder, he observed to him as he sat by his bed-side, "that, though it had pleased God to visit him with great afflictions, yet mercy was mingled with the dispensation. You have many friends that love you, and are willing to do all they can to serve you, and so, perhaps, have many others in the like circumstances; but it is not the lot of every sick man, how much soever he may be beloved, to have a friend that can pray for him." He replied, "That is true; and I hope God will have mercy upon me." His love to Cowper, from that time, became very remarkable; there was a tenderness in it more than was merely natural; and he generally expressed it by calling for blessings upon him in the most affectionate terms, and with a look and manner not to be described. One afternoon, a few days before he died, he suddenly burst into tears, and said, with a loud cry, "O forsake me not!" Cowper went to the bed-side, grasped his hand, and tenderly inquired why he wished him to remain. "O, brother," said he, "I am full of what I could say to you; if I live, you and I shall be more like one another than we have been; but, whether I live, or not, all is well, and will be so; I know it well; I have felt that which I never felt before; and am sure that God has visited me with this sickness, to teach me that I was too proud to learn in health. I never had satisfaction till now, having no ground to rest my hopes upon; but now I have a foundation which nothing can shake. I have peace in myself; and if I live, I hope it will be that I might be a messenger of peace to others. I have learned that in a moment, which I could not have learned by reading many books for many years. The light I have received comes late, but not too late, and it is a comfort to me that I never made the gospel-truths a subject of ridicule. This bed would be to me a bed of misery, and it is so; but it is likewise a bed of joy, and a bed of discipline. Was I to die this night, I know I should be happy. This assurance, I hope, is quite consistent with the word of God. It is built upon a sense of my own utter insufficiency, and all-sufficiency of Christ. There is but one key to the New Testament; there is but one interpreter. I cannot describe to you, nor shall I ever be able to describe to you, what I felt when this was given to me. May I make a good use of it! How I shudder when I think of the danger I have just escaped! How wonderful is it that God should look upon me! Yet he sees me, and takes notice of all that I suffer. I see him too, and can hear him say, Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you peace." He survived this change only a few days, and died happily, rejoicing in hope of the glory of God.

An event like this, could not fail to make a deep impression upon the tender spirit of Cowper, and his feelings on the occasion, were such as are not experienced by ordinary minds. The following letter to his amiable cousin shows clearly the state of his mind:—"You judge rightly of the manner in which I have been affected by the Lord's late dispensation towards my brother. I found it a cause of sorrow that I lost so near a relation, and one so deservedly dear to me, and that he left me just when our sentiments upon the most interesting subject became the same. But it was also a cause of joy, that it pleased God to give me a clear and evident proof that he had changed his heart, and adopted him into the number of his children. For this I hold myself peculiarly bound to thank him, because he might have done all that he was pleased to do for him, and yet have afforded him neither strength nor opportunity to declare it. He told me, that from the time he was first ordained, he began to be dissatisfied with his religious opinions, and to suspect that there were greater things revealed in the Bible, than were generally believed or allowed to be there. From the time when I first visited him, after my release from St. Albans, he began to read upon the subject. It was at that time I informed him of the views of divine truth, which I had received in that school of affliction. He laid what I said to heart, and began to furnish himself with the best writers on the controverted points, whose works he read with great diligence and attention, carefully comparing them with the Scriptures. None ever truly and ingenuously sought the truth, but they found it. A spirit of earnest inquiry is the gift of God, who never says to any, Seek ye my face, in vain. Accordingly, about ten days before his death, it pleased the Lord to dispel all his doubts, to reveal in his heart the knowledge of the Saviour, and to give him that firm and unshaken confidence in the ability and willingness of Christ to save sinners, which is invariably followed by a joy that is unspeakable and full of glory."

Of the character of his much beloved brother, whose death filled him with mingled emotions of joy and grief, Cowper has given the following interesting description:—"He was a man of a most candid and ingenuous spirit; his temper remarkably sweet, and in his behaviour to me he had always manifested an uncommon affection. His outward conduct, so far as it fell under my notice, or I could learn it by the report of others, was perfectly decent and unblamable. There was nothing vicious in any part of his practice, but being of a studious, thoughtful turn, he placed his chief delight in the acquisition of learning, and made such progress in it, that he had but few rivals. He was critically skilled in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages; was beginning to make himself master of the Syriac, and perfectly understood the French and Italian, the latter of which he could speak fluently. Learned, however, as he was, he was easy and cheerful in his conversation, and entirely free from the stiffness which is generally contracted by men devoted to such pursuits."

. . . "I had a brother once;
Peace to the memory of a man of worth!
A man of letters and of manners too!
Of manners, sweet, as virtue always wears,
When gay good humour dresses her in smiles!
He grac'd a college, in which order yet
Was sacred, and was honoured, lov'd, and wept
By more than one, themselves conspicuous there."

Notwithstanding the cheerfulness with which Cowper bore up under this painful bereavement, when it first occurred, owing to the happy circumstances related above, with which it was attended, yet there is reason to believe that it made an impression upon his peculiarly sensitive mind, more deep than visible; and that was not soon to be effaced. It unquestionably diminished his attachment to the world, and made him less unwilling to leave it. Writing to his friend, Mr. Hill, at this time, he says:—"I have not done conversing with terrestrial objects, though I should be happy were I able to hold more continual converse with a friend above the skies. He has my heart, but he allows a corner of it for all who show me kindness, and therefore one for you. The storm of 1763, made a wreck of the friendships I had contracted, in the course of many years, yours only excepted, which has survived the tempest."

It appears not improbable that his friend, Mr. Newton, might have witnessed, in the morbid tendency of his mind to melancholy, of which he then discovered symptoms, some traces of the deep and extensive wound which his mind had received by this event, though his efforts to conceal it were incessant. Hence, he wisely engaged him in a literary undertaking, congenial to his taste, suited to his admirable talents, and, perhaps, more adapted to alleviate his distress than any other that could have been selected. Mr. Newton had felt the want of a volume of evangelical hymns, on experimental subjects, suited for public and private worship; he mentioned the subject to Cowper, and pressed him to undertake it, and the result was, a friendly compact to supply the volume between them, with an understanding that Cowper was to be the principal composer. He entered upon this work with great pleasure; and though he does not appear previous to this, to have employed his poetical talents for a considerable time, yet the admirable hymns he composed, show with what ease he could write upon the doctrinal, experimental, or practical parts of Christianity. One of our best living poets, whose writings more frequently remind us of Cowper's than any we have ever read, in an essay on the poet's productions, remarks:—"Of these hymns, it must suffice to say, that, like all his best compositions, they are principally communings with his own heart, or avowals of personal Christian experience. As such they are frequently applicable to every believer's feelings, and touch, unexpectedly, the most secret springs of joy and sorrow, faith, fear, hope, love, trial, despondency, and triumph. Some allude to infirmities, the most difficult to be described, but often the source of excruciating anguish to the tender conscience. The 72d hymn, Book I. is written with the confidence of inspiration, and the authority of a prophet. The 96th hymn, of the same book, is a perfect allegory in miniature, without a failing point, or confusion of metaphor, from beginning to end. Hymn 51, Book III. presents a transformation, which, if found in Ovid, might have been extolled as the happiest of his fictions. Hymn 12, Book II. closes with one of the hardiest figures to be met with out of the Hebrew Scriptures. None but a poet of the highest order could have written it; verses cannot go beyond it, and painting cannot approach it. Hymn 38, Book II. is a strain of noble simplicity, expressive of confidence the most remote from presumption, and such as a heart at peace with God alone could enjoy and utter. Who can read the 55th hymn, Book II. without feeling as if he could, at that moment, forsake all, take up his cross, and follow his Saviour? The 19th Hymn, Book III. is a model of tender pleading, of believing, persevering prayer in trouble; and the following one is a brief parody of Bunyan's finest passage, and is admirable of its kind. The reader might almost imagine himself Christian on his pilgrimage, the triumph and the trance are brought so home to his bosom. Hymn 15, of the same book, is a lyric of high tone and character, and rendered awfully interesting, by the circumstances under which it was written—in the twilight of departing reason."*

The benevolent heart of Cowper was delighted in a high degree to co-operate with a man of Mr. Newton's talents and piety, in promoting the advancement of religion in his neighbourhood. It is deeply to be regretted, that when he had only composed sixty-eight hymns, all of which were uncommonly excellent, and were afterwards published by Mr. Newton in the Olney Collection, he was laid aside from the interesting employment by serious indisposition. It pleased God, for reasons inscrutable to us, and which it would be impious to arraign, to visit the afflicted poet, with a renewed attack of his former hypochondriacal complaint, more protracted, and not less violent, than the one he had before experienced. Just on the eve of the attack he commenced the following sublime hymn:—

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

Deep in unfathomable mines
Of never failing skill
He treasures up his bright designs,
And works his sovereign will.

Ye fearful saints, fresh courage take!
The clouds ye so much dread
Are big with mercy, and shall break
In blessings on your head.

Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust him for his grace;
Behind a frowning providence
He hides a smiling face.

His purposes all ripen fast,
Unfolding every hour;
The bud may have a bitter taste,
But sweet will be the flower.

Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan His work in vain;
God is his own interpreter,
And he will make it plain."

CHAPTER VII.

Great severity of Cowper's mental depression—His presentiment of it—Its consequences—Remarks upon its probable cause—Absurdity of attributing it, in any degree, to religion—Mrs. Unwin's great attention to him—His aversion to the company of strangers—Symptoms of his recovery—Domesticates three leverets—Amusement they afford him—Mr. Newton's removal from Olney—Introduction of Mr. Bull to Cowper—His translation of Madame de la Guyon's poems, at Mr. Bull's request—Commences his original productions, at the suggestion of Mrs. Unwin—Renews his correspondence with Mr. and Mrs. Newton—Describes the state of his mind.

We are again arrived at another of those melancholy periods of Cowper's life, over which it must be alike the duty of the biographer, and the wish of the reader, to cast a veil. Mental aberration, whoever may be the subject of it, excites the tenderest commisseration of all; but if there be a time when it may be contemplated with emotions more truly distressing than another, it is when it attacks those who are endowed with talents the most brilliant, with dispositions the most amiable, and with piety the most ardent and unobtrusive. Such was eminently the case in the present instance. To see a mind like Cowper's, enveloped in the thickest gloom of despondency, and for several years, in the prime of life, remaining in a state of complete inactivity and misery, must have been distressing in no ordinary degree.

A short time previous to the afflictive visitation, Cowper appears to have received some presentiment of its approach, and during a solitary walk in the fields, as was hinted above, he composed that beautiful hymn in the Olney collection with which we closed our last chapter. On this occasion, acute as may have been his feelings, he must have experienced an unshaken confidence in God; for it is scarcely possible to read this admirable production, however dark and distressing the dispensations of Divine Providence towards us may be, without enjoying the same delightful emotions. About the same time, he composed the hymn, entitled 'Temptation,' the following lines from which will show how powerfully his mind was then exercised.

"The billows swell, the winds are high,
Clouds overcast my wintry sky;
Out of the depths to thee I call,
My fears are great, my strength is small.

O Lord, the pilot's part perform,
And guide and guard me through the storm;
Defend me from each threatening ill,
Control the waves, say 'Peace, be still.'

Amidst the roaring of the sea,
My soul still hangs her hope on thee;
Thy constant love, thy faithful care,
Is all that saves me from despair."

* Essay on Cowper's Productions, by James Montgomery.

He now relapsed into a state, very much resembling that which had previously occasioned his removal to St. Albans. This second attack occurred in 1773; he remained in the same painful and melancholy condition, without even a single alleviation of his sufferings, for the protracted period of five years; and it was five years more, before he wholly recovered the use of his admirable powers. His mind, which could formerly soar on the wings of faith and love, to the utmost limits of Christian knowledge and enjoyment, now sunk into the lowest depths of depression; and here seemed as if it would remain immovably fixed: rejecting, with deplorable firmness, every species of consolation that was attempted to be administered.

Various causes have been assigned, by different writers, for the melancholy aberration of mind of which Cowper was now, and at other seasons of his life, the subject; but none are so irreconcilable to everything like just and legitimate reasoning, as the attempt to ascribe it to religion. That unjust views of the character of God, and of the nature of the gospel, may never have been the predisposing causes of great and severe mental depression, we are not disposed to deny; though we think this a case of very rare occurrence, and one in which the subject of it must be in a state of great ignorance respecting the fundamental truths of religion. Ought this, however, when it does happen, to be identified with religion, of which, at the best, it can only be regarded as a mere caricature? There was evidently, in the case of Cowper, nothing that bore the slightest resemblance to this. Making some allowances for expressions occasionally employed by him peculiar to the system which he had embraced, perhaps it will not be saying too much to affirm, that no individual ever entertained more scriptural views of the gospel dispensation in all its parts, and of the perfections and attributes of its great Author, than this excellent man. The letters he wrote to his correspondents, and the hymns he composed, prior to this second attack, prove unquestionably that his views of religion were at the remotest distance from what can be termed visionary or enthusiastic: on the contrary, they were perfectly scriptural and evangelical, and were consequently, infinitely more adapted to support, than to depress his mind.

The living poet whom we have before quoted, remarks:—"With regard to Cowper's malady, there scarcely needs any other proof that it was not occasioned by his religion than this, that the error on which he stumbled was in direct contradiction to his creed. He believed that he had been predestinated to life, yet under his delusion imagined that God, who cannot lie, repent, or change, had, in his sole instance, and in one moment, reversed his own decree, which had been in force from all eternity. At the same time, by a perversion of the purest principles of Christian obedience, he was so submissive to what he erroneously supposed was the will of God, that, to have saved himself from the very destruction which he dreaded, he would not avail himself of any of the means of grace, even presuming they might have been efficacious, because he believed they were forbidden to him. Yet, in spite of the self-evident impossibility, of his faith, affecting a sound mind, with such a hallucination; though a mind previously diseased, might as readily fall into that as the other; in spite of chronology, his first aberration having taken place before he had 'tasted the good word of God;' in spite of geography, that calamity having befallen him in London, where he had no acquaintance with persons holding the reprobated doctrines of election and sovereign grace; and in spite of fact, utterly undeniable, that the only effectual consolations which he experienced under his first or subsequent attacks of depression, arose from the truths of the gospel;—in spite of all these unanswerable confutations of the ignorant and malignant falsehood, the enemies of Christian truth persevere in repeating, 'that too much religion made poor Cowper mad.' If they be sincere, they are themselves under the strongest delusion; and it will be well, if it prove not, on their part, a wilful one—it will be well, if they have not reached that last perversity of human reason, to believe a falsehood of their own invention."

The remarks of Mr. Hayley, in his admirable life of the poet, page 144, vol. 1. are, we think, liable to some objection. He says—"So fearfully and wonderfully are we made, that man in all conditions ought, perhaps, to pray that he never may be led to think of his Creator and of his Redeemer, either too little or too much, since human misery is often seen to arise equally, from an utter neglect of all spiritual concerns, and from a wild extravagance of devotion."

It is surely needless to observe, that the devotion of Cowper was as much unlike what could, with any degree of propriety, be termed wild or extravagant, as can well be imagined. To what description of devotion Mr. Hayley would apply these epithets we cannot tell, but surely not to that which is scripturally evangelical, which was eminently the character of Cowper's, and which is of a nature so heavenly and spiritual, so perfectly adapted to the circumstances of mankind, and withal so soothing and consoling, that it can never be carried to excess. The more powerfully its influence is felt upon the mind, the more extensive must be the enjoyment it produces, unless when it pleases God, as in the case of Cowper, to disorganize the mental powers, and thereby unfit it for the reception of that comfort which it would otherwise experience.

Mental disorganization may undoubtedly arise from an almost infinite variety of causes, many of which, as in the poet's case, must for ever elude our search, though they are all under the control of that God who is the giver of life and its preserver. Real religion, however, which consists in a cordial reception of the truth in the heart, can never produce it in the remotest degree: evangelical devotion cannot be too intense, nor can we know too much of our Creator and Redeemer. Contemplating the Divine Being apart from the gospel of Christ, or through the distorting medium of our own fancies, may possibly, in some cases, produce depression, viewing him as he is presented to our minds in the scriptures, in all the plenitude of his goodness and benevolence, is sure to be productive of consequences directly opposite. Instead of there being any danger likely to arise from having our thoughts too much employed upon the character of God, we think a scripturally comprehensive view of his perfections the best possible preservative from despair. To represent an excess of devotion as the cause of Cowper's malady, in however slight a degree, is obviously opposed to every consistent view of religion, and is assigning that for its cause which was infinitely more likely to become its only effectual cure.

The melancholy condition to which Cowper was now reduced, afforded Mrs. Unwin an opportunity of proving the warmth of her affection for, and the sincerity of her attachment to, the dejected poet. He now required to be watched with the greatest care, vigilance, and perseverance; and it pleased God to endow her with all that tenderness, fortitude, and firmness of mind, which were requisite for the proper discharge of duties so important. Her incessant care over him, during the long fit of his depressive malady, could only be equalled by the pleasure she experienced, on seeing his pure and powerful mind, gradually emerge from that awful state of darkness, in which it had been enveloped, into the clear sunshine of liberty and peace: she hailed his approach to convalescence, slowly as it advanced, with the mingled emotions of gratitude and praise.

Cowper, throughout the whole of this severe attack, was inaccessible to all, except his friend Mr. Newton, who, during the whole of its continuance, watched over him with the greatest tenderness, and was indefatigable in his efforts to administer consolation to his depressed spirit. He once entertained him fourteen months at the vicarage, and, with untired perseverance, laboured incessantly to dissipate the dark cloud that had gathered over his mind; but to every consolatory suggestion he was utterly deaf, concluding that God had rejected him, and that, consequently, it was sinful for him even to wish for mercy. How awful are the effects of mental disorganization! how easily does it convert that into poison which was designed for solid food! how highly ought we to prize, and how thankful ought we to be, for the uninterrupted enjoyment of our mental powers!

After enduring an accumulation of anguish, almost inconceivable, for the long space of five years, unalleviated by a single glimpse of comfort, the interesting sufferer began at length gradually to recover. He listened to the advice of Mrs. Unwin, and allowed her, occasionally at least, to divert his mind from those melancholy considerations by which he had so long been burdened. It now occurred to Mrs. Unwin, that he might probably find it beneficial to be employed in some amusing occupation. She suggested this to some of her neighbours, who all deplored the poet's case, felt a lively interest in his welfare, and would gladly have done anything in their power, that was the least likely to mitigate his distress.

The children of one of his neighbours had recently given them, for a plaything, a young leveret; it was at that time about three months old. Understanding better how to teaze the poor creature than to feed it, and soon becoming weary of their charge, they readily consented that their father, who saw it pining, and growing leaner every day, should offer it to Cowper's acceptance. Beginning then to be glad of any thing that would engage his attention without fatiguing it, he was willing enough to take the prisoner under his protection, perceiving that, in the management of such an animal, and in the attempt to tame it, he should find just that sort of employment which his case required. It was soon known among his neighbours that he was pleased with the present; and the consequence was, that in a short time, he had as many leverets offered him, as would have stocked a paddock. He undertook the care of three, which he named Puss, Tiney, and Bess. The choice of their food, and the diversity of their dispositions, afforded him considerable amusement, and their occasional diseases excited his sympathy and tenderness. One remained with him during the whole of his abode at Olney, and was afterwards celebrated in his unrivalled poem, the Task; and at its decease, honoured with a beautiful epitaph from his pen; another lived with him nearly nine years: but the third did not long survive the restraints of its confined situation. An admirably written narrative of these animals, from his own pen, was inserted in the Gentleman's Magazine of that day, which has since been published at the end of almost every edition of his works.

For a considerable period, Cowper's only companions were Mrs. Unwin, Mr. and Mrs. Newton, and his three hares. About this time, it pleased God to remove Mr. Newton, to another scene of labour. Deeply interested in the welfare of his afflicted friend, and aware of his aversion to the visits of strangers, Mr. Newton thought it advisable, before he left Olney, to introduce to his interesting but most afflicted friend, the Rev. Mr. Bull, of Newport Pagnel. After some difficulty, Mr. Newton triumphed over Cowper's extreme reluctance to see strangers, and Mr. Bull visited him regularly once a fortnight, and gradually acquired his cordial and confidential esteem.

Of this gentleman, Cowper, in one of his letters, gives the following playful and amusing description :—"You are not acquainted with the Rev. Mr. Bull, of Newport—perhaps it is as well for you that you are not. You would regret still more than you do, that there are so many miles interposed between us. He spends part of the day with us tomorrow. A dissenter, but a liberal one; a man of letters and of genius; master of a fine imagination, or rather not master of it; an imagination which, when he finds himself in the company he loves, and can confide in, runs away with him into such fields of speculation, as amuse and enliven every other imagination that has the happiness to be of the party. At other times, he has a tender and delicate sort of melancholy in his disposition, not less agreeable in its way. No men are better qualified for companions in such a world as this, than men of such a temperament. Every scene of life has two sides, a dark and a bright one; and the mind that has an equal mixture of melancholy and vivacity, is best of all qualified for the contemplation of either. He can be lively without levity, and pensive without dejection. Such a man is Mr. Bull: but—he smokes tobacco—nothing is perfect."

Mr. Bull, who probably regarded the want of some regular employment as one of the predisposing causes of Cowper's illness, prevailed upon him to translate several spiritual songs, from the poetry of Madame de la Mothe Guyon, the friend of the mild and amiable Fenelon. The devotion of these songs is not of that purely unexceptionable character which might be wished; and if devotional excitement had been the cause of Cowper's malady, no recommendation could have been more injudicious. The result, however, was beneficial to the poet, instead of being injurious, proving irresistibly that devotion had a soothing, rather than an irritating effect upon his mind.

Much as Cowper admired these songs, for that rich vein of pure and exalted devotion, which runs through the whole of them, he was not insensible to their defects, as will appear by the following remarks :—"The French poetess is certainly chargable with the fault you mention, though I think it not so glaring in the piece sent you. I have endeavoured, indeed, in all the translations I have made, to cure her of the evil, either by the suppression of exceptionable passages, or by a more sober manner of expression. Still, however, she will be found to have conversed familiarly with God, but I hope not fulsomely, nor so as to give reasonable disgust to a religious reader. That God should deal familiarly with man, or, which is the same thing, that he should permit man to deal familiarly with him, seems not very difficult to conceive, or presumptuous to suppose, when some things are taken into consideration. Woe to the sinner, however, that shall dare to take a liberty with him that is not warranted by his word, or to which he himself has not encouraged him. When he assumed man's nature, he revealed himself as the friend of man. He conversed freely with him while he was upon earth, and as freely with him after his resurrection. I doubt not, therefore, that it is possible to enjoy an access to him even now, unincumbered with ceremonious awe, easy, delightful, and without constraint. This, however, can only be the lot of those who make it the business of their lives to please him, and to cultivate communion with him, and then I presume there can be no danger of offence, because such a habit of the soul is his own creation, and near as we come, we come no nearer to him than he is pleased to draw us: if we address him as children, it is because he tells us he is our Father; if we unbosom ourselves to him as our friend, it is because he calls us friends; if we speak to him in the language of love, it is because he first used it, thereby teaching us that it is the language he delights to hear from his people. But I confess, that through the weakness, the folly, and corruption of human nature, this privilege, like all other Christian privileges, is liable to abuse. There is a mixture of evil in everything we do; indulgence encourages us to encroach, and while we exercise the rights of children, we become childish. Here, I think, is the point in which my authoress failed, and here it is that I have particularly guarded my translation, not afraid of representing her as dealing with God familiarly but foolishly, irreverently, and without due attention to his majesty, of which she is somewhat guilty. A wonderful fault for such a woman to fall into, who spent her life in the contemplation of his glory, who seems to have been always impressed with a sense of it, and sometimes quite absorbed by the views she had of it."

Mrs. Unwin, who still watched over her patient with the tenderest anxiety, saw, with inexpressible delight, the first efforts of his mind, after his long and painful depression; and perceiving that translation had a good effect, she wisely urged him to employ his mind in composing some original poem, which she thought more likely to become beneficial. Cowper now listened to her advice, and felt so powerfully the obligations under which he was laid to her, for her continued attention and kindness, that he cheerfully complied with her request. The result exceeded her most sanguine expectation. A beautiful poem was produced, entitled Table Talk; another, called the Progress of Error, was shortly composed; Truth, as a pleasing contrast, followed it; this was succeeded by others of equal excellence, proving that the poet's mind had now completely emerged from that darkness in which it had so long been confined by his depressive malady.

It is interesting to observe, that Cowper's poems were almost invariably composed at the suggestion of friends. He wrote hymns, to oblige Mr. Newton; translated Madam Guyon's songs, to gratify his friend Mr. Bull, and composed the greater part of his poems, to please Mrs. Unwin. The influence of friendship on his tender mind, was powerfully affecting; and he ever regarded it as his happiest inspiration. It kindled the warmth of his heart, into a flame, intense and ardent, stimulated into activity the rich, but dormant powers of his mind, and produced those bursts of poetic feeling and beauty, which abound in his unrivalled compositions.

Cowper regained his admirable talent for composition, both in poetry and in prose, and renewed his correspondence with some of his more intimate friends, long before his mind was wholly convalescent; and his letters, written at this period, afford the best clue to the painful peculiarities of his case. On every other subject but that of his own feelings, his remarks are in the highest degree pleasing; and there was often a sprightliness and vivacity about them, that seemed to indicate a state of mind at the remotest distance from painful; but whenever he adverted to his own case, it was in a tone the most plaintive and melancholy.

Immediately after the removal of his esteemed friends, Mr. and Mrs. Newton, he commenced a correspondence with them, which he regularly kept up during almost the whole of his life. To Mrs. Newton, soon after this event, he thus describes his feelings on this occasion. "The vicarage-house became a melancholy object as soon as Mr. Newton had left it: when you left it, it became more melancholy; now it is actually occupied by another family. I cannot even look at it without being shocked. As I walked in the garden last evening, I saw the smoke issue from the study chimney, and said to myself, that used to be a sign that Mr. Newton was there; but it is so no longer. The walls of the house know nothing of the change that has taken place, the bolt of the chamber door sounds just as it used to do, and when Mr. P—— goes up stairs, for ought I know, or ever shall know, the fall of his foot can hardly perhaps, be distinguished from that of Mr. Newton. But Mr. Newton's foot will never be heard upon that staircase again. These reflections, and such as these, occurred to me on this occasion. If I were in a condition to leave Olney, I certainly would not stay in it. It is no attachment to the place that binds me here, but an unfitness for every other. I lived in it once, but now I am buried in it, and have no business with the world on the outside of my sepulchre; my appearance would startle them, and theirs would be shocking to me."

In a letter to Mr. Newton, 3d May, 1780, he thus writes: "You indulge me in such a variety of subjects, and allow me such a latitude of excursion, in this scribbling employment, that I have no excuse for silence. I am much obliged to you for swallowing such boluses, as I send you, for the sake of my gilding, and verily believe, I am the only man alive, from whom they could be welcome, to a palate like yours. I wish I could make them more splendid than they are, more alluring to the eye, at least, if not more pleasing to the taste, but my leaf-gold is tarnished, and has received such a tinge from the vapours that are ever brooding over my mind, that I think it no small proof of your partiality to me, that you will read my letters. If every human being upon earth could think for one quarter of an hour, as I have thought for many years, there might perhaps be many miserable men among them, but not one unawakened one would be found, from the Arctic to the Antarctic circle. At present, the difference between them and me, is greatly to their advantage. I delight in baubles, and know them to be so, for rested in, and viewed without a reference to their author, what is the earth, what are the planets, what is the sun itself, but a bauble? Better for a man never to have seen them, or to see them with the eyes of a brute, stupid and unconscious of what he beholds, than not to be able to say, 'The maker of all these wonders is my friend!' Their eyes have never been opened, to see that they are trifles; mine have been, and will be, till they are closed for ever."

"I live in a world abounding with incidents, upon which many grave, and perhaps some profitable observations, might be made; but these incidents never reaching my unfortunate ears, both the entertaining narrative, and the reflection it might suggest, are to be annihilated and lost. I look back on the past week, and say, what did it produce? I ask the same question of the week preceding, and duly receive the same answer from both—nothing! A situation like this, in which I am as unknown to the world, as I am ignorant of all that passes in it—in which I have nothing to do but to think, would exactly suit me, were my subjects of meditation as agreeable as my leisure is uninterrupted: my passion for retirement is not at all abated, after so many years spent in the most sequestered state, but rather increased; a circumstance, I should esteem wonderful, to a degree not to be accounted for, considering the condition of my mind, did I not know that we think as we are made to think, and of course, approve and prefer, as Providence, who appoints the bounds of our habitation, chooses for us. Thus, I am both free, and a prisoner at the same time. The world is before me; I am not shut up in the Bastile; there are no moats about my castle, no locks upon my gates, of which I have not the keys; but an invisible, uncontrolable agency, a local attachment, an inclination, more forcible than I ever felt, even to the place of my birth, serves me for prison walls, and for bounds, which I cannot pass. In former years I have known sorrow, and before I had ever tasted of spiritual trouble. The effect was, an abhorrence of the scene in which I had suffered so much, and a weariness of those objects which I had so long looked at with an eye of despondency and dejection. But it is otherwise with me now. The same cause subsisting, and in a much more powerful degree, fails to produce its natural effect. The very stones in the garden walls, are my intimate acquaintance. I should miss almost the minutest object, and be disagreeably affected by its removal, and am persuaded, that were it possible I could leave this incommodious nook for a twelvemonth, I should return to it again with raptures, and be transported with the sight of objects, which, to all the world beside, would be at least indifferent; some of them, perhaps, such as the ragged thatch, and the tottering walls, disgusting. But so it is, and it is so, because here is to be my abode, and because such is the appointment of Him who placed me in it. It is the place of all the world I love the most, not for any happiness it affords me, but because here I can be miserable with most convenience to myself, and with least disturbance to others."

In a letter to Mrs. Unwin's son, with whom he had now commenced a correspondence, he thus describes his feelings. "So long as I am pleased with an employment, I am capable of unwearied application, because my feelings are all of the intense kind; I never received a little pleasure from anything in my life; if I am delighted it is in the extreme. The unhappy consequence of this temperature is, that my attachment to my occupation seldom outlives the novelty of it. That nerve of my imagination that feels the touch of any particular amusement, twangs under the energy of the pressure with so much vehemence, that it soon becomes sensible of weariness and fatigue."

Writing to Mr. Newton, 12th July, 1780, he thus again adverts to his own case. "Such nights as I frequently spend, are but a miserable prelude to the succeeding day, and indispose me, above all things, to the business of writing. Yet with a pen in my hand, if I am able to write at all, I find myself gradually relieved; and as I am glad of any employment that may serve to engage my attention, so especially I am pleased with an opportunity of conversing with you, though it be but upon paper. This occupation, above all others, assists me in that self-deception, to which I am indebted for all the little comfort I enjoy; things seem to be as they were, and I almost forget that they can never be so again. If I have strength of mind, I have not strength of body for the task, which, you say some would impose upon me. I cannot bear much thinking. The meshes of that fine net-work, the brain, are composed of such mere spinner's threads in me, that when a long thought finds its way into them, it buzzes, and twangs, and bustles about, at such a rate, as seems to threaten the whole contexture."

To the same correspondent he writes on another occasion. "Your sentiments, with respect to me, are exactly like Mrs. Unwin's. She, like you, is perfectly sure of my deliverance, and often tells me so; I make her but one answer, and sometimes none all. That answer gives her no pleasure, and would give you as little; therefore, at this time I suppress it. It is better on every account that they who interest themselves so deeply in that event, should believe the certainty of it, than that they should not. It is a comfort to them, at least, if it be none to me, and as I could not, if I would, so neither would I, if I could, deprive them of it. If human nature may be compared to a piece of tapestry, (and why not?) when human nature, as it subsists in me, though it is sadly faded on the right side, retains all its colour on the wrong. At this season of the year, and in this gloomy and uncomfortable climate, it is no easy matter for the owner of a mind like mine, to divert it from sad subjects, and fix it upon such as may administer to its amusement. Poetry, above all things, is useful to me in this respect. While I am held in pursuit of pretty images, or a pretty way of expressing them, I forget everything that is irksome, and, like a boy that plays truant, determine to avail himself of the present opportunity to be amused, regardless of future consequences. It will not be long perhaps, before you will receive a poem, called the Progress of Error; that will be succeeded by another, in due time, called Truth. Don't be alarmed. I ride Pegasus with a curb. He will never run away with me again. I have even convinced Mrs. Unwin, that I can manage him, and make him stop, when I please."

On another occasion he gives the following curious and playful description of himself. "I can compare this mind of mine to nothing that resembles it more, than to a board, that is under the carpenter's plane, (I mean while I am writing to you) the shavings are my uppermost thoughts; after a few strokes of the tool, it acquires a new surface; this again, upon a repetition of his task, he takes off, and a new surface still succeeds. Whether the shavings of the present day, will be worth your acceptance, I know not; I am unfortunately, made neither of cedar nor of mahogany, but Truncus ficulnus, inutile lignum. consequently, though I should be planed till I am as thin as a wafer, it will be but rubbish at last."

To his cousin, Mrs. Cowper, he thus plaintively describes his feelings:—"My days steal away silently, and march on, (as poor mad Lear would have made his soldiers march) as if they were shod with felt; not so silently but that I hear them, yet were it not that I am always listening to their flight, having no infirmity that I had not when I was much younger, I should deceive myself with an imagination that I am still young. I am fond of writing, as an amusement, but do not always find it one. Being rather scantily furnished with subjects that are good for anything, and corresponding only with those who have no relish for such as are good for nothing, I often find myself reduced to the necessity, the disagreeable necessity, of writing about myself. This does not mend the matter much; for though, in a description of my own condition, I discover abundant materials to employ my pen upon, yet as the task is not very agreeable to me, so, I am sufficiently aware, that it is likely to prove irksome to others. A painter, who should confine himself, in the exercise of his art, to the drawing of his own picture, must be a wonderful coxcomb indeed, if he did not soon grow sick of his own occupation, and be peculiarly fortunate if he did not make others as sick as himself."

Notwithstanding Cowper's depressive malady, yet his views of religion, even at that period, remained unaltered, and were as much distinguished for their excellence as ever. Writing to his friend, Mr. Unwin, the following judicious remarks occur, respecting keeping the sabbath:—"With respect to the advice you are required to give to a young lady, that she may be properly instructed in the manner of keeping the sabbath, I just subjoin a few hints that have occurred to me on the occasion. I think the sabbath may be considered, first, as a commandment, no less binding upon Christians than upon Jews. The spiritual people among them did not think it enough, merely to abstain from manual occupations on that day, but entering more deeply into the meaning of the precept, allotted those hours, they took from the world, to the cultivation of holiness in their own souls; which ever was, and ever will be, incumbent upon all, who have the Scripture in their hands, and is of perpetual obligation, both upon Jews and Christians; the Commandment enjoins it, and the prophets have enforced it; and, in many instances, the breach of it has been punished with a providential severity, that has made bystanders tremble. Secondly, it may be considered as a privilege, which you will know how to dilate upon better than I can tell you; thirdly, as a sign of that covenant by which believers are entitled to a rest that yet remaineth; fourthly, as the sine quâ non of the Christian character, and upon this head, I should guard against being misunderstood to mean no more than two attendances upon public worship, which is a form, observed by thousands, who never kept a sabbath in their lives. Consistence is necessary to give substance and solidity to the whole. To sanctify the day at church, and to trifle it away out of church, is profanation, and vitiates all. After all, I should say to my catechumen, Do you love the day, or do you not? If you love it, you will never inquire how far you may safely deprive yourself of the enjoyment of it. If you do not love it, and you find yourself in conscience obliged to acknowledge it, that is an alarming symptom, and ought to make you tremble. If you do not love it, then it is a weariness to you, and you wish it over. The ideas of labour and rest, are not more opposite to each other than the idea of a sabbath, and that dislike and disgust, with which it fills the souls of thousands, to be obliged to keep it, it is worse than bodily labour."

To his cousin, Mrs. Cowper, he again writes:—"I know not what impressions time may have made upon your person, for while his claws, (as our grannams called them), strike deep furrows in some faces, he seems to sheath them with much tenderness, as if fearful of doing injury to others. But, though an enemy to the body, he is a friend to the mind, and you have doubtless found him so. Though, even in this respect, his treatment of us depends upon what he meets with at our hands, if we use him well, and listen to his admonitions, he is a friend indeed; but otherwise, the worst of enemies, who takes from us daily, something that we valued, and gives us nothing better in its stead. It is well with them, who, like you, can stand a tip-toe on the mountain top of human life, look down with pleasure upon the valley they have passed, and sometimes stretch their wings in joyful hope of a happy flight into eternity. Yet a little while, and your hope will be accomplished. The course of a rapid river is the justest of all emblems, to express the variableness of our scene below. Shakspeare says, none ever bathed himself twice in the same stream; and it is equally true, that the world upon which we close our eyes at night, is never the same as that upon which we open them in the morning."

CHAPTER VIII.

Makes preparations for publishing his first volume—Reasons assigned for it—Beneficial effects of composition on his mind—His comparative indifference to the success of his volume—Great care, nevertheless, with which he composed it—His readiness to avail himself of the assistance and advice of his friends—The interest which Mr. Newton took in his publication—Writes the preface for the volume—Cowper's judicious reply to some objections that had been made to it—Publication of the volume—Manner in which it was received—Continuance of Cowper's depression—State of his mind respecting religion—His warm attachment to the leading truths of the gospel—Ardent desires to make his volume the means of conveying them to others.

MORE than seven years had now elapsed since the commencement of Cowper's distressing malady; and though he was not yet perfectly recovered, he had, at length, gradually acquired the full exercise of those mental powers for which he was so highly distinguished. Having now employed his muse, with the happiest effect, for nearly two years, he had composed a sufficient number of lines to form a respectable volume. Mrs. Unwin had witnessed with delight the productions of his pen, and she now wisely urged him to make them public. He was, at first, exceedingly averse to the measure; but, after some consideration, he at length yielded to her suggestions, and made preparations to appear as an author. His letters to his correspondents on the subject are highly interesting; and afford a full developement of the design he had in view in appearing before the public. To Mr. Unwin he thus writes:—"Your mother says I must write, and must admits of no apology; I might otherwise plead that I have nothing to say, that I am weary, that I am dull, that it would be more convenient for you, as well as for myself, that I should let it alone. But all these pleas, and whatever pleas besides, either disinclination, indolence, or necessity, might suggest, are overruled, as they ought to be, the moment a lady adduces her irrefragable argument, you must. Urged by her entreaties, I have at length sent a volume to the press; the greater part of it is the produce of the last winter. Two-thirds of the volume will be occupied by four pieces. It contains, in all, about two thousand five hundred lines; and will be known, in due time, by the names of Table Talk, The Progress of Error, Truth, Expostulation, with an addition of some smaller poems, all of which, I believe, have passed under your notice. Altogether they will furnish a volume of tolerable bulk, that need not be indebted to an intolerable breadth of margin, for the importance of its figure."

In this undertaking he was encouraged by his friend, Mr. Newton, with whom he corresponded on the subject, and to whom he thus discloses his mind:—"If a board of inquiry were to be established, at which poets were to undergo an examination respecting the motives that induced them to publish, and I were to be summoned to attend, that I might give an acount of mine, I think I could truly say, what perhaps few poets could, that though I have no objection to lucrative consequences, if any such should follow, they are not my aim; much less is it my ambition to exhibit myself to the world as a genius. What then, says Mr. President, can possibly be your motive? I answer, with a bow, amusement. There is no occupation within the compass of my small sphere, poetry excepted, that can do much towards diverting that train of melancholy forebodings, which, when I am not thus employed, are for ever pouring themselves in upon me. And if I did not publish what I write, I could not interest myself sufficiently in my own success to make an amusement of it. My own amusement, however, is not my sole motive. I am merry that I may decoy people into my company, and grave that they may be the better for it. Now and then I put on the garb of a philosopher, and take the opportunity that disguise procures me, to drop a word in favour of religion. In short, there is some froth, and here and there a bit of sweet-meat, which seems to entitle it justly to the name of a certain dish the ladies call a trifle. I did not choose to be more facetious, lest I should consult the taste of my readers at the expense of my own approbation; nor more serious than I have been, lest I should forfeit theirs. A poet in my circumstances has a difficult part to act; one minute obliged to bridle his humour, if he has any, the next, to clap a spur to the sides of it. Now ready to weep, from a sense of the importance of his subject, and on a sudden constrained to laugh, lest his gravity should be mistaken for dulness."

Writing to his amiable correspondent, Mrs. Cowper, 19th October, 1781, he says:—"I am preparing a volume of poems for the press, which I imagine will make its appearance in the course of the winter. It is a bold undertaking at this time of day, when so many writers of the greatest abilities have gone before, who seem to have anticipated every valuable subject, as well as all the graces of poetical embellishment, to step forth into the world in the character of a bard; especially when it is considered that luxury, idleness, and vice, have debauched the public taste, and that scarcely anything but childish fiction, or what has a tendency to excite a laugh, is welcome. I thought, however, that I had stumbled upon some subjects that had never been poetically treated, and upon some others, to which I imagined it would not be difficult to give an air of novelty, by the manner of treating them. My sole drift is to be useful; a point which, however, I knew I should in vain aim at, unless I could be likewise entertaining. I have therefore fixed these two strings to my bow; and by the help of both, have done my best, to send my arrow to the mark. My readers will hardly have begun to laugh before they will be called upon to correct that levity, and peruse me with a more serious air. I cast a side-long glance at the good-liking of the world at large, more for the sake of their advantage and instruction than their praise.—They are children; if we give them physic, we must sweeten the rim of the cup with honey. As to the effect, I leave that in his hands, who alone can produce it; neither prose, nor verse, can reform the manners of a dissolute age, much less can they inspire a sense of religious obligation, unless assisted, and made efficacious by the power who superintends the truth he has vouchsafed to impart."

To his warm friend, Mr. Hill, he thus amusingly adverts to his publication:—"I am in the press, and it is in vain to deny it. My labours are principally the production of the last winter; all, indeed, except a few of the minor pieces.—When I can find no other occupation, I think, and when I think, I am very apt to do it in rhyme. Hence it comes to pass that the season of the year, which generally pinches off the flowers of poetry, unfolds mine, such as they are, and crowns me with a winter garland. In this respect, therefore, I and my contemporary bards are by no means upon a par. They write when the delightful influences of fine weather, fine prospects, and a brisk motion of the animal spirits, make poetry almost the language of nature; and I, when icicles depend from all the leaves of the Parnassian laurel, and when a reasonable man would as little expect to succeed in verse, as to hear a blackbird whistle. This must be my apology to you, for whatever want of fire and animation you may observe in what you will shortly have the perusal of. As to the public, if they like me not, there is no remedy. A friend will weigh and consider all disadvantages, and make as large allowances as an author can wish, and larger, perhaps, than he has any right to expect, but not so the world at large; whatever they do not like, they will not by an apology be persuaded to forgive; it would be in vain to tell them that I wrote my verses in January, for they would immediately reply, Why did you not write them in May? A question that might puzzle a wiser head than we poets are generally blessed with."

It might have been supposed, that the vigorous exercise of the mental powers which the composition of poetry, like that of Cowper's, required, would have increased this depressive malady, instead of diminishing it. His, however, was a peculiar case, and he found it of great advantage, as we learn in a letter to Mr. Newton, where he says:—"I have never found an amusement, among the many that I have been obliged to have recourse to, that so well answered the purpose for which I used it, as composition. The quieting and composing effect of it was such, and so totally absorbed have I sometimes been in my rhyming occupation, that neither the past, nor the future, (those themes which to me are so fruitful in regret at other times) had any longer a share in my contemplation. For this reason I wish, and have often wished since the fit left me, that it would seize me again, but hitherto I have wished it in vain.—I see no want of subjects, but I feel a total disability to discuss them. Whether it is thus with other writers, or not, I am ignorant, but I should suppose my case, in this respect, a little peculiar. The voluminous writers at least, whose vein of fancy seems always to have been rich in proportion to their occasions, cannot have been so unlike, and so unequal to themselves. There is this difference between my poetship and the generality of them; they appear to have been ignorant how much they stood indebted to an Almighty power for the exercise of those talents they supposed to be their own. Whereas I know, and know most perfectly, that my power to think, whatever it be, and consequently my power to compose, is, as much as my outward form, afforded to me by the same hand that makes me, in any respect, differ from a brute."

The commencement of authorship is generally a period of much painful anxiety; few persons have ventured on such an undertaking without experiencing considerable excitement; and in a mind like Cowper's, it might have been supposed that such would have been the case in a remarkable degree. No person, however, ever ventured before the public, in the character of an author, with less anxiety. Writing to Mr. Unwin, he says:—"You ask me how I feel on the occasion of my approaching publication? Perfectly at ease. If I had not been pretty well assured beforehand, that my tranquillity would be but little endangered by such a measure, I would never have engaged in it, for I cannot bear disturbance. I have had in view two principal objects; first, to amuse myself, and then to compass that point in such a manner, that others might possibly be the better for my amusement. If I have succeeded, it will give me pleasure; but if I have failed, I shall not be mortified to the degree that might perhaps be expected. The critics cannot deprive me of the pleasure I have in reflecting, that so far as my leisure has been employed in writing for the public, it has been employed conscientiously, and with a view to their advantage. There is nothing agreeable, to be sure, in being chronicled for a dunce; but I believe there lives not a man upon earth who would be less affected by it than myself."

Indifferent as he was to the result of his publications, he was far from being careless in their composition. Perhaps no author ever took more pains with his production, or sought more carefully to make them worthy of public approbation. In one of his letters, adverting to this subject, he says—"To touch, and retouch, is, though some writers boast of negligence, and others would be ashamed to show their foul copies, the secret of almost all good writing, especially in verse. I am never weary of it myself, and if you would take as much pains as I do, you would not need to ask for my corrections. With the greatest indifference to fame, which you know me too well to suppose me capable of affecting, I have taken the utmost pains to deserve it. This may appear a mystery, or a paradox, in practice, but it is true. I considered that the taste of the day is refined, and delicate to excess, and that to disgust that delicacy of the taste by a slovenly inattention to it, would be to forfeit at once, all hope of being useful; and for this reason, though I have written more verse this year than perhaps any man in England, I have finished, and polished, and touched and retouched, with the utmost care. Whatever faults I may be chargeable with as a poet, I cannot accuse myself of negligence; I never suffer a line to pass till I have made it as good as I can; and though some may be offended at my doctrines, I trust none will be disgusted by slovenly inaccuracy, in the numbers, the rhymes, or the language. If, after all, I should be converted into waste paper, it may be my misfortune, but it will not be my fault; and I shall bear it with perfect serenity."

In the character of Cowper there was nothing like an overweening confidence in his own powers. No person was ever more willing to avail himself of the advice of his friends, nor did any one ever receive advice more gratefully. Not satisfied with bestowing upon his productions the greatest pains himself, he occasionally submitted them to the correction of others, and his correspondence affords many proofs of his readiness to profit by the slightest hint. To Mr. Newton he thus writes: "I am much obliged to you for the pains you have taken with my poems, and for the manner in which you have interested yourself in their appearance. Your favourable opinion affords me a comfortable presage with respect to that of the public; for though I make allowance for your partiality to me, yet I am sure you would not suffer me, unadmonished, to add myself to the number of insipid rhymers with whose productions the world is already too much pestered. I forgot to mention, that Johnson uses the discretion my poetship has allowed him, with much discernment. He has suggested several alterations, or rather marked several defective passages, which I have corrected; much to the advantage of the poems. In the last sheet he sent me, he noticed three such, which I reduced to better order. In the foregoing sheet I assented to his criticisms in some instances, and chose to abide by the original expressions in others; whenever he has marked such lines as did not please him, I have, as often as I could, paid all possible respect to his animadversions. Thus we jog on together comfortably enough; and perhaps it would be as well for authors in general, if their booksellers, when men of some taste, are allowed, though not to tinker the work themselves, yet to point out the flaws, and humbly to recommend an improvement. I have also to thank you, and ought to have done it in the first place, for having recommended to me the suppression of some lines, which I am now more than ever convinced, would at least have done me no honour."

The great interest Mr. Newton took in Cowper's publication, induced the poet to request him to compose the preface; and his correspondence with Mr. Newton on the subject is alike honourable to his judgment and his feelings; and affords a striking display of the strong hold which religion had upon his affections. He thus introduces the subject to Mr. Newton, "With respect to the poem called Truth, it is so true that it can hardly fail of giving offence to an unenlightened reader. I think, therefore, that in order to obviate in some measure those prejudices that will naturally erect their bristles against it, an explanatory preface, such as you, (and nobody else so well as you) can furnish me with, will have every grace of propriety to recommend it; or if you are not averse to the task, and your avocations will allow you to undertake it, and if you think it will be still more proper, I should be glad to be indebted to you for a preface to the whole. I admit that it will require much delicacy, but am far from apprehending that you will find it difficult to succeed. You can draw a hair-stroke, where another man would make a blot, as broad as a sixpence."

The preface composed by Mr. Newton, though it was in the highest degree satisfactory to Cowper, and was admitted by him to be everything that he could wish, was nevertheless thought by others to be of too sombre a cast, to introduce a volume of poems, pre-eminently distinguished for their vivacity and eloquence. Adverting to this objection, and to the suggestion of the publisher to suppress it, Cowper thus writes:—"If the men of the world are so merrily disposed, in the midst of a thousand calamities, that they will not deign to read a preface, of three or four pages, because the purport of it is serious, they are far gone, indeed, in the last stage of a frenzy. I am, however, willing to hope, that such is not the case; curiosity is an universal passion. There are few persons who think a book worth reading, but feel a desire to know something about the writer of it. This desire will naturally lead them to peep into the preface, where they will soon find, that a little perseverance will furnish them with some information on the subject. If therefore your preface finds no readers, I shall take it for granted that it is, because the book itself is accounted not worth their notice. Be that as it may, it is quite sufficient that I have played the antic myself for their diversion; and that, in a state of dejection such as they are absolute strangers to, I have sometimes put on an air of cheerfulness and vivacity, to which I myself am in reality a stranger, for the sake of winning their attention to more useful matter. I cannot endure the thought, for a moment, that you should descend to my level on the occasion, and court their favour in a style not more unsuitable to your function, than to the constant and consistent strain of your whole character and conduct. Though your preface is of a serious cast, it is free from all offensive peculiarities, and contains none of those obnoxious doctrines at which the world is too apt to be angry. It asserted nothing more than every rational creature must admit to be true—that divine and earthly things can no longer stand in competition with each other, in the judgment of any man, than while he continues ignorant of their respective value: and that the moment the eyes are opened, the latter are always cheerfully relinquished for the former. It is impossible for me however to be so insensible to your kindness in writing the preface, as not to be desirous of defying all contingencies, rather than entertain a wish to suppress it. It will do me honour, indeed, in the eyes of those whose good opinion is worth having, and if it hurts me in the estimation of others I cannot help it; the fault is neither yours, nor mine, but theirs. If a minister's is a more splendid character than a poet's, and I think nobody that understands their value can hesitate in deciding that question, then undoubtedly, the advantage of having our names united in the same volume, is all on my side."

Cowper's first volume was published in the spring of 1782. Its success, at first, fell far short of what might have been anticipated from its extraordinary merit. It was not long, however, before the more intelligent part of the reading public appreciated its value. It soon found its way into the hands of all lovers of literature. Abounding with some of the finest passages that are to be met with, either in ancient or modern poetry, it was impossible that it should remain long unnoticed. By mere readers of taste, it was read for the beauty and elegance of its composition; by many, it was eagerly sought after for the sprightliness, vivacity, and wit, with which it abounded:—by Christians, of all denominations, it was read with unfeigned pleasure, for the striking and beautiful descriptions it contained, of doctrinal, practical, and experimental Christianity.

It would scarcely be supposed that the author of a volume of poems like this, exhibiting such a diversity of powers as could not fail to charm the mind, delight the imagination, and improve the heart, could have remained, during the whole time he was composing it, in a state of great and painful depression. Such however was the peculiarity of Cowper's malady, that a train of melancholy thoughts seemed ever to be pouring themselves in upon his mind, which neither himself nor his friends were ever able to account for, satisfactorily. Writing to his friend Mr. Newton, who had recently paid him a visit, he thus discloses the state of his mind:—"My sensations at your departure were far from pleasant. When we shall meet again, and in what circumstances, or whether we shall meet or not, is an article to be found no where but in that providence which belongs to the current year, and will not be understood till it is accomplished. This I know, that your visit was most agreeable to me, who, though I live in the midst of many agreeables, am but little sensible of their charms. But when you came, I determined, as much as possible, to be deaf to the suggestions of despair; that if I could contribute but little to the pleasure of the opportunity, I might not dash it with unseasonable melancholy, and like an instrument with a broken string, interrupt the harmony of the concert."

It is gratifying to observe, that neither the attention which Cowper paid to his publication, nor the depressive malady with which he was afflicted, could divert his attention from the all-important concerns of religion. A tone of deep seriousness, and genuine Christian feeling, pervades many of his letters written about this time. To Mr. Newton he thus writes:—"You wish you could employ your time to better purpose, yet are never idle, in all that you do; whether you are alone, or pay visits, or receive them; whether you think or write, or walk, or sit still, the state of your mind is such as discovers even to yourself, in spite of all its wanderings, that there is a principle at the bottom, whose determined tendency is towards the best things. I do not at all doubt the truth of what you say, when you complain of that crowd of trifling thoughts that pesters you without ceasing; but then you always have a serious thought standing at the door of your imagination, like a justice of the peace, with the Riot Act in his hand, ready to read it and disperse the mob. Here lies the difference between you and me. You wish for more attention, I for less. Dissipation itself would be welcome to me, so it were not a vicious one; but however earnestly invited, it is coy and keeps at a distance. Yet with all this distressing gloom upon my mind, I experience, as you do, the slipperiness of the present hour, and the rapidity with which time escapes me. Everything around us, and everything that befalls us, constitutes a variety, which, whether agreeable or otherwise, has still a thievish propensity; and steals from us days, months, and years, with such unparalleled suddenness, that even while we say they are here, they are gone. From infancy to manhood, is rather a tedious period, chiefly, I suppose, because at that time, we act under the control of others, and are not suffered to have a will of our own. But thence downward into the vale of years, is such a declivity, that we have just an opportunity to reflect upon the steepness of it and then find ourselves at the bottom."

The following extracts from his correspondence with Mr. Unwin, who at that time, was on a visit at Brighthelmstone, will show the deep tone of seriousness that pervaded his mind:—"I think with you, that the most magnificent object under heaven is the great deep; and cannot but feel an unpolite species of astonishment, when I consider the multitudes that view it without emotion, and even without reflection. In all its varied forms, it is an object, of all others, the most suitable to affect us with lasting impressions of the awful power that created and controls it. I am the less inclined to think this negligence excusable, because, at a time of life, when I gave as little attention to religion as any man, I yet remember that the waves would preach to me, and that in the midst of worldly dissipation I had an ear to hear them. In the fashionable amusements which you will probably witness for a time, you will discern no signs of sobriety, or true wisdom. But it is impossible for a man who has a mind like yours, capable of reflection, to observe the manners of a multitude without learning something. If he sees nothing to imitate, he is sure to see something to avoid. If nothing to congratulate his fellow-creatures upon, at least much to excite his compassion. There is not, I think, so melancholy a sight in the world, (an hospital is not to be compared to it,) as that of a multitude of persons, distinguished by the name of gentry, who, gentle perhaps by nature, and made more gentle by education, have the appearance of being innocent and inoffensive, yet being destitute of all religion, or not at all governed by the religion they profess, are none of them at any great distance from an eternal state, where self-deception will be impossible, and where amusements cannot enter. Some of them we may hope will be reclaimed, it is most probable that many will, because mercy, if one may be allowed the expression, is fond of distinguishing itself by seeking its objects among the most desperate class; but the Scripture gives no encouragement to the warmest charity, to expect deliverance for them all. When I see an afflicted and unhappy man, I say to myself, there is perhaps a man, whom the world would envy, if they knew the value of his sorrows, which are possibly intended only to soften his heart, and to turn his affections towards their proper centre. But when I see, or hear of a crowd of voluptuaries, who have no ears but for music, no eyes but for splendour, and no tongues but for impertinence and folly—I say, or at least I see occasion to say, this is madness—this, persisted in, must have a tragical conclusion. It will condemn you, not only as Christians, unworthy of the name, but as intelligent creatures—you know by the light of nature, if you have not quenched it, that there is a God, and that a life like yours cannot be according to his will. I ask no pardon of you for the gravity and gloominess of these reflections, which, with others of a similar complexion, are sure to occur to me when I think of a scene of public diversion like that you have witnessed."

The following remarks, extracted from a letter to the same correspondent, while they serve to display the state of his mind respecting religion, exhibit at the same time, the high value which he set upon the leading truths of the gospel:—"When I wrote the poem on Truth, it was indispensably necessary that I should set forth that doctrine which I know to be true; and that I should pass, what I understood to be a just censure, upon opinions and persuasions that stand in direct opposition to it; because, though some errors may be innocent, and even religious errors are not always dangerous, yet in a case where the faith and hope of a Christian are concerned, they must necessarily be destructive; and because neglecting this, I should have betrayed my subject; either suppressing what in my judgment is of the last importance, or giving countenance by a timid silence, to the very evils it was my design to combat. That you may understand me better, I will subjoin; that I wrote that poem on purpose to inculcate the eleemosynary character of the gospel, as a dispensation of mercy, in the most absolute sense of the word, to the exclusion of all claims of merit on the part of the receiver; consequently to set the brand of invalidity upon the plea of works, and to discover, upon scriptural ground, the absurdity of that notion, which includes a solecism in the very terms of it, that man by repentance and good works, may deserve the mercy of his Maker. I call it solecism, because mercy deserved ceases to be mercy, and must take the name of justice. This is the opinion which I said, in my last, the world would not acquiesce in, but except this, I do not recollect that I have introduced a syllable into any of my pieces, that they can possibly object to; and even this I have endeavoured to deliver from doctrinal dryness, by as many pretty things, in the way of trinket and plaything, as I could muster upon the subject. So that if I have rubbed their gums, I have taken care to do it with a coral, and even that coral embellished by the ribbon to which it is attached, and recommended by the tinkling of all the bells I could contrive to annex to it."

The following beautiful lines convey sentiments so much in unison with this extract, that we cannot forbear to insert them at the close of this chapter:—

"I am no preacher; let this hint suffice,
The cross once seen is death to every vice;
Else he that hung there suffered all his pain,
Bled, groaned, and agonized, and died in vain.
There, and there only, (though the deist rave,
And atheist, if earth bear so base a slave,)
There, and there only, is the power to save;
There no delusive hope invites despair,
No mockery meets you, no deception there;
The spells and charms that blinded you before,
All vanish there, and fascinate no more."

Progress of Error.

CHAPTER IX.

Commencement of Cowper's acquaintance with Lady Austin—Pleasure it afforded him—Poetic epistle to her—Her removal to Olney—Beneficial influence of her conversational powers on Cowper's mind—Occasion of his writing John Gilpin—Lines composed at Lady Austin's request—Induced by her to commence writing The Task—Principal object he had in view in composing it—Sudden and final separation from Lady Austin—Occasional severity of his depressive malady—Hopes entertained by his friends of his ultimate recovery—His own opinion upon it—Pleasing proofs of the power of religion on his mind—Tenderness of his conscience—Serious reflections—Aversion to religious deception and pretended piety—Bigotry and intolerance, with their opposite vices, levity and indifference, deplored—Sympathy with the sufferings of the poor—Enviable condition of such of them as are pious, compared with the rich who disregard religion.

In the autumn of 1781, Cowper became acquainted with Lady Austin, whose brilliant wit and unrivalled conversational powers, were admirably adapted to afford relief to a mind like his. This lady was introduced to the retired poet by her sister, the wife of a clergyman, who resided at Clifton, a mile distant from Olney, and who occasionally called upon Mrs. Unwin. Lady Austin came to pass some time with her sister, in the summer of 1781, and Mrs. Unwin, at Cowper's request, invited the ladies to tea. So much, however, was he averse to the company of strangers, that after he had occasioned the invitation, it was with considerable reluctance he was persuaded to join the party; but having at length overcome his feelings, he entered freely into conversation with Lady Austin, and derived so much benefit from her sprightly and animating discourse, that he from that time cultivated her acquaintance with the greatest attention.

The opinion Cowper formed of this accomplished and talented lady, may be ascertained by the following extracts from his letters:—"Lady Austin has paid us her first visit, and not content with showing us that proof of her respect, made handsome apologies for her intrusion. She is a lively, agreeable woman; has seen much of the ways of the world, and accounts it a great simpleton, as it is. She laughs, and makes laugh, without seeming to labour at it. She has many features in her character which you must admire, but one in particular, on account of the rarity of it, will engage your attention and esteem. She has a degree of gratitude in her composition, so quick a sense of obligation, as is hardly to be found in any rank of life. Discover but a wish to please her, and she never forgets it; not only thanks you, but the tears will start into her eyes at the recollection of the smallest service. With these fine feelings she has the most harmless vivacity you can imagine: half an hour's conversation with her will convince you that she is one of the most intelligent, pious, and agreeable ladies you ever met with."

"Dear Anna,—between friend and friend
Prose answers every common end;
Serves, in a plain and homely way,
To express the occurrence of the day,
Our health, the weather, and the news,
What walks we take, what books we choose,
And all the floating thoughts we find
Upon the surface of the mind.
But when a poet takes the pen,
Far more alive than other men,
He feels a gentle tingling come
Down to his fingers and his thumb,
Deriv'd from nature's noblest part,
The centre of a glowing heart!
And this is what the world, who knows
No flights above the pitch of prose,
His more sublime vagaries slighting,
Denominates an itch for writing.
No wonder I, who scribble rhyme
To catch the triflers of the time,
And tell them truths divine and clear,
Which couched in prose they will not hear,
Should feel that itching and that tingling
With all my purpose intermingling,
To your intrinsic merit true,
When call'd to address myself to you.
Mysterious are His ways whose power
Brings forth that unexpected hour,
When minds that never met before
Shall meet, unite, and part no more:
It is the allotment of the skies,
The hand of the supremely wise,
That guides and governs our affections,
And plans and orders our connections,
Directs us in our distant road,
And marks the bounds of our abode.

This page of Providence quite new,
And now just opening to our view,
Employs our present thoughts and pains,
To guess and spell what it contains;
But day by day, and year by year,
Will make the dark enigma clear,
And furnish us, perhaps, at last,
Like other scenes already past,
With proof that we and our affairs
Are part of a Jehovah's cares:
For God unfolds by slow degrees
The purport of his deep decrees,
Sheds every hour a clearer light,
In aid of our defective sight,
And spreads, at length, before the soul,
A beautiful and perfect whole,
Which busy man's inventive brain
Toils to anticipate in vain.
Say, Anna, had you never known
The beauties of a rose full blown;
Could you, though luminous your eye,
By looking on the bud descry,
Or guess, with a prophetic power,
The future splendour of the flower?
Just so the Omnipotent, who turns
The system of a world's concerns,
From mere minutiæ can educe
Events of most important use;
And bid a dawning sky display
The blaze of a meridian day.
The works of man tend one and all,
As needs they must, both great and small,
And vanity absorbs at length
The monuments of human strength;
But who can tell how vast the plan
Which this day's incident began?
Too small, perhaps, the slight occasion
For our dim-sighted observation;
It pass'd unnoticed as the bird
That cleaves the yielding air unheard,
And yet may prove, when understood,
An harbinger of endless good.
Not that I deem or mean to call
Friendship a blessing cheap or small,
But merely to remark that ours,
Like some of nature's sweetest flowers,
Rose from a seed of tiny size
That seemed to promise no such prize:
A transient visit intervening,
And made almost without a meaning,
(Hardly the effect of inclination,
Much less of pleasing expectation!)
Produced a friendship, then begun,
That has cemented us in one,
And placed it in our power to prove,
By long fidelity and love,
That Solomon has wisely spoken,
'A three-fold cord is not soon broken.'"

Lady Austin was not less delighted with her new acquaintance than Cowper and Mrs. Unwin were with her. She had previously determined to leave London, and had been looking out for a residence in the country, not far distant from his sister's. The house immediately adjoining that in which Cowper resided, was at liberty; she accordingly hired it, and took possession of it in the course of the ensuing summer. Cowper thus adverts to this circumstance, in a letter to Mr. Newton:—"A new scene is opening upon us, which, whether it perform what it promises, or not, will add fresh plumes to the wings of time, at least while it continues to be a subject of contemplation. Lady Austin, very desirous of retirement, especially of a retirement near her sister, an admirer of Mr. Scot as a preacher, and of your two humble servants, myself and Mrs. Unwin, is come to a determination to settle here; and has chosen the house formerly occupied by you, for her future residence. I am highly pleased with the plan, upon Mrs. Unwin's account, who, since Mrs. Newton's departure, has been nearly destitute of all female connection, and has not, in any emergency, a woman to speak to. It has, in my view, and I doubt not it will have the same in yours, strong marks of a providential interposition. A female friend, who bids fair to prove herself worthy of the appellation, comes, recommended by a variety of considerations, to such a place as Olney. Since your removal, there was not in the kingdom a retirement more absolutely such than ours. We did not covet company, but when it came we found it agreeable. A person that understands the world well, has high spirits, a lively fancy, and great readiness of conversation, introduces a sprightliness into such a scene as this, which, if it was peaceful before, is not the worse for being a little enlivened. In case of illness too, to which we are all liable, it was rather a gloomy prospect, if we allowed ourselves to advert to it, that there was hardly a woman in the place from whom it would have been reasonable to have expected either comfort or assistance."

Preparations were made at the vicarage for the reception of Lady Austin, and she took possession of it towards the close of 1782. Both Cowper and Mrs. Unwin were so charmed with her society, and she was so delighted with theirs, that it became their custom to dine together, at each other's houses, every alternate day. The effect of Lady Austin's almost irresistible conversational powers proved highly beneficial to the poet's mind, and contributed to remove that painful depression of which he still continued to be the subject; and which would sometimes seize him when he was in her company: even with her unrivalled talents, she was scarcely able, at times, to remove the deep and melancholy gloom which still shed its darkening influence over his mind. On one occasion, when she observed him to be sinking into rather an unusual depression, she exerted, as she was invariably accustomed to do, her utmost ability to afford him immediate relief. It occurred to her she might then probably accomplish it, by telling him a story of John Gilpin, which she had treasured up in her memory from her childhood. The amusing incidents of the story itself, and the happy manner in which it was related, had the desired effect; it dissipated the gloom of the passing hour, and he informed Lady Austin the next morning that convulsions of laughter, brought on by the recollection of her story, had kept him awake during the greater part of the night, and that he had composed a poem on the subject. Hence arose the fascinating and amusing ballad of John Gilpin, which rapidly found its way into all the periodical publications of the day, and was admired by readers of every description.

Its happy influence on his own mind on subsequent occasions is adverted to in the following letter to Mr. Unwin:—"You tell me that John Gilpin made you laugh tears, and that the ladies at court are delighted with my poems. Much good may they do them; may they become as wise as the writer wishes them, and they will then be much happier than he! I know there is, in the greater part of the poems which make up the volume, that wisdom which cometh from above, because it was from above that I received it. May they receive it too! for whether they drink it out of the cistern, or whether it falls upon them immediately from the clouds, as it did on me, it is all one. It is the water of life, which whosoever drinketh shall thirst no more. As to the famous horseman above mentioned, he and his feats are an inexhaustible source of amusement. At least we find them so: and seldom meet without refreshing ourselves with the recollection of them. You are perfectly at liberty to do with them as you please, and when printed send me a copy."

Lady Austin's intercourse with Mrs. Unwin and Cowper continued, uninterrupted, till near the close of 1784; and during all this time, by her sprightly, judicious, and captivating conversation, she was often the means of rousing him from his melancholy depression. To console him, she would often exert her musical talents on the harpsichord; and at her request, he composed, among others, the following beautiful song, suited to airs she was accustomed to play:

"No longer I follow a sound,
No longer a dream I pursue;
O, happiness! not to be found,
Unattainable treasure, adieu!

I have sought thee in splendour and dress,
In the regions of pleasure and taste;
I have sought thee, and seemed to possess,
But have proved thee a vision at last.

An humble ambition and hope
The voice of true wisdom inspires;
'Tis sufficient, if peace be the scope
And the summit of all our desires.

Peace may be the lot of the mind
That seeks it in meekness and love;
But rapture and bliss are confined
To the glorified spirits above!"

During the winter of 1783–4, Cowper spent the evenings in reading to these ladies, taking the liberty himself, and affording the same to them, of making remarks on what came under their notice. On these interesting occasions, Lady Austin displayed her enchanting, and almost magical powers, with singular effect. The conversation happened one evening to turn on blank verse, of which she had always expressed herself to be passionately fond. Persuaded that Cowper was able to produce, in this measure, a poem, that would eclipse anything he had hitherto written, she urged him to try his powers in that species of composition. He had hitherto written only in rhyme, and he felt considerable reluctance to make the attempt. After repeated solicitations, however, he promised her, if she would furnish the subject, he would comply with her request. "Oh!" she replied, "you can never be in want of a subject, you can write upon anything; write upon this sofa." The poet obeyed her command, and the world is thus indebted to this lady for The Task, a poem of matchless beauty and excellence, embracing almost every variety of style, and every description of subject, combining elegance and ease, with sublimity and grandeur, adapted to impress the heart with sentiments of the most exalted piety, and to make its readers happy in the present life, while it excites in them earnest and longing desires after the felicity and glory of heaven.

In composing this exquisite poem, however, it ought to be observed that Cowper had a higher object in view than merely to please Lady Austin. His great aim was to be useful; and, indeed, this was his leading motive in all his productions, as is evident from the following extract from a letter to Mr. Unwin: "In some passages of the enclosed poem, which I send for your inspection, you will observe me very satirical, especially in my second book. Writing on such subjects I could not be otherwise. I can write nothing without aiming, at least, at usefulness. It were beneath my years to do it, and still more dishonourable to my religion. I know that a reformation of such abuses, as I have censured is not be expected from the efforts of a poet; but to contemplate the world, its follies, its vices, its indifference to duty, and its strenuous attachment to what is evil, and not to reprehend it, were to approve it. From this charge at least I shall be clear, for I have neither, tacitly, nor expressly, flattered either its characters or its customs. My principal purpose has been, to allure the reader by character, by scenery, by imagery, and such poetical embellishments, to the reading of what may profit him. Subordinately to this, to combat that predilection in favour of a metropolis, that beggars and exhausts the country, by evacuating it of all its principal inhabitants; and collaterally, and as far as is consistent with this double intention, to have a stroke at vice, vanity, and folly wherever I find them. What there is of a religious cast, in the volume, I have thrown towards the end of it, for two reasons; first, that I might not revolt the reader at his entrance; and, secondly, that my best impressions might be made last. Were I to write as many volumes as Lopez de Vega, or Voltaire, not one of them would be without this tincture. If the world like it not, so much the worse for them. I make all the concessions I can that I may please them, but I will not do this at the expense of my conscience. My descriptions are all from nature, not one of them second-handed. My delineations of the heart are from my own experience; not one of them borrowed from books, or in the least degree conjectural."

The close of the year 1784, witnessed the completion of this extensive performance, and the commencement of another of greater magnitude, though of a different description, and less adapted for general usefulness, the translation of Homer; undertaken at the united request of Mrs. Unwin and Lady Austin. This was a remarkable period in Cowper's life. Circumstances arose, altogether unforeseen by him, and over which he had no control, which led to the removal of Lady Austin from Olney. He had so often been benefited by her company, had in so many instances been cheered by her vivacity when suffering under the influence of his depressive malady, and had received such repeated proofs of affability and kindness, that he could not entertain the thought of parting with her without considerable disquietude. Immediately, however, on perceiving that separation became requisite for the maintenance of his own peace, as well as to ensure the tranquillity of his faithful and long-tried inmate, Mrs. Unwin, he wisely and firmly, took such steps as were necessary to promote it, though it was at the expense of much mental anguish.

Some of Cowper's biographers have, unjustly, and without the slightest foundation, attempted to cast considerable odium upon the character of Mrs. Unwin, for her conduct in this affair, as if all the blame of Cowper's separation from Lady Austin were to be laid at her door. One has even gone so far as to state, that her mind was of such a sombre hue, that it rather tended to foster, than to dissipate, Cowper's melancholy. An assertion utterly incapable of proof, and which, were the poet living, he would be the first to deny. The fact is, that Cowper never felt any other attachment to either of these ladies than that of pure friendship, and much as he valued the society of Lady Austin, when he found it necessary, for his own peace, to choose which he should please to retain, he could not hesitate for a moment to prefer the individual who had watched over him with so much tenderness, and probably to the injury of her own health. The whole of his conduct in this affair, and indeed, the manner in which he has everywhere spoken of his faithful inmate, proves this indubitably.

Aware of the benefit he had received from Lady Austin's company, many of his friends were apprehensive that her removal would be attended with consequences seriously injurious to the poet. Deep, however, as was the impression which it made upon his mind, he bore it with much more fortitude than could have been expected, as will be seen by the manner in which he adverted to it in a letter to Mr. Hill:—"We have, as you say, lost a lively and sensible neighbour in Lady Austin, but we have been so long accustomed to a state of retirement, within one degree of solitude, and being naturally lovers of still life, we can relapse into our former duality without being unhappy in the change. To me, indeed, a third individual is not necessary, while I can have the faithful companion I have had these twenty years."

It might be imagined, from the production of Cowper's pen at this period, that he was entirely recovered from his depressive malady; such, however, was far from the case. His letters to his correspondents prove, that whatever gaiety and vivacity there was in his writings, there was nothing in his own state of mind that bore any resemblance to such emotions; but that, on the contrary, his fits of melancholy were frequent, and often painfully acute. To his friend, Mr. Newton, he thus feelingly discloses his peculiarly painful sensations:—"My heart resembles not the heart of a Christian, mourning and yet rejoicing, pierced with thorns, yet wreathed about with roses; I have the thorn without the rose. My brier is a wintry one, the flowers are withered, but the thorn remains. My days are spent in vanity, and it is impossible for me to spend them otherwise. No man upon earth is more sensible of the unprofitableness of such a life as mine than I am, or groans more heavily under the burden; but this too is vanity: my groans will not bring the remedy, because there is no remedy for me. I have been lately more dejected and more depressed than usual; more harassed by dreams in the night, and more deeply poisoned by them in the following day. I know not what is portended by an alteration for the worse after eleven years of misery; but firmly believe, that it is not designed as the introduction of a change for the better. You know not what I suffered while you were here, nor was there any need you should. Your friendship for me would have made you in some degree a partaker of my woes, and your share in them would have been increased by your inability to help me. Perhaps, indeed, they took a keener edge, from the consideration of your presence. The friend of my heart, the person with whom I had formerly taken sweet counsel, no longer useful to me as a minister, no longer pleasant to me as a Christian, was a spectacle which must necessarily add the bitterness of mortification to the sadness of despair. I now see a long winter before me, and am to get through it as I can; I know the ground before I tread upon it. It is hollow; it is agitated; it suffers shocks in every direction; it is like the soil of Calabria—all whirlpool and undulation; but I must reel through it, at least if I be not swallowed up by the way. I have taken leave of the old year, and parted with it just when you did, but with very different sentiments and feelings upon the occasion. I looked back upon all the passages and occurrences of it as a traveller looks back upon a wilderness, through which he has passed with weariness and sorrow of heart, reaping no other fruit of his labour than the poor consolation, that, dreary as the desert was, he left it all behind him. The traveller would find even this comfort considerably lessened, if, as soon as he passed one wilderness, he had to traverse another of equal length, and equally desolate. In this particular his experience and mine would exactly tally. I should rejoice indeed that the old year is over and gone, if I had not every reason to expect a new one similar to it. Even the new year is already old in my account. I am not, indeed, sufficiently second-sighted, to be able to boast, by anticipation, an acquaintance with the events of it yet unborn, but rest assured that, be they what they may, not one of them comes a messenger of good to me. If even death itself should be of the number, he is no friend of mine; it is an alleviation of the woes, even of an unenlightened man, that he can wish for death, and indulge a hope, at least, that in death he shall find deliverance. But, loaded as my life is with despair, I have no such comfort as would result from a probability of better things to come were it once ended. I am far more unhappy than the traveller I have just referred to; pass through whatever difficulties, dangers, or afflictions, I may, I am not a whit nearer home, unless a dungeon be called so. This is no very agreeable theme, but in so great a dearth of subjects to write upon, and especially impressed as I am at this moment with a sense of my own condition, I could choose no other. The weather is an exact emblem of my mind in its present state. A thick fog envelopes every thing, and at the same time it freezes intensely. You will tell me, that this cold gloom will be succeeded by a cheerful spring, and endeavour to encourage me to hope for a spiritual change resembling it, but it will be lost labour. Nature revives again; but a soul once slain lives no more. The hedge that has been apparently dead is not so: it will burst into leaf, and blossom at the appointed time, but no such time is appointed for the stake that stands in it. It is as dead as it seems, and will prove itself no dissembler. The latter end of next month will complete a period of eleven years, in which I have spoken no other language. It is a long time for a man, whose eyes were once opened, to spend in darkness; long enough to make despair an inveterate habit; and such it is to me. My friends, I know, expect that I shall yet enjoy health again. They think it necessary to the existence of divine truth, that he who once had possession of it should never finally lose it. I admit the solidity of this reasoning in every case but my own, and why not in my own? For causes which to them it appears madness to allege, but which rest upon my mind, with a weight of immovable conviction. If I am recoverable, why am I thus? why crippled, and made useless in the church, just at the time of life when my judgment and experience, being matured, I might be most useful. Why cashiered, and turned out of service, till according to the course of years, there is not life enough left in me to make amends for the years I have lost; till there is no reasonable hope left that the fruit can ever pay the expense of the fallow? I forestall the answer—God's ways are mysterious, and he giveth no account of his matters—an answer that would serve my purpose as well as theirs that use it. There is a mystery in my destruction, and in time it will be explained.

"I could easily, were it not a subject that would make us melancholy, point out to you some essential difference between the state of the person you mentioned and my own, which would prove mine to be by far the most deplorable of the two. I suppose no man would despair if he did not apprehend something singular in the circumstances of his own story, something that discriminates it from that of every other man, and that induces despair as an inevitable consequence. You may encounter his unhappy persuasion with as many instances as you please, of persons who, like him, having renounced all hope, were yet restored, and may thence infer that he, like them, shall meet with a season of restoration—but it is in vain. Every such individual accounts himself an exception to all rules, and, therefore, the blessed reverse that others have experienced, affords no ground of comfortable expectation to him. But you will say, it is reasonable to conclude that as all your predecessors in this vale of misery and horror have found themselves delightfully disappointed, so may you. I grant the reasonableness of it; it would be sinful, perhaps, as well as uncharitable to reason otherwise; but an argument hypothetical in its nature, however rationally conducted, may lead to a false conclusion; and in this instance so will yours. But I forbear, and will say no more, though it is a subject on which I could write more than the mail could carry. I must deal with you as I deal with poor Mrs. Unwin, in all our disputes about it. Cutting all controversy short by the event."

To a request from Mr. Newton that Cowper would favour the editor of the Theological Magazine with an occasional essay, he thus writes:—"I converse, you say, upon other subjects than that of despair, and may therefore write upon others. Indeed, my friend, I am a man of very little conversation upon any subject. From that of despair, I abstain as much as possible, for the sake of my company, but I will venture to say that it is never out of my mind one minute in the whole day. I do not mean to say that I am never cheerful. I am often so; always, indeed, when my nights have been undisturbed for a season. But the effect of such continual listening to the language of a heart hopeless and deserted, is, that I can never give much more than half my attention to what is started by others, and very rarely start anything myself. You will easily perceive that a mind thus occupied, is but indifferently qualified for the consideration of theological matters. The most useful, and the most delightful topics of that kind, are to me forbidden fruit; I tremble as I approach them. It has happened to me sometimes that I have found myself imperceptibly drawn in and made a party in such discourse. The consequence has been dissatisfaction and self-reproach. You will tell me, perhaps, that I have written upon those subjects in verse, and may therefore in prose. But there is a difference. The search after poetical expression, the rhymes, and the numbers, are all affairs of some difficulty, they amuse indeed, but are not to be attained without study, and engross, perhaps, a larger share of the attention than the subject itself."

In the spring of 1785, his friends became more sanguine in their expectations of his ultimate recovery, and they felt persuaded, it would take place at no very distant period. It appears also, by the following extract, that Cowper was not himself, wholly destitute of hope, on the subject. Writing to Mr. Newton, he says:—"I am sensible of the tenderness and affectionate kindness with which you recollect our past intercourse, and express your hopes of my future restoration. I too, within the last eight months, have had my hopes, though they have been of short duration, cut off; like the foam upon the waters. Some previous adjustments, indeed are necessary before a lasting expectation of comfort can take place in me. There are those persuasions in my mind, which either entirely forbid the entrance of hope, or, if it enter, immediately eject it. They are incompatible with any such inmate, and must be turned out themselves before so desirable a guest can possibly have secure possession. This you say, will be done. It may be; but it is not done yet; nor has a single step in the course of God's dealings with me been taken towards it. If I mend, no creature ever mended so slowly, that recovered at last. I am like a slug, or a snail, that has fallen into a deep well; slug as he is, he performs his descent with a velocity proportioned to his weight; but he does not crawl up again quite so fast. Mine was a rapid plunge; but my return to daylight, if I am indeed returning, is leisurely enough. Were I such as I once was, I should say that I have a claim upon your particular notice, which nothing ought to supercede. Most of your connections you may fairly be said to have formed by your own act; but your connection with me was the work of God. The kine that went up with the ark from Bathshemesh, left what they loved behind them, in obedience to an impression which to them was perfectly dark and unintelligible. Your journey to Huntingdon was not less wonderful. He indeed, who sent you, knew well wherefore, but you knew not. That dispensation, therefore, would furnish me as long as we can both remember it, with a plea for some distinction at your hands, had I occasion to use and urge it, which I have not. But I am altered since that time; and if your affection for me had ceased, you might very reasonably justify your change by mine. I can say nothing for myself at present: but this I can venture to foretell, that should the restoration of which my friends assure me obtain, I shall undoubtedly love those who have continued to love me, even in a state of transformation from my former self, much more than ever."

It is gratifying to know, that, while such was the melancholy state of Cowper's mind, and while he steadily refused all religious comfort, come whence it might, he nevertheless afforded the most pleasing proofs by his amiable and consistent conduct, of the firm hold which religion still had of his affections. The excellent remarks that are to be found in his letters, written at this period, show that he had some lucid intervals, and that occasional gleams of light shot across the darkened horizon of his mind. "It strikes me," (he says on one occasion,) "as a very observable instance of providential kindness to man, that such an exact accordance had been contrived between his ear and the sounds with which, at least in a rural situation, it is almost every moment visited. All the world is sensible of the uncomfortable effect that certain sounds have upon the nerves, and consequently upon the spirits: and if a sinful world had been filled with such as would have curdled the blood, and have made the sense of hearing a perpetual inconvenience, I do not know that we should have had a right to complain. But now the fields, the woods, and the gardens, have each their concerts, and the ear of man is for ever regaled by creatures, who, while they please themselves, at the same time delight him. Even the ears that are deaf to the gospel, are continually entertained, though without appreciating it, by sounds, for which they are solely indebted to its author. There is somewhere in infinite space, a world that does not roll within the precincts of mercy, and as it is reasonable, and even scriptural to suppose, that there is music in heaven, in these dismal regions perhaps the reverse of it is found; tones so dismal, as to make woe itself more insupportable, and even to acuminate despair."

In a letter to Mr. Newton, the following serious reflections occur:—"People that are but little acquainted with the terrors of divine wrath, are not much afraid of trifling with their Maker. But for my own part, I would sooner take Empledocles' leap, and fling myself into mount Etna, than I would do it in the slightest instance, were I in circumstances to make an election. In the scripture we find a broad and clear exhibition of mercy, it is displayed in every page. Wrath is in comparison, but slightly touched upon, because it is not so much a discovery of wrath as of forgiveness. But had the displeasure of God been the principal subject of the book, and had it circumstantially set forth that measure of it only which may be endured in this life, the Christian world would perhaps, have been less comfortable; but I believe presumptuous meddlers with the gospel would have been less frequently met with."

To Mr. Unwin he thus writes: "Take my word for it, the word of a man singularly qualified to give his evidence in this matter, who having enjoyed the privilege some years, has been deprived of it more, and has no hope that he shall live to recover it. Those that have found a God, and are permitted to worship him, have found a treasure, of which, highly as they may prize it, they have but very scanty and limited conceptions. These are my Sunday morning speculations—the sound of the bells suggested them, or rather gave them such an emphasis, that they force their way into my pen in spite of me; for though I do not often commit them to paper, they are never absent from my mind."

"You express sorrow, that your love of Christ was excited in you, by a picture. Could the most insignificant thing suggest to me the thought that Christ is precious, I would not despise the thought. The meanness of the instrument cannot debase the nobleness of the principle. He that kneels to a picture of Christ is an idolator; but he in whose heart, the sight of such a picture kindles a warm remembrance of the Saviour's suffering, must be a Christian. Suppose that I dream as Gardiner did, that Christ walks before me, that he turns and smiles upon me, and fills my soul with ineffable love and joy. Will a man tell me that I am deceived, that I ought not to love or rejoice in him for such a reason, because a dream is merely a picture drawn upon the imagination? I hold not with such divinity. To love Christ is the greatest dignity of man, be that affection wrought in him how it may."

No person ever formed more correct views of what really constitutes Christianity than Cowper, nor could any one ever feel a greater aversion to a mere profession of it. In a letter to one of his correspondents, the following remarks occur: "I say amen, with all my heart, to your observations on religious characters. Men who profess themselves adepts in mathematical knowledge, in astronomy, or jurisprudence, are generally as well qualified as they would appear. The reason may be, that they are always liable to detection, should they attempt to impose upon mankind, and therefore take care to be what they pretend. In religion alone, a profession is often slightly taken up, and slovenly carried on, because forsooth, candour and charity require us to hope the best, and to judge favourably of our neighbour; and because it is easy to deceive the ignorant, who are a great majority, upon this subject. Let a man attach himself to a particular party, contend furiously for what are properly called evangelical doctrines, and enlist himself under the banner of some popular preacher, and the business is done. Behold a Christian! a saint! a phœnix! In the meantime perhaps his heart, his temper, and even his conduct, is unsanctified: possibly less exemplary than that of some avowed infidels. No matter, he can talk, he has the Bible in his pocket, and a head well stored with notions. But the quiet, humble, modest, and peaceable person, who is in his practice what the other is only in his profession, who hates a noise about religion, and therefore makes none, who, knowing the snares that are in the world, keeps himself as much out of it as he can, and never enters it but when duty calls, and even then with fear and trembling—is the Christian that will always stand highest in the estimation of those who bring all characters to the test of true wisdom, and judge of the tree by its fruits."

In another letter, on a similar subject, he thus writes:—"It is indeed a melancholy consideration, that the gospel, whose direct tendency is to promote the happiness of mankind in the present, as well as in the life to come, which so effectually answers the design of its author, whenever it is well understood and sincerely believed, should, through the ignorance, the bigotry, the superstition of its professors, and the ambition of popes and princes, have produced incidentally so much mischief; only furnishing the world with a plausible pretext to worry each other, while they sanctified the worst cause with the specious pretext of zeal, for the furtherance of the best. Angels descend from heaven to publish peace between man and his Maker—the Prince of Peace himself comes to confirm and establish it; and war, hatred, and desolation are the consequence. Thousands quarrel about the interpretation of a book, which none of them understand. He that is slain, dies firmly persuaded that the crown of martyrdom awaits him; he that slew him, is equally convinced that he has done God service. In reality they are both mistaken and equally unentitled to the honour they have arrogated to themselves. If a multitude of blind men should set out for a certain city, and dispute about the right road till a battle ensued between them, the probable effect would be that none of them would ever reach it: and such a fray, preposterous and shocking in the extreme, would exhibit a picture in some degree resembling the original of which we have been speaking. And why is not the world thus occupied at present? only because they have exchanged a zeal that was no better than madness for an indifference equally pitiable and absurd. The holy sepulchre has lost its importance in the eyes of nations, called Christians, not because the light of true wisdom has delivered them from a superstitious attachment to the spot, but because he that was buried in it is no longer regarded by them as the Saviour of the world. The exercise of reason, enlightened by philosophy, has cured them indeed of the misery of an abused understanding, but together with the delusion they have lost the substance, and for the sake of the lies that were grafted upon it, have quarrelled with the truth itself. Here then we see the ne plus ultra of human wisdom, at least in affairs of religion. It enlightens the mind with respect to non-essentials, but with respect to that in which the essence of Christianity consists, leaves it perfectly in the dark. It can discover many errors that in different ages have disgraced the faith, but it is only to make way for one more fatal than them all, which represents that faith as a delusion. Why those evils have been permitted shall be known hereafter. One thing, in the meantime, is certain, that the folly and frenzy of the professed disciples of the gospel, have been more dangerous to its interests, than all the avowed hostilities of its adversaries, and perhaps for this cause, these mischiefs might be suffered to prevail for a season, that its divine original and nature might be the more illustrated, when it should appear that it was able to stand its ground for ages, against that most formidable of all attacks—the indiscretion of its friends. The outrages that have followed this perversion of the truth, have proved, indeed a stumbling-block to individuals; the wise of this world, with all their wisdom, have not been able to distinguish between the blessing and the abuse of it. Voltaire was offended, and Gibbon has turned his back, but the flock of Christ is still nourished, and still increases, notwithstanding the unbelief of a philosopher is able to convert bread into a stone, and fish into a serpent."

The following very serious reflections occur, in a letter to Mr. Newton, about this time, adverting to the sufferings of the poor at Olney, whose distressing circumstances on all occasions excited the tenderest sympathies of the poet:—"The winter sets in with great severity. The rigour of the season, and the advanced price of provisions, are very threatening to the poor. It is well with those that can feed upon a promise and wrap themselves up warm in the robe of salvation. A good fire-side and a well-spread table are but indifferent substitutes for these better accommodations; so very indifferent, that I would gladly exchange them both for the rags and the unsatisfied hunger of the poorest creature, that looks forward with the hope to a better world, and weeps tears of joy in the midst of penury and distress. What a a world is this! How myteriously governed, and, in appearance, left to itself. One man, having squandered thousands at a gaming-table, finds it convenient to travel; gives his estate to somebody to manage for him; amuses himself a few years in France and Italy; returns, perhaps, wiser than he went, having acquired knowledge, which, but for his follies, he would never have acquired; again makes a splendid figure at home, shines in the senate, governs his country as its minister, is admired for his abilities, and if successful, adored, at least by a party. When he dies he is praised as a demigod, and his monument records everything but his vices. The exact contrast of such a picture is to be found in many cottages at Olney. I have no need to describe them, you know the characters I mean; they love God, they trust him, they pray to him in secret, and though he means to reward them openly, the day of recompense is delayed. In the meantime they suffer everything that infirmity and poverty can inflict upon them. Who would suspect, that has not a spiritual eye to discern it, that the fine gentleman might possibly be one whom his Maker had in abhorrence, and the wretch last mentioned, dear to him as the apple of his eye? It is no wonder that the world, who only look at things as they are connected with the present life, find themselves obliged, some of them at least, to doubt a providence, and others absolutely to deny it: when almost all the real virtue there is to be found in it, exists in a state of neglected obscurity, and all the vices cannot exclude them from the privilege of worship and honour. But behind the curtain the matter will be explained; very little, however, to the satisfaction of the great."

CHAPTER X.

Publication of Cowper's second volume of poems—Manner in which it was received by the public—His feelings on the occasion—Great self-abasement—Renewal of his correspondence with Lady Hesketh—acceptance of her proffered assistance—Her projected visit to Olney—Cowper's pleasing anticipations of its results—Her arrival—Cowper's removal from Olney to Weston—His intimacy with the Throckmortons—Happiness it afforded him.

Cowper's second volume of poems, the publication of which had been delayed much longer than was expected, appeared at length, in the summer of 1785. His first volume, though it had not met with that success which might have been expected, had nevertheless, been extensively circulated, and was spoken of highly by some of the first literary characters of the age. It had, therefore, raised the expectations of the public and had thus made way for its successor, which no sooner made its appearance than it was eagerly sought after, and met with a rapid and extensive sale. High as had been the expectations of his friends, they fell far short of what he had accomplished in that brilliant display of real poetical talent everywhere to be found in the Task. The singularity of the title made its first appearance somewhat repulsive; its various and matchless beauties were however soon discovered, and it speedily raised the reputation of Cowper to the highest summit of poetic genius, and placed him among the first class of poets.

In a letter to Mr. Newton, he describes his feelings on this occasion, in such a manner as proves him to have been influenced by nothing like selfish or ambitious motives; but by principles far more noble and exalted:—"I found your account of what you experienced in your state of maiden authorship very entertaining, because very natural. I suppose no man ever made his first sally from the press without a conviction that all eyes and ears would be engaged to attend him, at least without a thousand anxieties lest they should not.—But, however arduous and interesting such an enterprise may be in the first instance, it seems to me that our feelings on the occasion soon become obtuse. I can answer at least for one. Mine are by no means what they were when I published my first volume. I am even so indifferent to the matter, that I can truly assert myself guiltless of the very idea of my book sometimes for whole days together. God knows that my mind having been occupied more than twelve years in the contemplation of the most distressing subjects, the world, and its opinion of what I write, is become as unimportant to me as the whistling of a bird in a bush. Despair made amusement necessary, and I found poetry the most agreeable amusement. Had I not endeavoured to perform my best, it would not have amused me at all. The mere blotting of so much paper would have been but indifferent sport. God gave me grace also to wish that I might not write in vain. Accordingly I have mingled much truth with some trifle; and such truths as deserved at least to be clad as well and as handsomely as I could clothe them. If the world approve me not, so much the worse for them, but not for me, I have only endeavoured to serve them, and the loss will be their own. And as to their commendations, if I should chance to win them, I feel myself equally invulnerable there. The view that I have had of myself, for many years, has been so truly humiliating, that I think the praises of all mankind could not hurt me. God knows that I speak my present sense of the matter at least most truly, when I say, that the admiration of creatures like myself seems to me a weapon the least dangerous that my worst enemy could employ against me. I am fortified against it by such solidity of real self-abasement, that I deceive myself most egregiously, if I do not heartily despise it. Praise belongeth to God: and I seem to myself to covet it no more than I covet divine honours. Could I assuredly hope that God would at last deliver me, I should have reason to thank him for all that I have suffered, were it only for the sake of this single fruit of my affliction—that it has taught me how much more contemptible I am in myself than I ever before suspected, and has reduced my former share of self-knowledge (of which at that time I had a tolerable good opinion) to a mere nullity, in comparison to what I have acquired since. Self is a subject of inscrutable misery and mischief, and can never be studied to so much advantage as in the dark; for as the bright beams of the sun seems to impart a beauty to the most unsightly objects, so the light of God's countenance, vouchsafed to a fallen creature, so sweetens him and softens him for the time, that he seems both to others and to himself, to have nothing selfish or sordid about him. But the heart is a nest of serpents, and will be such while it continues to beat. If God cover the mouth of that nest with his hand, they are hush and snug; but if he withdraw his hand the whole family lift up their heads and hiss, and are as active and venomous as ever. This I always professed to believe from the time that I had embraced the truth, but I never knew it as I know it now. To what end I have been made to know it as I do, whether for the benefit of others or for my own, or for both, or for neither, will appear hereafter."

While Cowper looked upon his publication with so much indifference, his friends regarded it with very opposite feelings. Its rapid and extensive circulation, not only delighted those who were intimately associated with him, and had been witnesses to the acute anguish of his mind, during his depressive malady, but it also gratified several of his former associates and correspondents, and induced them to renew their communications with the poet. Among these was Lady Hesketh, who was so charmed with productions of his pen, that on her return from abroad, where she had spent several years with her husband, she renewed her correspondence with Cowper, and as she was now a widow and was handsomely provided for, she generously offered to render him any assistance he might want. Cowper's reply to an affectionate letter she wrote him, shows the warmth of his affection towards those whom he loved. He thus writes:—"My dear Cousin, It is no new thing for you to give pleasure. But I will venture to say that you do not often give more than you gave me this morning. When I came down to breakfast and found on the table, a letter franked by my uncle, and when opening that frank, I found that it contained a letter from you, I said within myself, This is just as it should be. We are all grown young again, and the days that I thought I should see no more, are actually returned. You perceive, therefore, that you judged well when you conjectured that a line from you would not be disagreeable to me. It could not be otherwise than as in fact it has proved, a most agreeable surprise. For I can truly boast of an affection for you that neither years nor intercepted intercourse have at all abated. I need only recollect how much I valued you once, and with how much cause, immediately to feel a revival of the same value; if that can be said to revive, which at the most has only been dormant for want of employment. But I slander it when I say it has slept. A thousand times have I recollected a thousand scenes, in which our two selves have formed the whole of the drama, with the greatest pleasure at times too, when I had no reason to suppose that I should ever hear from you again. The hours that I have spent with you, were among the pleasantest of my former days, and are therefore chronicled in my mind so deeply as to fear no erasure. You say that you have often heard of me; that puzzles me. I cannot imagine from what quarter; but it is no matter. I must tell you however, my dear cousin, that your information has been a little defective. That I am happy in my situation is true; I live, and have lived these twenty years, with Mrs. Unwin, to whose affectionate care of me, during the far greater part of that time, it is, under Divine Providence owing that I live at all. But I do not account myself happy in having been for thirteen of those years in a state of mind that has made all that care and attention necessary. An attention and a care, that have injured her health, and which, had she not been uncommonly supported, must have brought her to the grave. But I will pass to another subject; it would be cruel to particularize only to give pain, neither should I by any means give a sable hue to the first letter of a correspondence so unexpectedly renewed. I must, however, tell you, my dear cousin, that dejection of spirits, which I suppose, may have prevented many a man from becoming an author has made me one. I find constant employment necessary, and therefore take care to be constantly employed. Manual occupations do not engage the mind sufficiently, as I know by experience, having tried many. But composition, especially of verse, absorbs it wholly. I write therefore generally three hours in the morning, and in the evening I transcribe. I read also, but less than I write, for I must have bodily exercise, and therefore never pass a day without it.

"I do not seek new friends, not being altogether sure that I should find them, but have unspeakable pleasure in being beloved by an old one. I hope that our correspondence has now suffered its last interruption, and that we shall go down together to the grave, chattering and chirping as happily as such a scene as this will permit. I am happy that my poems have pleased you. My volume has afforded me no such pleasure at any time, either while I was writing it, or since its publication, as I have derived from yours and my uncle's favourable opinion respecting it. I make certain allowances for partiality, and for that peculiar quickness of taste, with which you both relish what you like, and after all drawbacks upon those accounts, duly made, find myself rich in the measure of your approbation, that still remains. But above all I honour John Gilpin, since it was he who first encouraged you to write. I made him on purpose to laugh at, and he served his purpose well; but I am now indebted to him for a more valuable acquisition than all the laughter in the world amounts to, the recovery of my intercourse with you, which is to me inestimable. I am glad that I always loved you as I did. It releases me from any occasion to suspect that my present affection for you is indebted for its existence to any selfish considerations. No, I am sure I love you disinterestedly, and for your own sake, because I never thought of you with any other sensations, than those of the truest affection, even while I was under the persuasion, that I should never hear from you again. But with my present feelings superadded to those that I always had for you, I find it no easy matter to do justice to my sensations. I perceive myself in a state of mind, similar to that of the traveller described in Pope's Messiah, who, as he passes through a sandy desert, starts at the sudden and unexpected sound of a water-fall.—Your very generous offer of assistance has placed me in a situation new to me, and in which I feel myself somewhat puzzled how to behave. When I was once asked if I wanted anything, and given delicately to understand that the inquirer was ready to supply all my occasions, I thankfully and civilly, but positively declined the favour. I neither suffer nor have suffered such inconveniences, as I had not much rather endure, than come under an obligation to a person, who is almost a stranger to me. But to you I answer otherwise. I know you thoroughly, and the liberality of your disposition, and have that consummate confidence in the sincerity of your wish to serve me, that delivers me from all awkward constraint, and from all fear of trespassing by acceptance. To you therefore I reply, yes. Whensoever and whatsoever, and in what manner soever, you please, and add moreover, that my affection for the giver is such as will increase to me tenfold the satisfaction I shall have in receiving. You must not, however, strain any points to your own inconvenience or hurt; there is no need of it; but indulge yourself in communicating (no matter what) that you can spare without missing it, since by so doing you will be sure to add to the comforts of my life, one of the sweetest that I can enjoy—a token and a proof of your affection. At the same time that I would not grieve you by putting a check upon your bounty, I would be as careful not to abuse it, as if I were a miser, and the question were, not about your money but my own."

The happiest consequences resulted from the renewal of Cowper's correspondence with this accomplished and excellent lady. After an interchange of some of the most interesting letters that were ever written, she proposed at length to pay the sequestered poet a visit at Olney, and made arrangements accordingly. The following extracts from Cowper's letters to her on this occasion will be read with pleasure, as a faithful record of the delight he anticipated from this interview:—"I have been impatient to tell you, that I am impatient to see you again. Mrs. Unwin partakes with me in all my feelings. Let me assure you, that your kindness in promising us a visit, has charmed us both. I shall see you again, I shall hear your voice. We shall take walks together. I will show you my prospects—the hovel, the alcove, the Ouse, and its banks, everything that I have described. I anticipate the pleasure of those days not very far distant, and feel a part of it this moment. My dear, I will not let you come till the end of May or the beginning of June, because before that time my green-house will not be ready to receive us, and it is the only pleasant room belonging to us. When the plants go out, we go in. I line it with nets, and spread the floor with mats; and there you shall sit, with a bed of mignonette at your side, and a hedge of honeysuckles, roses, and jasmine; and I will make you a bouquet of myrtle every day. We now talk of nobody but you—what we will do with you when we get you, where you shall walk, where you shall sleep, in short everything that bears the remotest relation to your well-being at Olney occupies all our talking time, which is all that I do not spend at Troy. Mrs. Unwin has already secured for you an apartment, or rather two, just such as we could wish. The house in which you will find them is within thirty yards of our own, and opposite to it. The whole affair is thus commodiously adjusted; and now I have nothing to do but to wish for June; and June, my cousin, was never so wished for since June was made. I shall have a thousand things to hear, and a thousand to say, and they will all rush into my mind together, till it will be so crowded with things impatient to be said, that for some time I shall say nothing. But no matter—sooner or later they will all come out. After so long a separation, a separation, which of late seemed so likely to last for life, we shall meet each other as alive from the dead; and, for my own part, I can truly say, that I have not a friend in the other world whose resurrection would give me greater pleasure."

"If you will not quote Solomon, my dearest cousin, I will. He says, and as beautifully as truly, 'Hope deferred maketh the heart sick, but when the desire cometh, it is a tree of life!' I feel how much reason he had on his side when he made this observation, and am myself really sick of your delay. Well, the middle of June will not always be a thousand years off; and when it comes, I shall hear you, and see you too, and shall not care a single farthing if you do not touch a pen for a month. From this very morning, 15th May, 1786, I begin to date the last month of our long separation; and confidently, the most comfortable hope, that before the fifteenth of June shall present itself, we shall have seen each other. Is it not so? and will it not be one of the most extraordinary eras of my extraordinary life? A year ago we neither corresponded, nor expected to meet in this world. But the world is a scene of marvellous events, many of them more marvellous than fiction itself would dare to hazard; (blessed be God!) they are not all of the distressing kind. Now and then, in the course of an existence, whose hue is for the most part sable, a day turns up that makes amends for many sighs, and many subjects of complaint. Such a day shall I account the day of your arrival at Olney. Wherefore is it (canst thou tell me) that, together with all these delightful sensations, to which the sight of a long absent dear friend gives birth, there is a mixture of something painful, flutterings and tumults, and I know not what accompaniments of our pleasure, that are in fact perfectly foreign from the occasion? Such I feel when I think of our meeting, and such, I suppose, feel you; and the nearer the crisis approaches, the more I am sensible of them. I know beforehand that they will increase with every turn of the wheels that shall convey you to Olney; and when we actually meet, the pleasure, and this unaccountable pain together, will be as much as I shall be able to support. I am utterly at a loss for the cause, and can only resolve it into that appointment, by which it has been foreordained that all human delights shall be qualified and mingled with their contraries. But a fig for them all! Let us resolve to combat with, and to conquer them. They are dreams; they are illusions of the judgment. Some enemy that hates the happiness of human kind, and is ever industrious to dash, if he cannot destroy it, works them in us, and they being so perfectly unreasonable as they are, is a proof of it. Nothing that is such can be the work of a good agent. This I know too by experience, that, like all other illusions, they exist only by force of imagination, are indebted for their prevalence to the absence of their object, and in a few moments after their appearance cease. So then this is a settled point, and the case stands thus. You will tremble as you draw near to Olney, and so shall I; but we will both recollect that there is no reason why we should, and this recollection will, at least, have some little effect in our favour. We will likewise both take the comfort of what we know to be true, that the tumult will soon cease, and the pleasure long survive the pain, even as long, I trust, as we ourselves shall survive it. Assure yourself, my dear cousin, that both for your sake, since you make a point of it, and for my own, I will be as philosophically careful as possible, and these fine nerves of mine shall not be beyond measure agitated when you arrive. In truth, there is a much greater probability that they will be benefited, and greatly too. Joy of heart, from whatever occasion it may arise, is the best of all nervous medicines; and I should not wonder, if such a turn given to my spirits should have even a lasting effect, of the most advantageous kind, upon them. You must not imagine neither, that I am, on the whole, in any great degree, subject to nervous affections: occasionally I am, and have been these many years, much liable to dejection; but, at intervals, and sometimes for an interval of weeks, no creature would suspect it. For I have not, that which commonly is a symptom of such a case belonging to me: I mean occasional extraordinary elevation. When I am in the best health, my tide of animal sprightliness flows with great equality, so that I am never, at any time, exalted in proportion as I am sometimes depressed. My depression has a cause, and if the cause were to cease, I should be as cheerful thenceforth, and perhaps for ever, as any man need be."

"Your visit is delayed too long, to my impatience, at least it seems so, who find the spring, backward as it is, too forward, because many of its beauties will have faded before you will have an opportunity to see them. We took our customary walk yesterday, and saw, with regret, the laburnums, syringas, and guelder roses, some of them blown, and others just upon the point of blowing, and could not help observing, that all these will be gone before Lady Hesketh comes. Still, however, there will be roses, and jasmine, and honey-suckle, and shady walks, and cool alcoves, and you will partake them with us. But I want you to have a share of everything that is delightful here, and cannot bear that the advance of the season should steal away a single pleasure before you come to enjoy it. I will venture to say, that even you were never so much expected in your life."

"I regret that I have made your heart ache so often, my dear cousin, with talking about my fits of dejection. Something has happened that has led me to the subject, or I would have mentioned them more sparingly. Do not suppose that I treat you with reserve; there is nothing in which I am concerned that you shall not be made acquainted with. But the tale is too long for a letter: I will only add, for your present satisfaction, that the cause is not exterior, that it is not within the reach of human aid, and that yet I have a hope myself, and Mrs. Unwin a strong persuasion of its removal. I am indeed even now, and have been for a considerable time, sensible of a change for the better, and expect, with good reason, a comfortable lift from you. Guess then, my beloved cousin, with what wishes I look forward to the time of your arrival, from whose coming I promise myself not only pleasure, but peace of mind, at least an additional share of it. At present it is an uncertain and transient guest with me; but the joy with which I shall see, and converse with you, at Olney, may, perhaps, make it an abiding one."

It is seldom that pleasure, anticipated with such warmth of feeling, fully answers our expectations. Human enjoyments almost invariably seem much more valuable in prospect than in possession. Cowper's interview with his cousin, however, was altogether an exception, and proved a source of more real delight to both parties than either of them had expected. As might naturally be supposed, after a separation of three-and-twenty years, they both experienced the full force of those emotions, which Cowper had so well described in his letters, and their first meeting was, indeed, painfully pleasing; every sensation, however, that was in any degree painful, soon subsided, and gave place to such only as were pure and delightful. Mrs. Unwin was pleased with the sweetness of temper, agreeable manners, and cheerful conversation of Lady Hesketh, and her ladyship was no less delighted with the mild, amiable, and affectionate conduct of her new companion; while Cowper's heart was gladdened to have the advantage of daily intercourse with another highly cultivated mind."

The happy effect this change had upon Cowper's spirits will be seen by the following extracts from his correspondence:—"My dear cousin's arrival, as it could not fail to do, has made us happier than we ever were at Olney. Her great kindness, in giving us her company, is a cordial that I shall feel the effect of, not only while she is here, but while I live. She has been with us a fortnight. She pleases everybody, and is, in her turn, pleased with everything she finds here; is always cheerful and good tempered; and knows no pleasure equal to that of communicating pleasure to us, and to all around her. This disposition in her is the more comfortable, because it is not the humour of the day, a sudden flash of benevolence and goodness, occasioned merely by a change of scene, but it is her natural turn, and has governed all her conduct ever since I knew her first. We are consequently happy in her society, and shall be happier still to have you partake with us in our joy. I am fond of the sound of bells, but was never more pleased with those of Olney than when they rang her into her new habitation. She is, as she ever was, my pride and my joy; and I am delighted with everything that means to do her honour. Her first appearance was too much for me; my spirits, instead of being gently raised, broke down with me, under the pressure of too much joy, and left me flat, or rather melancholy, throughout the day, to a degree that was mortifying to myself, and alarming to her. But I have made amends for this torture since; and, in point of cheerfulness, have far exceeded her expectations, for she knew that sable had been my suit for many years. By her help we get change of air and of scene, though still resident at Olney; and by her means, have intercourse with some families in this country, with whom, but for her, we could never have been acquainted. Her presence here would at any time, even in her happiest days, have been a comfort to me; but in the present day I am doubly sensible of its value. She leaves nothing unsaid, nothing undone, that she thinks will be conducive to our well-being; and so far as she is concerned, I have nothing to wish, but that I could believe her sent hither in mercy to myself; then I should be thankful."

Lady Hesketh had not long been at Olney before she became dissatisfied with the poet's residence. She thought it a situation altogether unsuitable for a person subject to depression. Cowper himself had often entertained the same opinion respecting it; and both he and Mrs. Unwin had frequently wished for a change, and had, indeed, been looking out for a house more agreeable to their taste. At that time a very commodious cottage, pleasantly situated in the village of Weston Underwood, a mile and a half distant from Olney, belonging to Sir John Throckmorton, was unoccupied. It occurred to Cowper, that this would be a very agreeable summer residence for his cousin; and on his mentioning it to her, she immediately engaged it, not for herself only, but for the future residence of the poet and his amiable companion, with whom she had now made up her mind to become a frequent, if not a constant associate. The following extracts will best describe Cowper's feelings on this occasion:—"I shall now communicate news that will give you pleasure. When you first contemplated the front of our abode, you were shocked. In your eyes it had the appearance of a prison, and you sighed at the thought that your mother lived in it. Your view of it was not only just, but prophetic. It had not only the aspect of a place built for the purposes of incarceration, but has actually served that purpose, through the long, long period, that we have been the prisoners; but a gaol delivery is at hand. The bolts and bars are to be loosed, and we shall escape. A very different mansion, both in point of appearance and accommodation, expects us; and the expense of living in it will not be much greater than we are subjected to in this. It is situated at Weston, one of the prettiest villages in England, and belongs to Mr. Throckmorton, afterwards Sir John Throckmorton. We all three dine with him to-day by invitation, and shall survey it in the afternoon, point out the necessary repairs and finally adjust the treaty. I have my cousin's promise that she will never let a year pass without a visit to us, and the house is large enough to take us, and our suite, and her also, with as many of her's as she shall choose to bring. The change will, I hope, prove advantageous, both to your mother and to me, in all respects. Here we have no neighbourhood; there we shall have much agreeable neighbours in the Throckmortons. Here we have a bad air in the winter, impregnated with the fishy-smelling fumes of the marsh miasma; there we shall breathe in an atmosphere untainted. Here we are confined from September to March, and sometimes longer; there we shall be upon the very verge of pleasure grounds, upon which we can always ramble, and shall not wade through almost impassable dirt to get at them. Both your mother's constitution and mine have suffered materially by such close and long confinement; and it is high time, unless we intend to retreat into the grave, that we should seek out a more wholesome residence. So far is well; the rest is left to Heaven."

To his friend Mr. Newton, he thus writes:—"You have heard of our intended removal. The house that is to receive us is in a state of preparation, and when finished, will be both smarter and more commodious than our present abode. But the circumstance that recommends it chiefly is its situation. Long confinement in the winter, and indeed, for the most part in the autumn too, has hurt us both. A gravel walk, thirty yards long, affords but indifferent scope to the locomotive faculty; yet it is all that we have had to move in for eight months in the year, during thirteen years that I have been a prisoner. Had I been confined in the Tower, the battlements of it would have furnished me with a larger space. You say well, that there was a time when I was happy at Olney; and I am now as happy at Olney, as I expect to be anywhere, without the presence of God. Change of situation is with me no otherwise an object, than as both Mrs. Unwin's health and my own happen to be concerned in it. We are both I believe partly indebted for our respective maladies, to an atmosphere encumbered with raw vapours, issuing from flooded meadows, and we have perhaps fared the worse for sitting so often, and sometimes for several successive months, over a cellar, filled with water. These ills we shall escape in the uplands: and as we may reasonably hope, of course, their consequences. But as for happiness, he that once had communion with his Maker, must be more frantic than ever I was yet, if he can dream of finding it at a distance from him. I no more expect happiness at Weston than here, or than I should expect it in company with felons and outlaws in the hold of a ballast-lighter. Animal spirits, however, have their value, and are especially desirable to him who is condemned to carry a burden which at any rate will tire him, but which without their aid, cannot fail to crush him."

On the 15th November, 1786, Cowper entered upon his new abode. The following extracts from his letters describe his sensations on the occasion:—"There are some things that do not exactly shorten the life of man, yet seem to do so, and frequent removals from place to place are of that number. For my own part, at least, I am apt to think, if I had been more stationary, I should seem to myself to have lived longer. My many changes of habitation have divided my time into many short periods; and when I look back upon them they appear only as the stages of a day's journey, the first of which is at no great distance from the last. I lived longer at Olney than anywhere. There indeed I lived till mouldering walls and a tottering house warned me to depart. I have accordingly taken the hint, and two days since arrived, or rather took up my abode, at Weston. You perhaps have never made the experiment, but I can assure you that the confusion that attends a transmigration of this kind is infinite, and has a terrible effect in deranging the intellect. When God speaks to a chaos, it becomes a scene of order and harmony in a moment; but when his creatures have thrown one house into confusion by leaving it, and another by tumbling themselves and their goods into it, not less than many days' labour and contrivance are necessary to give them their proper places. And it belongs to furniture of all kinds, however convenient it may be in its place, to be a nuisance out of it. We find ourselves here in a comfortable house. Such it is in itself; and my cousin, who has spared no expense in dressing it up for us, has made it a genteel one. Such, at least, it will be, when its contents are a little harmonized. She left us on Tuesday, and on Wednesday, Mrs. Unwin and I took possession of our new abode. I could not help giving a last look to my old prison, and its precincts; and though I cannot easily account for it, having been miserable there so many years, felt something like a heart-ache, when I took my leave of a scene, that certainly in itself had nothing to engage my affection. But I recollected that I had once been happy there, and could not, without tears in my eyes, bid adieu to a place in which God had so often found me. The human mind is a great mystery; mine, at least, appears to be such upon this occasion. I found that I not only had a tenderness for that ruinous abode, because it had once known me happy in the presence of God, but that even the distress I had there suffered, for so long a time, on account of his absence, had endeared it to me as much. I was weary of every object, had long wished for a change, yet could not take leave without a pang at parting. What consequences are to attend our removal, God only knows. I know well that it is not in the power of situation to effect a cure of melancholy like mine. The change, however, has been entirely a providential one; for much as I wished it, I never uttered that wish, except to Mrs. Unwin. When I learned that the house was to be let, and had seen it, I had a strong desire that Lady Hesketh should take it for herself, if she should happen to like the country. That desire, indeed, is not exactly fulfilled, and yet, upon the whole, is exceeded. We are the tenants; but she assures us that we shall often have her for a guest, and here is room enough for us all. You, I hope, my dear friend, and Mrs. Newton, will want no assurances to convince you that you will always be received here with the sincerest welcome, more welcome than you have been you cannot be, but better accommodated you may and will be."

CHAPTER XI.

Extracts from his correspondence—Description of the deep seriousness that generally pervaded his mind—His remarks to justify his removal from Olney—Vindicates himself and Mrs. Unwin from unjust aspersions—Reasons for undertaking the translation of Homer—His opinion of Pope's—Unremitting attention to his own—Immense pains he bestowed upon it—His readiness to avail himself of the assistance of others—Vexation he experienced from a multiplicity of critics—Just remarks upon criticism—Determination to persevere in his work—Justifies himself for undertaking it—Pleasure he took in relieving the poor—Renewal of his correspondence with General Cowper and the Rev. Dr. Bagot—Consolatory letter to the latter.

The extracts we have already made from Cowper's correspondence prove, unquestionably, that the leading bias of his mind was towards the all-important concerns of religion. As an exhibition, however, of the state of his mind in this respect, at least, up to the close of 1786, the period of his removal to Weston, we think the following extracts cannot fail to be interesting. To Mr. Newton he writes as follows:—"Those who enjoy the means of grace, and know how to use them well, will thrive anywhere; others no where. More than a few, who were formerly ornaments of this garden, which you once watered, here flourished, and have seemed to wither, and become, as the apostle James strongly expresses it—twice dead—plucked up by the roots; others transplanted into a soil, apparently less favourable to their growth, either find the exchange an advantage, or at least, are not injured by it. Of myself, who had once both leaves and fruit, but who have now neither, I say nothing, or only this—that when I am overwhelmed with despair, I repine at my barrenness, and think it hard to be thus blighted; but when a glimpse of hope breaks in upon me, I am then contented to be the sapless thing I am, knowing that he who has commanded me to wither, can command me to flourish again when he pleases. My experiences, however, of this latter kind, are rare and transient. The light that reaches me cannot be compared either to that of the sun, or of the moon; it is a flash in a dark night, during which the heavens seem opened only to shut again. I should be happy (and when I say this, I mean to be understood in the fullest and most emphatical sense of the word) if my frame of mind were such as to permit me to study the important truths of religion. But Adam's approach to the tree of life, after he had sinned, was not more effectually prohibited by the flaming sword that turned every way, than mine to its great Antitype has been now almost these thirteen years, a short interval of three or four days, which passed about this time twelvemonth, alone excepted. For what reason I am thus long excluded, if I am ever again to be admitted, is known to God only. I can say but this, that if he is still my father, his paternal severity has, towards me, been such as to give me reason to account it unexampled. For though others have suffered desertion, yet few, I believe, for so long a time, and perhaps none a desertion accompanied with such experience. But they have this belonging to them: that as they are not fit for recital, being made up merely of infernal ingredients, so neither are they susceptible of it, for I know no language in which they could be expressed. They are as truly things which it is not possible for man to utter, as those were which Paul heard and saw in the third heaven. If the ladder of Christian experience reaches, as I suppose it does, to the very presence of God, it has nevertheless its foot in the abyss. And if Paul stood, as no doubt he did, on the topmost stave of it, I have been standing, and still stand, on the lowest, in this thirteenth year that has passed since I descended. In such a situation of mind, encompassed by the midnight of absolute despair, and a thousand times filled with unspeakable horror, I first commenced an author. Distress drove me to it; and the impossibility of existing without some employment, still recommends it. I am not, indeed, so perfectly hopeless as I was, but I am equally in need of an occupation, being often as much, and sometimes even more, worried than ever. I cannot amuse myself as I once could with carpenters', or with gardeners' tools, or with squirrels and guinea-pigs. At that time I was a child; but since it has pleased God, whatever else he withholds from me, to restore to me a man's mind, I have put away childish things. Thus far, therefore, it is plain that I have not chosen, or prescribed to myself, my own way, but have been providentially led to it; perhaps I might say, with equal propriety, compelled and scourged into it: for certainly could I have made my choice, or were I permitted to make it even now, those hours which I spend in poetry I would spend with God. But it is evidently his will that I should spend them as I do, because every other way of employing them he himself continues to make impossible. The dealings of God with me are to myself utterly unintelligible. I have never met, either in books, or in conversation, with an experience at all similar to my own. More than twelve months have now passed since I began to hope, that having walked the whole breadth of the bottom of this Red Sea, I was beginning to climb the opposite shore, and I prepared to sing the song of Moses. But I have been disappointed; those hopes have been blasted; those comforts have been wrested from me. I could not be so duped even by the arch-enemy himself as to be made to question the divine nature of them, but I have been made to believe (which you will say is being duped still more) that God gave them to me in derision, and took them away in vengeance. Such, however, is, and has been my persuasion many a long day; and when I shall think on this subject more comfortably, or as you will be inclined to tell me, more rationally and scripturally, I know not. In the meantime I embrace, with alacrity, every alleviation of my case, and with the more alacrity, because, whatever proves a relief of my distress is a cordial to Mrs. Unwin, whose sympathy with me, through the whole of it, has been such, that despair excepted, her burthen has been as heavy as mine."

Some of his friends, and Mr. Newton among the rest, on being apprized of his intended removal from Olney, expressed apprehensions that it would introduce him to company, uncongenial to his taste, if not detrimental to his piety. Adverting to these objections, he thus writes to his esteemed correspondent: "If in the course of such an occupation as I have been driven to by despair, or by the inevitable consequence of it, either my former connections are revived, or new ones occur, these things are as much a part of the dispensation of Providence as the leading points themselves. If his purposes in thus directing me are gracious, he will take care to prove them such in the issue; and, in the meantime, will preserve me (for he is able to do that, in one condition of life as well as in another) from all mistakes that might prove pernicious to myself, or give reasonable offence to others. I can say it, as truly as it was ever spoken, Here I am; let him do with me as seemeth to him good. At present, however, I have no connections, at which either you, I trust, or any who love me, and wish me well, have occasion to conceive alarm. Much kindness indeed I have experienced at the hands of several, some of them near relations, others not related to me at all, but I do not know that there is among them a single person from whom I am likely to catch contamination. I can say of them all, with more truth than Jacob uttered, when he called kid venison, 'The Lord thy God brought them unto me.' I could show you among them two men, whose lives, though they have but little of what we call evangelical light, are ornaments to a Christian country, men who fear God more than some who profess to love him. But I will not particularize further on such a subject. Be they what they may, our situations are so distant, and we are likely to meet so seldom, that were they, as they are not, persons even of exceptionable manners, their manners would have little to do with me. We correspond, at present, only on the subject of what passed at Troy three thousand years ago; and they are matters that, if they can do no good, will at least hurt nobody."

"Your letter to Mrs. Unwin concerning our conduct, and the offence taken at it in our neighbourhood, gave us both a great deal of concern, and she is still deeply affected by it. Of this you may assure yourself, that if our friends in London have been grieved, it is because they have been misinformed, which is the more probable, because the bearers of intelligence hence to London are not always very scrupulous concerning the truth of their reports; and that if any of our serious neighbours have been astonished, they have been so without the slightest occasion. Poor people are never well employed even when they judge one another; but when they undertake to scan the motives, and estimate the behaviour of those whom Providence has raised a little above them, they are utterly out of their province and their depth. They often see us get into Lady Hesketh's carriage, and rather uncharitably suppose that it always carries us into a scene of dissipation, which, in fact, it never does. We visit, indeed, at Mr. Throckmorton's, and at Gayhurst, rarely, however, at the latter, on account of the greater distance; frequently, though not very frequently, at Weston, both because it is nearer, and because our business in the house, that is making ready for our reception, often calls us that way. What good we can get or can do in these visits, is another question, which they, I am sure, are not qualified to solve. Of this we are both sure, that under the guidance of Providence we have formed these connections, that we should have hurt the Christian cause rather than have served it, by a prudish abstinence from them; and that St. Paul himself, conducted to them as we have been, would have found it expedient to have done as we have done. It is always impossible to conjecture to much purpose, from the beginnings of a providential event, how it will terminate. If we have neither received nor communicated any spiritual good at present, while conversant with our new acquaintance, at least no harm has befallen on either side; and it were too hazardous an assertion, even for our censorious neighbours to make, that the cause of the gospel can never be served in any of our future interviews with them, because it does not appear to have been served at present. In the mean time, I speak a strict truth as in the sight of God, when I say that we are neither of us at all more addicted to gadding than heretofore. We both naturally love seclusion from company, and never go into it without putting a force upon our own dispositions; at the same time I will confess, and you will easily conceive, that the melancholy incident to such close confinement as we have so long endured, finds itself a little relieved by such amusements as a society so innocent affords. You may look round the Christian world, and find few, I believe, of our station, who have so little intercourse as we with the world, that is not Christian. We place all the uneasiness that you have felt for us on the subject, to the account of that cordial friendship of which you have long given us a proof. But you may be assured, that notwithstanding all the rumours to the contrary, we are exactly what we were when you saw us last:—I, miserable on account of God's departure from me, which I believe to be final; and she seeking his return to me in the path of duty, and by continual prayer."

After the publication of Cowper's second volume of poems, and indeed, for some considerable time before its actual appearance, he was diligently engaged in producing a new translation of Homer's unrivalled poems. His reasons for undertaking a work of so great magnitude, and that required such immense labour: and the spirited manner with which he brought it to a close, shall be related as nearly as possible in his own words. Writing to Mr. Newton, he thus describes the commencement of this great undertaking: "I am employed in writing a narrative, but not so useful as that you have just published. Employment, however, with the pen, is through habit become essential to my well-being; and to produce always original poems, especially of considerable length, is not so easy. For some weeks after I had finished the Task, and sent away the last sheet corrected, I was through necessity idle, and suffered not a little in my spirits for being so. One day, being in such distress of mind as was hardly supportable, I took up the Iliad; and merely to direct attention, and with no more preconception of what I was then entering upon, than I have at this moment of what I shall be doing this day twenty years hence, translated the first twelve lines of it. The same necessity pressed me again, I had recourse to the same expedient, and translated more. Every day bringing its occasion for employment with it, every day consequently added something to the work; till at last I began to reflect thus:—The Iliad and the Odyssey together consists of about forty thousand verses. To translate these forty thousand verses will furnish me with occupation for a considerable time. I have already made some progress, and find it a most agreeable amusement. Homer, in point of purity, is a most blameless writer, and though he was not an enlightened man, has interspersed many great and valuable truths throughout both his poems. In short, he is in all respects a most venerable old gentleman, by an acquaintance with whom no man can disgrace himself; the literati are all agreed to a man, that although Pope has given us two pretty poems, under Homer's title, there is not to be found in them the least portion of Homer's spirit, nor the least resemblance of his manner. I will try, therefore, whether I cannot copy him more happily myself. I have at least the advantage of Pope's faults and failings, which like so many beacons upon a dangerous coast, will serve me to steer by, and will make my chance for success more probable. These, and many other considerations, but especially a mind that abhorred a vacuum as its chief bane, impelled me so effectually to the work, that ere long, I mean to publish proposals for a subscription of it, having advanced so far as to be warranted in doing so."

In another letter to the same correspondent, the following just and critical remarks on Pope's translation occur: "Your sentiments of Pope's Homer agree perfectly with those of every competent judge with whom I have at any time conversed about it. I never saw a copy so unlike the original. There is not, I believe, in all the world to be found, an uninspired poem so simple as are both of those of Homer; nor in all the world a poem more bedizened with ornaments than Pope's translation of them. Accordingly, the sublime of Homer in the hands of Pope, becomes bloated and tumid, and his description tawdry. Neither had Pope the faintest conception of those exquisite discriminations of character for which Homer is so remarkable. All his persons, and equally upon all occasions, speak in an inflated and strutting phraseology, as Pope has managed them; although in the original, the dignity of their utterance, even when they are most majestic, consists principally in the simplicity of their sentiments, and of their language. Another censure I must pass upon our Anglo-Grecian, out of many that obtrude themselves upon me, but for which I have now neither time nor room to spare, which is, that with all his great abilities, he was defective in his feelings to a degree, that some passages in his own poems make it difficult to account for. No writer more pathetic than Homer, because none more natural; and because none less natural than Pope, in his version of Homer, therefore, than he, none less pathetic. One of the great faults of Pope's translation is, that it is licentious. To publish, therefore, a translation that should be at all chargeable with the same fault, would be useless. Whatever will be said of mine, when it does appear, it shall never be said that it is not faithful. I thank you heartily both for your wishes and prayers, that should a disappointment occur, I may not be too much hurt by it. Strange as it may seem to say it, and unwilling as I should be to say it to any person less candid than yourself, I will nevertheless say that I have not entered upon this work, unconnected as it must needs appear with the cause of God, without the direction of his providence, nor have I been altogether unassisted by him in the performance of it. Time will show to what it ultimately tends. I am inclined to think that it has a tendency, to which I myself am at present a perfect stranger. Be that as it may, he knows my frame, and will consider that I am dust, and dust too that has been so trampled under foot, and beaten, that a storm less violent than an unsuccessful issue of such a business might occasion, would be sufficient to blow me quite away. As I know not to what end this my present occupation may finally lead, so neither did I know when I wrote it, or at all suspect, one valuable end, at least, that was to be answered by the Task. It has pleased God to prosper it; and being composed in blank verse, it is likely to prove as seasonable an introduction to a blank verse Homer, by the same hand, as any that could have been devised; yet when I wrote the last line of the Task, I as little suspected that I should ever engage in a version of the old Asiatic tale, as you do now."

Having undertaken a work that required so much labour, he bestowed upon it the utmost pains, and allowed nothing to divert his attention from it. In his correspondence the following remarks occur. "The little time that I can devote to any other purpose than that of poetry, is, as you may suppose, stolen. Homer is urgent; much is done, and much still remains undone, and no school-boy is more attentive to the performance of his daily task than I am.—In truth, my time is very much occupied; and the more so, because I not only have a long and laborious work in hand,—for such it would prove at any rate,—but because I make it a point to bestow my utmost attention to it, and to give it all the finishing that the most scrupulous accuracy can command. As soon as breakfast is over I retire to my nutshell of a summer-house, which is my verse manufactory, and here I abide seldom less than three hours, and not often more. In the afternoon I return to it again; and all the daylight that follows, except what is sometimes devoted to a walk, is given to Homer. It is well for me, that a course which is now become necessary, is so much my choice. Assure yourself, therefore, that when at any time it happens that I am in arrears in my correspondence with you, neither neglect nor idleness is the cause. I have a daily occupation of forty lines to translate, a task which I never excuse myself from, when it is possible to perform it. Equally sedulous I am in the matter of transcribing, so that between both, my mornings and evenings are, for the most part, completely engaged. Add to this, that though my spirits are seldom so bad but I can write verse, they are often at so low an ebb as to make the production of a letter impossible. I am now in the twentieth book of Homer, and shall assuredly proceed, because the farther I go the more I find myself justified in the undertaking; and in due time, if I live, shall assuredly publish. In the whole I shall have composed about forty thousand verses, about which forty thousand verses, I shall have taken great pains, on no occasion suffering a slovenly line to escape me. I leave you to guess, therefore, whether, such a labour once achieved, I shall not determine to turn it to some account, and to gain myself profit by it if I can; if not, at least, some credit for my reward. Till I had made such a progress in my present undertaking as to put it out of all doubt, that, if I lived, I should proceed in, and finish it, I kept the matter to myself. It would have done me little honour to have told my friends, that I had an arduous enterprise in hand, if afterwards I must have told them that I had dropped it. Knowing it to have been universally the opinion of the literati, ever since they have allowed themselves to consider the matter coolly, that a translation, properly so called, of Homer, is, notwithstanding what Pope has done, a desideratum in the English language; it struck me that an attempt to supply the deficiency would be an honourable one, and having made myself, in former years, somewhat critically, master of the original, I was by this double consideration, induced to make the attempt myself.—I am now translating into blank verse the last book of the Iliad, and mean to publish by subscription. I wish that all English readers had an unsophisticated and unadulterated taste, and could relish real simplicity. But, I am well aware, that in this respect, I am under a disadvantage, and that many, especially many ladies, missing many pretty terms of expression that they have admired in Pope, will account my translation, in those particulars, defective. But, I comfort myself with the thought that in reality it is no defect; on the contrary, that the want of all such embellishments as do not belong to the original, will be one of its principal merits, with persons really capable of relishing Homer. He is the best poet that ever lived for many reasons, but for none more than that majestic plainness that distinguishes him from all others. As an accomplished person moves gracefully without thinking of it, in like manner, the dignity of Homer seems to have cost him no labour. It was natural to him to say great things, and to say them well, and little ornaments were beneath his notice."

The following extract will show that no person ever appeared before the public in a work of any literary importance, and more correct views of its legitimate claims under such circumstances. "I thank you for your friendly hints and precautions, and shall not fail to give them the guidance ot my pen. I respect the public, and I respect myself, and had rather want bread than expose myself wantonly to the condemnation of either. I hate the affectation so frequently found in authors, of negligence and slovenliness, and in the present case am sensible how necessary it is to shun them, when I undertake the vast and invidious labour of doing better than Pope has done before me. I thank you for all that you have said and done in my cause, and beforehand for all that you shall say and do hereafter. I am sure that there will be no deficiency on your part. On my own part I assure you that no pains shall be wanted to make the work as complete as possible. I am now in a scene of perfect tranquillity and the profoundest silence, kicking up the dust of heroic narrative and besieging Troy again. I told you that I had almost finished the translation of the Iliad, and I verily thought so. But I was never more mistaken. By the time when I had reached the end of the poem, the first book of my version was a twelvemonth old. When I came to consider it, after having laid it by so long, it did not satisfy me; I set myself to mend it, and did so. But still it appeared to me improvable, and that nothing would so effectually secure that point as to give the whole book a new translation. With the exception of a very few lines, I have so done, and was never in my life so convinced of the soundness of Horace's advice to publish nothing in haste; so much advantage have I derived from doing that twice which I thought I had accomplished notably at once. He, indeed, recommends nine years imprisonment of your verses before you send them abroad; but the ninth part of that time, is, I believe, as much as there is need of to open a man's eyes upon his own defects, and to secure him from the danger of premature self-approbation. Neither ought it to be forgotten, that nine years make so wide an interval between the cup and the lip, that a thousand things may fall out between. New engagements may occur, which may make the finishing of that which a poet has begun impossible. In nine years he may rise into a situation, or he may sink into one, utterly incompatible with his purpose. His constitution may break in nine years, and sickness may disqualify him for improving what he enterprized in the days of his health.—His inclination may change, and he may find some other employment more agreeable; or another poet may enter upon the same work, and get the start of him. Therefore, my friend Horace, though I acknowledge your principle to be good, I must confess the practice you would ground it upon is carried to an extreme. The rigour that I exercised upon the first book, I intend to exercise upon all that follow, and have now actually advanced into the middle of the seventh, nowhere admitting more than one line in fifty of the first translation. You must not imagine that I had been careless and hasty in the first instance. In truth, I had not; but, in rendering so excellent a poet as Homer into our language, there are so many points to be attended to, both in respect of language and numbers, that a first attempt must be fortunate indeed if it does not call aloud for a second. You saw the specimen, and you saw (I am sure) one great fault in it; I mean the harshness of some of the elisions. I do not altogether take the blame of these to myself, for into some of them I have been absolutely driven and haunted by a series of reiterated objections, made by a critical friend, whose scruples and delicacies teazed me almost out of all patience."

With a view to make his translation as perfect as possible, Cowper, before he committed it to the press, availed himself of the assistance of several eminent critics, from some of whom he derived considerable assistance, which, at every convenient opportunity, he very readily and gratefully acknowledged. The remarks of others, however, to whose notice he had been persuaded to submit parts of his manuscript, were so frivolous and perfectly hypercritical, as to occasion him considerable vexation. Of this, the closing remarks of the last, and the whole of the following extract will afford ample proof. "The vexation and perplexity that attends a multiplicity of criticisms by various hands, many of which are sure to be futile, many of them unfounded, and some of them contradictory to others, is inconceivable, except by the author, whose ill-fated work happens to be the subject of them. This also appears to me self-evident, that if a work have passed under the review of one man of taste and learning, and have had the good fortune to please him, his approbation gives security for that of all others qualified like himself. I speak thus, after having just escaped such a storm of trouble, occasioned by endless remarks, hints, suggestions, and objections, as drove me almost to despair, and to the very verge of a resolution to drop my undertaking for ever. With infinite difficulty, I at last sifted the chaff from the wheat, availed myself of what appeared to me just, and rejected the rest, but not till the labour and anxiety had nearly undone all that one judicious critic had been doing for me.—I assure you, I can safely say, that vanity and self-importance had nothing to do in all this distress that I suffered. It was merely the effect of an alarm that I could not help taking, when I compared the great trouble I had with a few lines only thus handled, with that which I foresaw such handling of the whole must necessarily give me. I felt beforehand that my constitution would not bear it. Though Johnson's friend has teased me sadly, I verily believe that I shall have no more such cause to complain of him. We now understand one another, and I firmly believe that I might have gone the world through before I had found his equal in an accurate and familiar acquaintance with the original. Though he is a foreigner, he has a perfect knowledge of the English language, and can consequently appreciate its beauties, as well as discover its defects.

"The animadversions of the critic you sent me, hurt me more than they would have done, had they come from a person from whom I might have expected such treatment. In part they appeared to me unjust, and in part ill-natured: and, the man himself being an oracle in almost every body's account, I apprehended that he had done me much mischief. Why he says that the translation is far from exact is best known to himself. For I know it to be as exact as is compatible with poetry; and prose translations of Homer are not wanted. The world has one already. I am greatly pleased with the amendments of a friend, to whom I sent a specimen, which he has returned amended with so much taste and candour, and accompanied with so many expressions of kindness, that it quite charmed me. He has chiefly altered the lines encumbered with elisions, and I will just take this opportunity to tell you, because I know you to be as much interested in what I write as myself, that some of the most offensive of these elisions were occasioned by mere criticism. I was fairly hunted into them by vexatious objections, made without end by ——, and his friends, and altered, and altered, till at last I scarcely cared how I altered. I am not naturally insensible, and the sensibilities I had by nature have been wonderfully enhanced by a long series of shocks, given to a frame of nerves that was never very athletic. I feel accordingly, whether painful or pleasant, in the extreme; am easily elevated, and easily cast down. The power of a critic freezes my poetical powers, and discourages me to such a degree, that makes me ashamed of my own weakness. Yet I presently recover my confidence again, especially when I have every reason to believe, as in the case you refer to, that a critic's censures are harsh and unreasonable, and arise more from his own wounded and mortified feelings, than from any defect in the work itself."

Notwithstanding the irritation produced in the mind of the poet by the trifling amendments and vexatious criticisms of some whom he had been persuaded to consult, he nevertheless persevered in the translation, with undiminished activity, and gave abundant proof that he possessed that real greatness of mind which alone could enable him to undertake and accomplish a work of so great magnitude. To Lady Hesketh he thus discloses the state of his mind in this respect. "Your anxious wishes for my success delight me, and you may rest assured that I have all the ambition on the subject that you can wish me to feel. I more than admire my author. I often stand astonished at his beauties. I am for ever amused with the translation of him, and I have received a thousand encouragements: these are all so many happy omens, that I hope will be verified by the event. I am not ashamed to confess that, having commenced an author, I am most abundantly desirous to succeed as such. I have (what perhaps you little suspect me of) in my nature an infinite share of ambition. But with it, I have at the same time, as you will know, an equal share of diffidence. To this combination of opposite qualities it has been owing, that till lately, I stole through life without undertaking any thing, yet always wishing to distinguish myself. At last I ventured, ventured too in the only path that, at so late a period, was yet open to me, and am determined, if God have not determined otherwise, to work my way through the obscurity that has been so long my portion, into notice. Everything, therefore, that seems to threaten this my favourite purpose, with disappointment, affects me severely. I suppose that all ambitious minds are in the same predicament. He who seeks distinction must be sensible of disapprobation, exactly in the same proportion as he desires applause. I have thus, my dear cousin, unfolded my heart to you in this particular, without a speck of dissimulation. Some people, and good people too, would blame me, but you will not; and they, I think, would blame without just cause. We certainly do not honour God when we bury, or when we neglect to improve, as far as we can, whatever talent he may have bestowed upon us, whether it be little or much. In natural things, as well as spiritual, it is a never-failing truth, that to him who hath, (that is to him who employs what he hath diligently, and so as to increase it) more shall be given. Set me down, therefore, my dear cousin, for an industrious rhymer, so long as I shall have ability. For in this only way is it possible for me, so far as I can see, either to honour God, or even to serve myself."

In reply to the apprehensions expressed by some of his correspondents, that the confinement and close application which this work necessarily required, would prove injurious to his health, and be likely to increase his depression, he made the following remarks. "You may well wonder at my courage, who have undertaken a work of such enormous length, you would wonder more if you knew I translated the whole Iliad, with no other help than a Clavis. But I have since equipped myself for this immense journey, and am revising the work in company with a good commentator. I thank you for the solicitude you express on the subject of my present studies. The work is undoubtedly long and laborious, but it has an end, and proceeding leisurely, with a due attention to air and exercise, it is possible that I may live to finish it. Assure yourself of one thing, that though to a by-stander, it may seem an occupation surpassing the powers of a constitution never very athletic, and, at present, not a little the worse for wear, I can invent for myself no employment that does not exhaust my spirits more. I will not pretend to account for this, I will only say that it is not the language of predilection for a favourite amusement, but that the fact is really so. I have ever found that those plaything avocations which one may execute almost without any attention, fatigue me, and wear me away, while such as engage me much, and attach me closely, are rather serviceable to me than otherwise."

During the whole of Cowper's residence at Olney, he retained the same sentiments of affectionate sympathy for the sufferings of the poor that he had evinced when he first came among them. And though he had experienced some painful proofs of their insensibility, ingratitude, and unkindness, yet his heart had often been made to rejoice with those, whom, either his own liberality, or the liberality of his friends had enabled him to relieve. Aware that it afforded him so much pleasure to be employed in communicating happiness to others, his friends often placed at his disposal such things as they felt inclined to distribute. The following interesting extract from a letter to Mr. Unwin, proves how highly he was gratified in being thus benevolently employed. "I have thought with pleasure of the summer that you have had in your heart, while you have been employed in softening the severity of winter, in behalf of so many who must otherwise have been exposed to it. You never said a better thing in your life than when you assured Mr. —— of the expedience of a gift of bedding to the poor at Olney. There is no one article of this world's comforts, with which, as Falstaff says, they are so heinously unprovided. When a poor woman, and an honest one, whom we know well, carried home two pair of blankets, a pair for herself and husband, and a pair for her six children, that you kindly placed at my disposal, as soon as the children saw them, they jumped out of their straw, caught them in their arms, kissed them, blessed them, and danced for joy. An old woman, a very old one, the first night that she found herself so comfortably covered, could not sleep a wink, being kept awake by the contrary emotions of transport on the one hand, and the fear of not being thankful enough on the other."

After the publication of Cowper's second volume, and previous to his removal from Olney, he had renewed his correspondence with some relatives and friends with whom he had formerly been on terms of intimacy, but who seemed almost to have forgotten him, until the popularity of his publications arrested their attention. Among these were General Cowper, and Rev. Walter Bagot. Cowper's letters to the latter prove that his attachment to him was not slight and superficial, but deep and fervent. In February, 1786, it pleased God to deprive Mr. Bagot of his amiable and accomplished wife, who was respected and beloved by all who knew her. On this melancholy occasion Cowper wrote to him as follows: "Alas! alas! my dear, dear friend, may God himself comfort you! I will not be so absurd as to attempt it. By the close of your letter, it should seem that in this hour of great trial, he withholds not his consolations from you. I know by experience that they are neither few nor small; and though I feel for you as I never felt for man before, yet do I sincerely rejoice in this, that, whereas there is but one comforter in the universe, under afflictions such as yours, you both know Him, and know where to seek Him. I thought you a man the most happily mated that I had ever seen, and had great pleasure in your felicity. Pardon me, if now I feel a wish, that, short as my acquaintance with her was, I had never seen her, I should then have mourned with you, but not as I do now. Mrs. Unwin also sympathizes with you most sincerely, and you neither are, nor will be soon forgotten, in such prayers as we can make. I will not detain you longer now, my poor afflicted friend, than to commit you to the mercy of God, and to bid you a sorrowful adieu. May God be with you, my friend, and give you a just measure of submission to his will, the most effectual remedy for the evils of this changing scene. I doubt not that he has granted you this blessing already, and may he still continue it."

CHAPTER XII.

Pleasure he enjoyed in his new residence—Sudden death of Mrs. Unwin's son—Cowper's distress on the occasion—Experiences a severe attack of illness—Is compelled to relinquish, for a time, his labours of translation—Mr. Rose's first visit to him—His sudden recovery—Manner of spending his time—Peculiarities of his case—Is dissuaded from resuming his translation—His determination to persevere in it—Applies to it with the utmost diligence—Great care with which he translated it—His admiration of the original—Providential preservation of Mrs. Unwin—His painful depression unremoved.

By the end of November, 1786, Cowper was comfortably settled in his new residence at Weston. The house was delightfully situated, very near that of his friendly and accomplished landlord, Sir John Throckmorton, with whom he was now on terms of intimacy, and who had given him the full use of his spacious and agreeable pleasure grounds. This afforded him an opportunity, at almost all seasons, of taking that degree of exercise in the open air, which he always found so conducive to his health. The following extracts from his first letter to Lady Hesketh, after entering on his new abode, describes the state of his feelings, and proves how truly he enjoyed the change. "November 26, 1826. It is my birthday, my beloved cousin, and I determine to employ a part of it that is not destitute of festivity, in writing to you. The dark thick fog that has obscured it, would have been a burthen to me at Olney, but here I have hardly attended to it. The neatness and snugness of our abode, compensates for all the dreariness of the season, and whether the ways are wet or dry, our house at least, is always warm and commodious. Oh! for you my cousin, to partake of these comforts with us! I will not begin already to tease you upon that subject, but Mrs. Unwin remembers to have heard from your own lips, that you hate London in the spring, perhaps, therefore, by that time, you may be glad to escape from a scene which will be every day growing more disagreeable, that you may enjoy the comforts of the Lodge. You well know that the best house has a desolate appearance unfurnished. This house accordingly, since it has been occupied by us, and our meubles, is as much superior to what it was when you saw it, as you can imagine; the parlour is even elegant. When I say that the parlour is elegant, I do not mean to insinuate that the study is not so. It is neat, warm, and silent, and a much better study than I deserve, if I do not produce in it an incomparable translation of Homer. I think every day of those lines of Milton, and congratulate myself on having obtained, before I am quite superannuated, what he seems to have hoped for sooner."

"And may at length my weary age
Find out the peaceful hermitage."

"For if it is not an hermitage, at least it is a much better thing, and you must always understand, my dear, that when poets talk of cottages, hermitages, and such like things, they mean a house with six sashes in front, two comfortable parlours, a smart stair-case, and three bed-chambers, of convenient dimensions; in short, exactly such a house as this is."

"The Throckmortons continue the most obliging neighbours in the world. One morning last week, they both went with me to the cliffs—a scene, my dear, in which you would delight beyond measure, but which you cannot visit except in the spring, or autumn. The heat of summer and clinging dirt of winter would destroy you. What is called the cliff, is no cliff, nor at all like one, but a beautiful terrace, sloping gently down to the base, and from the brow of which, though it is not lofty, you have a view of such a valley, as makes that which you saw from the hills near Olney, and which I have had the honour to celebrate, an affair of no consideration."

"Wintry as the weather is, do not suspect that it confines me. I ramble daily, and every day change my ramble. Wherever I go, I find short grass under my feet, and when I have travelled perhaps, five miles, come home with shoes not at all too dirty for a drawing room."

Cowper was scarcely settled in his new abode, and had hardly had time to participate of its enjoyments, before an event occurred, which plunged both him and Mrs. Unwin into the deepest distress. It pleased God, who does every thing according to his will, with angels as well as with men, all whose dispensations, mysterious as some of them may appear, are conducted on principles of unerring wisdom, and infinite benevolence, to remove from this scene of toil and labour, to regions of peace and happiness, Mrs. Unwin's son, in the prime of life, and in a manner the most sudden and unexpected. Cowper had always loved him as a brother, and had most unreservedly communicated his mind to him, on all occasions. Their attachment to each other was mutually strong, cordial, and affectionate. The loss of such a friend could not fail to make a deep impression on the poet's mind, and the following extracts will shew how much he felt on the occasion. "I find myself here situated exactly to my mind. Weston is one of the prettiest villages in England, the walks about it are at all seasons of the year delightful. We had just begun to enjoy the pleasantness of our new situation, to find at least as much comfort in it as the season of the year would permit, when affliction found us out in our retreat, and the news reached us of the death of Mr. Unwin. He had taken a western tour with Mr. Henry Thornton, and on his return, at Winchester, was seized with a putrid fever, which sent him to his grave. He is gone to it, however, though young, as fit for it as age itself could have made him. Regretted indeed, and always to be regretted by those who knew him; for he had everything that makes a man valuable, both in his principles and in his manners, but leaving still this consolation to his surviving friends; that he was desirable in this world, chiefly because he was so well prepared for a better."

"The death of one whom I valued as I did Mr. Unwin, is a subject on which I could say much, and with much feeling. But habituated as my mind has been these many years to melancholy themes, I am glad to excuse myself the contemplation of them as much as possible. I will only observe that the death of so young a man, whom I saw so lately in good health, and whose life was so desirable on every account, has something in it peculiarly distressing. I cannot think of the widow and the children he has left without an heart-ache that I remember not to have felt before. We may well say that the ways of God are mysterious: in truth they are so, and to a degree that only such events can give us any conception of. Mrs. Unwin's life has been so much a life of affliction, that whatever occurs to her in that shape, has not at least, the terrors of novelty to embitter it. She is supported under this, as she has been under a thousand others, with a submission of which I never saw her deprived for a moment."

"Though my experience has long since taught me that this world is a world of shadows, and that it is the more prudent, as well as the more christian course, to possess the comforts that we find in it, as if we possessed them not, it is no easy matter to reduce this doctrine to practice. We forget that that God who gave them, may, when he pleases, take them away; and that, perhaps, it may please him to take them away at a time when we least expect it, and are least disposed to part with them. Thus it has happened in the present case. There never was a moment in Unwin's life when there seemed to be more urgent want of him than the moment in which he died. He had attained to an age, when, if they are at any time useful, men become more useful to their families, their friends, and the world. His parish began to feel, and to be sensible of the value of his ministry; his children were thriving under his own tuition and management. The removal of a man in the prime of life, of such a character, and with such connections, seems to make a void in society that can never be filled. God seemed to have made him just what he was, that he might be a blessing to others, and when the influence of his character and abilities began to be felt, removed him. These are mysteries that we cannot contemplate without astonishment, but which will nevertheless be explained hereafter, and must in the mean time, be revered in silence. It is well for Mrs. Unwin that she has spent her life in the practice of an habitual acquiescence in the dispensations of Providence, else I know that this stroke would have been heavier, after all that she has suffered upon another account, than she could have borne. She derives, as she well may, great consolation from the thought that he lived the life, and died the death of a christian. The consequence is, if possible, more certain than the most mathematical conclusion, that therefore he is happy."

Cowper had scarcely given vent to his feelings on the melancholy occurrence of Mr. Unwin's decease, when he was himself again visited by severe indisposition. His depressive malady returned, with all its baleful consequences, and prevented him for more than six months, either from doing anything with his translation of Homer, or carrying on his correspondence with his friends, or even from enjoying the conversation of those with whom he was most intimately associated, and whom he loved most affectionately. It is highly probable, that the painful feelings, occasioned by a too frequent recurrence to the apparently disastrous consequences, that must be the result of his friend's removal, occasioned this attack. His mind bore up under the first shock with comparative firmness, but his intense feelings, perhaps, pictured its remote effects in colours much more gloomy than were ever likely to be realised. Such seems to have been the case with him at the death of his brother. He attended him in his dying hours, saw him gradually sink into the arms of death, arranged all the affairs of his funeral, and then, when other persons less susceptible of feeling, would in all probability have forgotten the event, his apprehensive mind invested it with imaginary horrors that were to him insupportable.

This affliction of Cowper's commenced in the early part of January, 1787. In his letters to his cousin, he thus adverts to the first symptoms of it. "I have had a little nervous fever lately that has somewhat abridged my sleep, and though I find myself better to-day than I have been since it seized me, yet I feel my head lightish, and not in the best order for writing." In the next letter to the same correspondent, written about a week afterwards—the last he wrote to any of his correspondents until his recovery, he again adverts to the progress of his complaint. "I have been so much indisposed with the nervous fever, that I told you in my last had seized me, my nights, during the whole week, may be said to have been almost sleepless. The consequence has been that, except the translation of about thirty lines at the conclusion of the thirteenth book, I have been forced to abandon Homer entirely. This was a sensible mortification to me as you may suppose, and felt the more, because my spirits of course failing with my strength, I seemed to have peculiar need of my old amusement. It seemed hard, therefore, to be forced to resign it, just when I wanted it most. But Homer's battles cannot be fought by a man who does not sleep well, and who has not some little degree of animation in the day time. Last night, however, quite contrary to my expectation, the fever left me entirely, and I slept soundly, quietly, and long. If it please God that it return not, I shall soon find myself in a condition to proceed. I walk constantly, that is to say, Mrs. Unwin and I together: for at these times I keep her continually employed, and never suffer her to be absent from me many minutes. She gives me all her time, and all her attention, and forgets that there is another object in the world besides myself."

About this time, that intimacy between Cowper and Samuel Rose, Esq., which subsequently ripened into a friendship that nothing but death could dissolve, commenced. At the close of the letter from which we made our last extract, Cowper thus adverts to the circumstance. "A young gentleman called here yesterday, who came six miles out of his way to see me. He was on a journey to London from Glasgow, having just left the university there. He came I suppose, partly to satisfy his own curiosity, but chiefly, as it seemed, to bring me the thanks of some of the Scotch professors for my two volumes. His name is Rose, an Englishman. Your spirits being good, you will derive more pleasure from this incident than I can at present, therefore I send it." Notwithstanding the depression of mind which Cowper was beginning again to experience, when this unexpected interview between him and Mr. Rose took place, and his consequent aversion to the visits of any one, but especially strangers, yet he was so highly pleased with his new friend, that he commenced a correspondence with him immediately on recovering his health; and he ever regarded it as a providential circumstance, and a token of the goodness of God towards him, in giving him a friend and a correspondent, who in some measure, at least, supplied the loss he had experienced by the death of Mr. Unwin.

In February, 1787, Cowper's depressive malady had so greatly increased that his mind became again enveloped in the deepest gloom. The following extracts from his letters, written after his recovery, which took place in the ensuing autumn, will best describe the painful and distressing state to which he was reduced:—"My indisposition could not be of a worse kind. Had I been afflicted with a fever, or confined by a broken bone, neither of these cases would have made it impossible that we should meet. I am truly sorry that the impediment was insurmountable while it lasted, for such, in fact, it was. The sight of any face, except Mrs. Unwin's, was to me an insupportable grievance; and when it has happened, that by forcing himself into my hiding place, some friend has found me out, he has had no great cause to exult in his success, as Mr. Bull could tell you. From this dreadful condition of mind, I emerged suddenly; so suddenly that Mrs. Unwin, having no notice of such a change herself, could give none to any body; and when it obtained, how long it might last, and how far it might be depended upon, was a matter of the greatest uncertainty. It affects me on the recollection with the more concern, because it has deprived me of an interview with you, and has prevented you from visiting others who would have been very glad to see you."

In the midst of Cowper's severe attack, his friend, Mr. Rose, paid him another visit, and was greatly distressed to find him reduced to such a degree of wretchedness that he could not be prevailed upon to converse with him on any subject. Cowper, as soon as he began to feel the slightest symptoms of recovery, recollected the great sympathy and disinterested kindness of his new friend, and he took care to present him with the first productions of his pen. In the last week of July, 1787, he thus addressed him:—"This is the first time I have written this six months; and nothing but the constraint of obligation could induce me to write now. I cannot be so wanting to myself as not to endeavour, at least, to thank you, both for the visits with which you have favoured me, and the poem that you have sent me. In my present state of mind I taste nothing, nevertheless I read,—partly from habit, and partly because it is the only thing I am capable of." A month afterwards he again wrote to the same correspondent. "I have not yet taken up my pen, except to write to you. The little taste that I have had of your company, and your kindness in finding me out, make me wish that we were nearer neighbours, and that there were not so great a disparity in our years; that is to say, not that you were older, but that I was younger. Could we have met early in life, I flatter myself that we might have been more intimate than now we are likely to be. But you shall not find me slow to cultivate such a measure of your regard as your friends of your own age can spare me. I hope the same kindness, which has prompted you twice to call on me, will prompt you again; and I shall be happy, if, on a future occasion, I shall be able to give you a more cheerful reception than can be expected from an invalid. My health and spirits are considerably improved, and I once more associate with my neighbours. My head, however, has been the worst part of me, and still continues so; is subject to giddiness and pain, maladies very unfavourable to poetical employment: but I feel some encouragement to hope that I may possibly, before long, find myself able to resume the translation of Homer. When I cannot walk, I read, and read perhaps more than is good for me. But I cannot be idle. The only mercy that I show myself in this respect is, that I read nothing that requires much closeness of application."

Cowper was now recovered sufficiently to resume his correspondence with Lady Hesketh, and the following extracts will throw some additional light on the gradually improving state of his health, and on the manner in which he then spent his time. "My dear cousin, though it costs me something to write, it would cost me more to be silent. My intercourse with my neighbours being renewed, I can no longer forget how many reasons there are, why you especially should not be neglected; no neighbour, indeed, but the kindest of my friends, and ere long, I hope an inmate. My health and spirits seem to be mending daily. To what end I know not, neither will conjecture, but endeavour, as far as I can, to be content that they do so. I use exercise, and take the air in the park; I read much; have lately read Savary's Travels in Egypt; Memoirs of Baron du Tott; Fenn's Original Letters; the Letters of Frederick of Bohemia; and am now reading Memoirs d'Henri de Lorraine, Duc de Guise. I have also read Barclay's Argenis, a Latin romance, and the best romance that was ever written. All these, together with Madan's Letters to Priestly, and several pamphlets, I have read within these two months. So that you will say I am a great reader. I, however, write but little, because writing is become new to me; but I shall come on by degrees, and hope to regain the use of my pen before long. Our friends at the Hall make themselves more and more amiable in our account, by treating us rather as old friends, that as friends newly acquired. There are few days in which we do not meet, and I am now almost as much at home in their house as in my own. I have the free use of their library, an acquisition of great value to me, as I cannot live without books. By this means, I have been so well supplied, that I have not yet even looked at the Lounger, which you were so kind as to send me. His turn comes next, and I shall probably begin him to-morrow."

Cowper's correspondence with Mr. Newton, had now been suspended for some months. In the beginning of the ensuing October he renewed it; and the following extracts will afford some interesting information respecting the peculiarity of his case. "My Dear Friend—After a long but necessary interruption of our correspondence, I return to it again, in one respect, at least, better qualified for it than before; I mean by a belief of your identity, which for thirteen years, strange and unaccountable as it may appear, I did not believe. The acquisition of this light, if light it may be called, which leaves me as much in the dark as ever, on the most interesting subjects, releases me, however, from the most disagreeable suspicion that I am addressing myself to you as the friend whom I loved and valued so highly in my better days, while in fact you are not that friend but a stranger. I can now write to you without seeming to act a part, and without having any need to charge myself with dissimulation; a charge from which, in that state of mind, and under such an uncomfortable persuasion, I know not how to exculpate myself, and which, as you will easily conceive, not seldom made my correspondence with you a burden. Still, indeed, it wants, and is likely to want, that best ingredient, which alone can make it truly pleasant, either to myself or you—that spirituality which once enlivened all our intercourse. You will tell me, no doubt, that the knowledge I have gained is an earnest of more, and more valuable information too; and that the dispersion of the clouds in part, promises, in due time, their complete dispersion. I should be happy to believe it: but the power to do so is at present far from me. Never was the mind of man benighted to a degree that mine has been. The storms that have assailed me would have overset the faith of every man that ever had any; and the very remembrance of them, even after they have been long passed by, makes hope impossible. Mrs. Unwin, whose poor bark is still held together, though much shattered by being tossed and agitated so long at the side of mine, does not forget yours and Mrs. Newton's kindness on this last occasion. Mrs. Newton's offer to come to her assistance, and your readiness to have rendered us the same service, could you have hoped for any salutary effect of your presence, neither Mrs. Unwin nor myself undervalue, nor shall presently forget. But you judged right when you supposed that even your company would have been no relief to me; the company of my father or my brother, could they have been returned from the dead to visit me, would have been none. We are now busy in preparing for the reception of Lady Hesketh, whom we expect here shortly. Mrs. Unwin's time has, of course, been lately occupied to a degree that made writing to her impracticable; and she excused herself the rather, knowing my intentions to take her office. It does not, however, suit me to write much at a time. This last tempest has left my nerves in a worse condition than it found them; my head especially, though better informed, is more infirm than ever; I will therefore only add, that I rejoice to hear Mrs. Cowper has been so comfortably supported under her heavy trial. She must have severely felt the loss of her son. She has an affectionate heart towards her children, and could not but be sensible of the bitterness of such a cup. But God's presence sweetens every bitter. Desertion is the only evil that a christian cannot bear."

Cowper's friends were all delighted to see him again in full possession of his mental powers; and, as many of them attributed his last attack to the irritation and fatigue occasioned by his translation of Homer, they endeavoured to dissuade him from pursuing it, and recommended him to confine his attention to original poetry. Cowper was not, however, to be diverted from his purpose without an irrefragable proof of its injurious tendency, and he had formed a very different opinion on the subject to that of his friends. In a letter to Mr. Newton, he particularly adverts to it.—"I have many kind friends, who, like yourself, wish that, instead of turning my endeavours to a translation of Homer, I had proceeded in the way of original poetry. But I can truly say, that it was ordered otherwise, not by me, but by that God who governs all my thoughts and directs all my intentions as he pleases. It may seem strange, but it is true, that after having written a volume, in general, with great ease to myself, I found it impossible to write another page. The mind of man is not a fountain, but a cistern; and mine, God knows, a broken one. It is my creed, that the intellect depends as much, both for the energy and the multitude of its exertions, upon the operations of God's agency upon it, as the heart, for the exercise of its graces, upon the influence of the Holy Spirit. According to this persuasion, I may very reasonably affirm, that it was not God's good pleasure that I should proceed in the same track, because he did not enable me to do it. A whole year I waited, and waited in circumstances of mind that made a state of mere employment peculiarly irksome to me. I longed for the pen as the only remedy, but I could find no subject: extreme distress at last, drove me, as, if I mistake not, I told you some time since, to lay Homer before me, and translate for amusement. Why it pleased God that I should be hunted into such a business, of such enormous length and labour, by miseries for which he did not see good to afford me any other remedy, I know not. But so it was; and jejune as the consolation may be, and unsuited to the exigencies of a mind that once was spiritual, yet a thousand times have I been glad of it, for a thousand times it has served, at least, to divert my attention in some degree, from such terrible tempests as I believe have seldom been permitted to beat upon a human mind. Let my friends, therefore, who wish me some little measure of tranquillity in the performance of the most turbulent voyage that ever Christian mariner made, be contented, that having Homer's mountains and forests to windward, I escape, under their shelter, from many a gust of melancholy depression that would almost overset me, especially when they consider that, not by choice, but by necessity, I make them my refuge. As to the fame, and honour, and glory, that may be acquired by poetical feats of any sort, God knows, that if I could lay me down in my grave with hope at my side, or sit with this companion in a dungeon all the residue of my days, I would cheerfully waive them all. For, the little fame that I have already earned, has never saved me from one distressing night, or from one despairing day, since I first acquired it. For what I am reserved, or to what, is a mystery; I would fain hope, not merely that I may amuse others, or only to be a translator of Homer."

Ten months had now elapsed since Cowper had laid aside his translation, and as Johnston, the publisher, had been informed of his recovery, he wrote to require him to persevere in the work with as little delay as possible.—Cowper immediately recommenced the undertaking, and again entered upon it with all his former spirit and activity. The following extracts will show that his affliction had not deprived him of the vigour of his mind, or produced in him the slightest disinclination to engage in this laborious work. "I am as heretofore occupied with Homer; my present occupation is the revisal of all I have done, which is the first fifteen books. I stand amazed at my own increasing dexterity in the business, being verily persuaded that as far as I have gone, I have improved the work to double its value. I will assure you, that it engages, unavoidably, my whole attention. The length of it, the spirit of it, and the exactness requisite to its due performance, are so many most interesting subjects of consideration to me, who find that my best attempts are only introductory to others, and, that what to-day I supposed finished, to-morrow I must begin again. Thus it fares with a translator of Homer.—To exhibit the majesty of such a poet in a modern language, is a task that no man can estimate the difficulty of till he attempts it. To paraphrase him loosely, to hang him with trappings that do not belong to him, all this is comparatively easy. But to represent him with only his own ornaments, and still to preserve his dignity, is a labour, that if I hope in any measure to achieve it, I am sensible can only be achieved by the most assiduous and most unremitting attention; a perseverance that nothing can discourage, a minuteness of observation that suffers nothing to escape, and a determination not to be seduced from the straight line that lies before us, by any images which fancy may present. There are perhaps, few arduous undertakings that are not, in fact, more arduous than we at first supposed them. As we proceed, difficulties increase upon us, but our hopes gather strength also, and we conquer difficulties, which, could we have foreseen them, we should never have had the boldness to encounter. You possess by nature all that is necessary to success in the profession you have chosen. What remains is in your own power. They say of poets, that they must be born such; so must mathematicians, so must great generals, so must lawyers, and so indeed must men of all denominations, or it is not possible that they should excel. But with whatever faculties we are born, and to whatever studies our genius may direct us, studies they must still be. I am persuaded that Milton did not write his Paradise Lost, nor Homer his Illiad, nor Newton his Principia, without immense labour. Nature gave them a bent to their respective pursuits, and that strong propensity, I suppose, is what we mean by genius. The rest they gave themselves."

"My first thirteen books of Homer have been criticised in London; have been by me accommodated to these criticisms; returned to London in their improved state, and sent back to Weston with an imprimantur. This would satisfy some poets less anxious than myself about what they expose in public, but it has not satisfied me. I am now revising them again, by the light of my own critical taper, and make more alterations than at the first. But are they improvements? you will ask. Is not the spirit of the work endangered by all this correctness? I think and hope that it is not. Being well aware of the possibility of such a catastrophe, I guard particularly against it. Where I find a servile adherence to the original would render the passage less animated than it would be, I still, as at the first, allow myself a liberty. On all other occasions, I prune with an unsparing hand, determined that there shall not be found in the whole translation an idea that is not Homer's. My ambition is, to produce the closest copy possible, and at the same time, as harmonious as I can possibly make it.—This being my object, you will no longer think, if indeed you have thought it at all, that I am unnecessarily, and overmuch industrious. The original surpasses everything; it is of an immense length, is composed in the best language ever used upon earth, and deserves, indeed demands, all the labour that any translator, be he who he may, can possibly bestow upon it. At present, mere English readers know no more of Homer in reality, than if he had never been translated. That consideration indeed it was, which mainly induced me to the undertaking; and if after all, either through idleness or dotage, upon what I have already done, I leave it chargeable with the same incorrectness as my predecessors, or, indeed, with any other that I may be able to amend, I had much better have amused myself otherwise. I am now in the nineteenth book of the Illiad, and on the point of displaying such feats of heroism, performed by Achilles, as make all other achievements trivial. I may well exclaim, Oh, for a muse of fire! especially, having not only a great host to cope with, but a great river also; much, however, may be done when Homer leads the way. What would I give if he were now living, and within my reach! I, of all men living, have the best excuse for indulging such a wish, unreasonable as it may seem, for I have no doubt the fire of his eyes, and the smile of his lips, would put me, now and then, in possession of his full meaning more effectually than any commentator!"

The close application of Cowper, to the translation of Homer, was not allowed to suspend, though it in some measure interrupted, his correspondence with Mr. Newton. To him he still opened the state of his mind without the least reserve, and it will appear, from the following extracts, that he had lost, in no degree, his relish for the enjoyments of religion, though his mind still continued under the influence of his depressive malady. "Your last letter informed us, that you were likely to be much occupied for some time in writing on a subject that must be interesting to a person of your feelings—the Slave Trade. I was unwilling to interrupt your progress in so good a work, and have, therefore, enjoined myself a longer silence than I should otherwise have thought excusable, though, to say the truth, did not our once intimate fellowship in the things of God recur to my remembrance, and present me with something like a warrant for doing it, I should hardly have prevailed upon myself to write at all. Letters such as mine, to a person of a character such as yours, are like snow in harvest; and you will say, that if I will send you a letter that you can answer, I shall make your part of the business easier than it is. This I would gladly do; but though I abhor a vacuum, as much as nature herself is said to do, yet a vacuum I am bound to feel, of all such matter as may merit your perusal. I have lately been engaged in correspondence with a lady whom I never saw. She lives at Perton Hall, near Kimbolton, and is the wife of Dr. King, who has the living. She is evidently a Christian, and a very gracious one. I would that she had you for a correspondent, rather than me. One letter from you would do her more good than a ream of mine. But so it is; and though I despair of communicating to her anything that will be of much advantage, I must write to her this evening. Undeserving as I feel myself to be of divine protection, I am nevertheless receiving almost daily, I might indeed say hourly, proofs of it. A few days ago, Providence interfered to preserve me from the heaviest affliction that I could now suffer: the loss of Mrs. Unwin, and in a way too, the most shocking imaginable. Having kindled her fire in the room where she dresses, (an office that she always performs for herself,) she placed the candle on the hearth, and kneeling, addressed herself to her devotions; a thought struck her while thus occupied, that the candle, being short, might possibly catch her clothes, she pinched it out with the tongs, and set it on the table. In a few moments the chamber was so filled with smoke, that her eyes watered, and it was hardly possible to see across it.—Supposing that it proceeded from the chimney, she pushed the billets backward, and while she did so, casting her eye downward, perceived that her dress was on fire. In fact, before she extinguished the candle, the mischief that she apprehended had begun; and when she related the matter to me, she showed me her clothes, with a hole burnt in them as large as this sheet of paper. It is not possible, perhaps, that so tragical a death could occur to a person actually engaged in prayer, for her escape seems almost a miracle. Her presence of mind, by which she was enabled, without calling for help, or waiting for it, to gather up her clothes, and plunge them, burning as they were, in water, seems as wonderful a part of the occurrence as any. The very report of fire, though distant, has rendered hundreds torpid and incapable of self-succour; how much more was such a disability to be expected, when the fire had not seized a neighbour's house, or begun its devastations on our own, but was actually consuming the apparel that she wore, and seemed in possession of her person."

The continued gloomy state of Cowper's mind will be seen by the following extract from a letter to his cousin, Lady Hesketh, with whom he corresponded, as nearly as possible, at stated and regular intervals,—January 30, 1788, he thus writes: "It is a fortnight since I heard from you, that is to say, a week longer than you have been accustomed to make me wait for a letter. I do not forget that you have recommended it to me, on occasions somewhat similar, to banish all anxiety, and to ascribe your silence only to the interruptions of company. Good advice, my dear, but not easily taken by a man circumstanced as I am. I have learned in the school of adversity, a school from which I have no expectations that I shall ever be dismissed, to apprehend the worst, and have ever found it the only course in which I can indulge myself, without the least danger of incurring a disappointment. This kind of experience, continued through many years, has given me such an habitual bias to the gloomy side of everything, that I never have a moment's ease on any subject to which I am not indifferent. How then can I be easy, when I am left afloat upon a sea of endless conjectures, of which you furnish the occasion. Write, I beseech you, and do not forget that I am now a battered actor upon this turbulent stage, that what little vigour of mind I ever had, of the self-supporting kind I mean, has long since been broken, and, that though I can hear nothing well, yet anything better than a state of ignorance concerning your welfare. I have spent hours in the night, leaning upon my elbow, and wondering what your silence can mean. I entreat you, once more, to put an end to these speculations, which cost me more animal spirits than I can spare. I love you, my cousin, and cannot suspect either with or without cause, the least evil, in which you may be concerned, without being quietly troubled! O, trouble! the portion of mortals—but mine in particular. Would I had never known thee, or could bid thee farewell for ever! for, I meet thee at every turn, my pillows are stuffed with thee, my very roses smell of thee, and even my cousin, who would, I am sure, cure me of all trouble if she could, is sometimes innocently the cause of trouble to me!"

CHAPTER XIII.

Pressing invitations of his friends to write a poem on the Slave Trade—Reasons for declining it—Correspondence with Mrs. King—Particular description of his feelings—Death of Sir Ashley Cowper—Description of his character—Great severity of Cowper's depression—Is again urged to write on the Slave Trade—Again declines it—Assigns particular reasons for it—His indefatigable application to Homer—Notice he took of passing events—Mr. and Mrs. Newton's visit to Weston—The pleasure it afforded Cowper—Lady Hesketh's visit—Completion of the Iliad, and commencement of the Odyssey—His unwearied application to Homer not allowed to divert his attention from religion—Occasional composition of original poetry—Readiness to listen to any alteration that might be suggested in his productions.

Many of Cowper's friends were anxious to have him employ his admirable powers in a poem on the abolition of slavery, and Lady Hesketh wrote him several pressing invitations on the subject; to which he gave the following reply. "I have now three letters of yours, my dearest cousin, before me, all written in the space of a week, and must be, indeed, insensible of kindness, did I not feel yours on this occasion. I cannot describe to you, neither could you comprehend it if I could, the manner in which my mind is sometimes impressed with melancholy on particular subjects. Your late silence was such a subject. I heard, saw, and felt, a thousand terrible things, which had no real existence, and was haunted by them night and day, till they at last extorted from me that doleful epistle, which I have since wished had been burnt before I sent it. But the cloud has passed, and, as far as you are concerned, my heart is once more at rest. Before you gave me the hint contained in your last letters, I had once or twice, as I lay on my bed, watching the break of day, ruminated on the subject which you kindly recommended to me. Slavery, or a release from slavery, such as the poor negroes have endured, or perhaps both these topics together, appeared to me a theme so important at the present juncture, and at the same time so susceptible of practical management, that I more than once perceived myself ready to start in that cause, could I have allowed myself to desert Homer for so long a time as it would have cost me to do them justice. While I was pondering these things, the public prints informed me that Miss More was on the point of publication, having actually finished what I had not began. The sight of her advertisement convinced me that my best course would be that to which I felt myself most inclined; to persevere without turning aside to attend to any other call, however alluring, in the business I have in hand. It occurred to me likewise, that I have lately borne my testimony in favour of my black brethren, and that I was one of the earliest, if not the first, of those who have, in the present day, expressed their detestation of the diabolical trade in question. On all accounts I judged it best to be silent. I shall be glad to see Hannah More's poem; she is a favourite writer with me, and has more nerve and energy, both in her thoughts and language, than half the rhymers in the kingdom."

It will be seen by the last extract made from Cowper's letters to Mr. Newton, that he had now commenced a correspondence with Mrs. King, and as his letters to that lady are highly interesting, we shall make such use of them as will be descriptive of the state of his mind at that period. "A letter from a lady who was once intimate with my brother, could not fail of being most acceptable to me. I lost him just at a moment when those truths which have recommended my volumes to your approbation, were become his daily sustenance, as they had long been mine. But the will of God was done. I have sometimes thought that had his life been spared, being made brothers by a stricter tie than ever, in the bonds of the same faith, hope, and love, we should have been happier in each other than it was in the power of mere natural affection to make us. But it was his blessing to be taken from a world in which he had no longer any wish to continue; and it will be mine, if, while I live in it, my time may be not altogether wasted: in order to effect that good end, I wrote what I am happy to find has given you pleasure to read. But for that pleasure, Madam, you are indebted neither to me nor to my muse; but (as you are well aware) to Him who alone can make divine truths palatable, in whatever vehicle conveyed. It is an established philosophical axiom, that nothing can communicate what it has not in itself; but in the effects of Christian communion, a very strong exception is found to this general rule, however self-evident it may seem. A man, himself destitute of all spiritual consolation, may by occasion, impart it to others. Thus I, it seems, who wrote those very poems, to amuse a mind oppressed with melancholy, and who have myself derived from them no other benefit, (for mere success in authorship will do me no good,) have nevertheless, by so doing, comforted others, at the same time that they administer to me no consolation. But I will proceed no farther in this strain, lest my prose should damp a pleasure that my verse has happily excited. On the contrary, I will endeavour to rejoice in your joy, and especially, because I have myself been the instrument of conveying it."

"I owe you many acknowledgments, dear Madam, for that unreserved communication both of your history and of your sentiments, with which you honoured me in your last, it gives me great pleasure to learn that you are so happily circumstanced, both in respect of situation and frame of mind. With your view of religious subjects, you could not indeed, speaking properly, be pronounced unhappy in any circumstances; but to have received from above, not only that faith which reconciles the heart to affliction, but many outward comforts also, and especially that greatest of all earthly comforts, a comfortable home, is happiness indeed. May you long enjoy it! As to health or sickness, you have learned already their true value, and know well that the former is no blessing, unless it be sanctified, and that the latter is the greatest we can receive, when we are enabled to make a proper use of it."

"The melancholy that I have mentioned to you, and concerning which you are so kind as to inquire, is of a kind, so far as I know, peculiar to myself. It does not at all affect the operations of my mind, on any subject to which I can attach it, whether serious or ludicrous, or whatever it may be, for which reason I am almost always employed either in reading or writing, when I am not engaged in conversation. A vacant hour is my abhorrence; because, when I am not occupied, I suffer under the whole influence of my unhappy temperament. I thank you for your recommendation of a medicine from which you have derived benefit yourself. but there is hardly anything that I have not proved, however beneficial it may have been found to others, in my own case, utterly useless. I have, therefore, long since bid adieu to all hope from human means—the means excepted of perpetual employment. I will not say that we shall never meet, because it is not for a creature, who knows not what will be to-morrow, to assert anything positively concerning the future. Things more unlikely I have seen come to pass; and things which, if I had expressed myself on them at all, I should have said were impossible. But, being respectively circumstanced as we are, there seems no present probability of it. You speak of insuperable hinderances, and I also have hinderances that would be equally difficult to surmount. One is, that I never ride; that I am not able to perform so long a journey on foot; and that chaises do not roll within the sphere of that economy which my circumstances oblige me to observe. If this were not of itself a sufficient excuse, when I decline so obliging an invitation as yours, I could mention yet other obstacles. But to what end? One impracticability makes as effectual a barrier as a thousand: it will be otherwise in other worlds: either we shall not bear about us a body, or it will be more easily transportable than this. The world in which we live is indeed, as you say, a foolish world, and is likely to continue such, till the Great Teacher himself shall vouchsafe to make it wiser. I am persuaded that time alone will never mend it. But there is doubtless a day appointed when there will be a more general manifestation of the beauty of holiness, than mankind have ever yet beheld. When that period shall arrive, there will be an end of prophane representations, whether of heaven or hell, on the stage, of which you complain—the great realities of religion will supersede them."

"You must think me a tardy correspondent, unless you have charity enough to suppose that I have met with other hinderances than those of indolence and inattention. With these I cannot charge myself, for I am never idle by choice; and inattentive to you I certainly have not been. My silence has been occasioned by a malady to which I have all my life been subject—an inflammation of the eyes. The last sudden change of weather, from excessive heat to a wintry degree of cold, occasioned it, and at the same time gave me a pinch of the rheumatic kind, from both which disorders I have but just recovered. I do not suppose that our climate has been much altered since the days of our forefathers, the Picts; but certainly the human constitution, in this country, has altered very much. Inured as we are from our cradles to every vicissitude, in a climate more various than any other, and in possession of all that modern refinement has been able to contrive for our security, we are yet as subject to blights as the tenderest blossoms of spring; and we are so well admonished of every change in the atmosphere by our bodily feelings, as hardly to have any need of a weather-glass to mark them. For this we are, no doubt, indebted to the multitude of our accommodations; for it was not possible to retain the hardiness that originally belonged to our race, under the delicate management of which, for many ages, we have been accustomed. It is observable, however, that though we have by these means lost much of our pristine vigour, our days are not the fewer. We live as long as those whom, on account of the sturdiness of their frame, the poets supposed to have been the progeny of oaks. Perhaps, too, they had but little feeling, and for that reason might be imagined to be so descended; for a very robust, athletic habit, seems inconsistent with much sensibility. But sensibility is the sine quâ non of real happiness. If, therefore, our lives have been shortened, and if our feelings have been rendered more exquisite, as our habit of body has become more delicate, on the whole we have no cause to complain, but are rather gainers by our degeneracy."

In the beginning of June, 1788, an event occurred, which, though it had been long expected by Cowper and by all his friends, could not fail to make a deep impression upon his peculiarly sensitive mind. This was the death of his esteemed and venerable relation Ashly Cowper, Esq., Clerk of the Parliaments, and brother to Cowper's father, the last moments of whose life his daughter, Lady Hesketh, had watched over with the tenderest solicitude. In reply to an affectionate letter from his friend Mr. Hill, apprizing him of the event, he thus writes:—"Your letter brought me the first intelligence of the event it mentions. My last from Lady Hesketh gave me reason enough to expect it; but the certainty of it was unknown to me till I learned it by your information. If gradual decline, the consequence of great age, be a sufficient preparation of the mind to encounter such a loss, our minds were certainly prepared to meet it: yet to you I need not say that no preparation can supersede the feelings of the heart on such occasions. While our friends yet live, inhabitants of the same world with ourselves, they seem still to live to us—we are sure that they often think of us; and, however improbable it may seem, it is never impossible that we may see each other once again. But the grave, like a great gulph, swallows all such expectations, and in the moment when a beloved friend sinks into it, a thousand tender recollections awaken a regret that will be felt in spite of all reasonings, and let our warnings have been what they may. My dear uncle's death awakened in me many reflections, which, for a time, sunk my spirits. A man like him would have been mourned had he doubled the age he reached. At any age his death would have been felt as a loss that no survivor could repair. And though it was not probable that, for my own part, I should ever see him more, yet the consciousness that he still lived, was a comfort to me. Let it comfort us now, that we have lost him only at a time when nature could afford him to us no longer; that as his life was blameless, so was his death without anguish, and that he is gone to heaven. I know not that human life, in its most prosperous state, can present anything to our wishes half so desirable as such a close of it."

In another letter, he again writes;—"We have indeed lost one who has not left his like in the present generation of our family; and whose equal, in all respects, no future generation of it will probably produce. I often think what a joyful interview there has been between him and some of his friends who went before him. The truth of the matter is, my dear, they are happy ones, and we shall never be entirely so ourselves till we have joined the party. Can there be anything so worthy of our warmest wishes as to enter on an eternal, unchangeable state, in blessed fellowship and communion with those whose society we valued most, and for the best reasons, while they continued with us? A few steps more through a vain, foolish world, and this happiness will be yours. But I earnestly hope the end of thy journey is not near. For of all that live, thou art one whom I can least spare; for thou also art one who shall not leave thy equal behind thee."

The state of Cowper's mind at this period will be discovered by the following extract from a letter to his friend Mr. Bull, who appears to have solicited him for some original hymns, to be used by him probably on some public occasion. "Ask possibilities, and they shall be performed; but ask not hymns from a man suffering with despair as I do. I would not sing the Lord's song were it to save my life, banished as I am, not to a strange land, but to a remoteness from his presence, in comparison to which the distance from east to west is no distance—is vicinity and cohesion. I dare not, either in prose or verse, allow myself to express a frame of mind which I am conscious does not belong to me; least of all can I venture to use the language of absolute resignation, lest, only counterfeiting, I should, for that very reason, be taken strictly at my word, and lose all my remaining comfort. Can there not be found, among the translations of Madame Guion, somewhat that might serve the purpose? I should think there might. Submission to the will of Christ, my memory tells me, is a theme that pervades them all. If so, your request is performed already; and if any alteration in them should be necessary, I will, with all my heart, make it. I have no objection to giving the graces of a foreigner an English dress, but insuperable ones to all false pretences and affected exhibitions of what I do not feel."

Several of Cowper's correspondents, at this time, again strongly urged him to write a poem on the Slave Trade. The following extracts will show that he was unwilling to give a refusal, though he could by no means prevail upon himself to accede to their wishes. "Twice or thrice, before your request came, have I been solicited to write a poem on the cruel, odious, and disgusting subject of Negro Slavery. But besides that it would be in some sort treason against Homer to abandon him for any other matter, I felt myself so much hurt in my spirits the moment I entered on the contemplation of it, that I have at last determined, absolutely, to have nothing more to do with it. There are some scenes of horror on which my imagination has dwelt not without some complacency; but then they are such scenes as God, not man, produces. In earthquakes, high winds, tempestuous seas, there is a grand as well as a terrible. But when man is tempted to disturb, there is such meanness in the design, and such cruelty in the execution, that I both hate and despise the whole operation, and feel it a degradation of poetry to employ her in the description of it. I hope, also, that the generality of my countrymen have more generosity in their nature than to want the fiddle of verse to go before them in the performance of an act to which they are invited by the loudest calls of humanity. I shall rejoice if your friend, influenced by what you told him of my present engagements shall waive his application to me for a poem on this revolting subject. I account myself honoured by his intention to solicit one, and it would give me pain to refuse him, which inevitably I shall be constrained to do. The more I have considered it, the more I have convinced myself that it is not a promising theme for verse, at least to me. General censure on the iniquity of the practice will avail nothing. The world has been overwhelmed with such remarks already, and to particularize all the horrors of it, were an employment for the mind, both of the poet and of his readers, of which they would necessarily soon grow weary. For my own part, I cannot contemplate the subject very nearly, without a degree of abhorrence that affects my spirits, and sinks them below the pitch requisite for success in verse. Lady Hesketh recommended it to me some months since, and then I declined it for those reasons, and for others which I need not now mention."

The close attention that Cowper found it necessary to pay to his Homer, left him, at this period, but little time for any other engagement. Adverting to this, he thus writes to Mr. Newton:—"It is a comfort to me that you are so kind as to make allowance for me, in consequence of my being so busy a man. The truth is, that could I write with both hands, and with both at the same time,—verse with one, and prose with the other,—I should not, even so, be able to despatch both my poety and my arrears of correspondence faster than I have need. The only opportunities that I can find for conversing with distant friends are in the early hour, (and that sometimes reduced to half a one,) before breakfast. Neither am I exempt from hinderances, which, while they last, are insurmountable, especially one, by which I have been occasionally a sufferer all my life—an inflammation of the eyes; which has often disabled me from all sorts of scribbling. When I tell you that an unanswered letter troubles my conscience, in some degree, like a crime, you will think me endued with a most heroic patience, who have so long submitted to that trouble on account of yours, not answered yet. But the truth is, that I have been much engaged. Homer, you know, affords me constant employment, besides which I have rather, what may be called,—considering the privacy in which I have long lived,—a numerous correspondence: to one of my friends in particular, a near and much beloved relation, I write weekly, and sometimes twice in the week; nor are these my only excuses; the sudden changes of the weather have much affected me, and have often made me wholly incapable of writing."

The summer of 1788 was remarkably hot and dry, and to show the manner in which it affected Cowper's mind we give the following extract from a letter to one of his correspondents:—"It has pleased God to give us rain, without which, this part of the country at least, must soon have become a desert. The goodness and power of God are never, (I believe,) so universally acknowledged as at the end of a long drought. Man is naturally a self-sufficient animal, and in all concerns that seem to be within the sphere of his own ability, thinks little, or not at all, of the need he always has of protection and furtherance from above. But he is sensible that the clouds will not assemble at his bidding, and that though they do assemble, they will not fall in showers, because he commands them. When, therefore, at last the blessing descends, you shall hear, even in the streets, the most irreligious and thoughtless with one voice exclaim,—Thank God! Confessing themselves indebted to his power, and willing, at least as far as words go, to give Him the glory. I can hardly doubt, therefore, that the earth is sometimes parched, and the crops endangered, in order that the multitude may not want a memento to whom they owe them; nor absolutely forget the power on which we all depend for all things. The summer is leaving us at a rapid rate, as indeed do all the seasons, and though I have marked their flight often, I know not which is the swiftest. Man is never so deluded as when he dreams of his own duration. The answer of the old patriarch to Pharaoh may be adopted by every man at the close of the longest life.—'Few and evil have been the days of the years of my pilgrimage.' Whether we look back from fifty, or from twice fifty, the past appears equally a dream;' and we can only be said truly to have lived, while we have been profitably employed. Alas, then! making the necessary deductions, how short is life! Were men in general to save themselves all the steps they take to no purpose, or to a bad one, what numbers, who are now active and thoughtless, would become sedentary and serious."

In the latter part of July, 1788, Mr. and Mrs. Newton paid Cowper a visit at Weston; and the pleasure it afforded him, will, with the state of his mind on the occasion, be seen by the following extract from a letter addressed to Mr. Newton, after his return.—"I rejoice that you and yours reached London safe, especially when I reflect that you performed your journey on a day so fatal, as I understand, to others travelling the same road. I found those comforts in your visit which have formerly sweetened all our interviews, in part restored. I knew you, knew you for the same shepherd who was sent to lead me out of the wilderness into the pasture, where the Chief Shepherd feeds his flock, and felt my sentiments of affectionate friendship for you the same as ever. But one thing was still wanting, and that thing the crown of all. I shall find it in God's time if it be not lost for ever. When I say this, I say it trembling: for at what time soever comfort may come, it will not come without its attendant evil: and whatever good things may occur in the interval, I have sad forebodings of the event, having learned by experience that I was born to be persecuted with peculiar fury, and assured by believing, that such as my lot has been, it will be to the end. This belief is connected in my mind with an observation I have often made, and is, perhaps, founded in great part upon it,—that there is a certain style of dispensations maintained by Providence, in the dealings of God with every man, which, however the incidents of his life may vary, and though he may be thrown into different situations, is never exchanged for another. The style of dispensation peculiar to myself has hitherto been that of sudden, violent, unlooked-for change. When I have thought myself falling into the abyss, I have been caught up again; when I have thought myself on the threshold of a happy eternity, I have been thrust down to hell. The rough and the smooth of such a lot, taken together, should perhaps, have taught me never to despair; but through an unhappy propensity in my nature to forbode the worst, they have, on the contrary, operated as an admonition to me, never to hope. A firm persuasion that I can never durably enjoy a comfortable state of mind, but must be depressed in proportion as I have been elevated, withers my joys in the bud, and, in a manner, entombs them before they are born: for I have no expectation but of sad vicissitude, and ever believe that the last shock of all will be fatal."

It might be supposed, from the gloomy state of Cowper's mind, as described by his letters, that no person could feel any real enjoyment in his society, and that his friends who visited him, did so, not so much for their own sake as for his. The fact, however, was, that all who had once been favoured with his company, were particularly anxious to enjoy it again; for though he was never what might be termed brilliant in conversation, yet he was always interesting; and his amiable, polite, and unaffected manners, associated with his rich intellectual acquirements, which he had the happy talent of displaying, in a manner perfectly unobtrusive, made him the charm of the social circle. His anxiety to promote the happiness of those with whom he might happen to be associated, gave to his conversation an air of cheerfulness, and sometimes even of sprightliness and vivacity, altogether different to that which generally pervaded his correspondence: and the same amiable solicitude for the welfare of others, caused him sometimes to write to his correspondents, in a style the most playful and agreeable. Of this we have an instance, in a letter to Mrs. King, written about this time.—"You express some degree of wonder that I found you out to be sedentary, at least, much a stayer within doors, without any sufficient data for my direction. Now, if I should guess your figure and stature with equal success, you will deem me not only a poet, but a conjuror. Yet, in fact, I have no pretensions of that sort. I have only formed a picture of you in my own imagination, as we ever do of a person of whom we think much, but whom we have never seen. Your height, I conceive, to be about five feet five inches, which, though it would make a short man, is yet height enough for a woman. If you insist on an inch or two more, I have no objection. You are not very fat, but somewhat inclined to be so, and unless you allow yourself a little more air and exercise, will incur some danger of exceeding your present dimensions before you die. Let me, therefore, once more recommend to you, to walk a little more, at least in your garden, and to amuse yourself with pulling up here and there a weed, for it will be an inconvenience to you to be much fatter than you are, especially when your strength will be naturally on the decline. I have given you a fair complexion, a slight tinge of the rose on your cheeks, dark brown hair, and, if the fashion would give you leave to show it, an open and well-formed forehead. To all this I add a pair of eyes not quite black, but approaching nearly to that hue, and very animated. I have not absolutely determined on the shape of your nose, or the form of your mouth, but should you tell me that I have in other respects drawn a tolerable likeness, have no doubt but I can describe them too. I assure you that though I have a great desire to read Lavater, I have never seen his volumes, nor have I availed myself in the least of any of his rules on this occasion. Ah, Madam! if with all this sensibility of yours, which exposes you to so much sorrow, and necessarily must expose you to it in a world like this, I have had the good fortune to make you smile, I have then painted you, whether with a strong resemblance, or with none at all, to very good purpose."

During the time that Mr. and Mrs. Newton were on their visit at Weston, Cowper's friend, Mr. Samuel Rose, arrived there also. Cowper was highly pleased with this circumstance, as it served to enliven his social circle, and afforded him an opportunity to introduce his young friend to Mr. Newton, whose advice and influence, might probably be of considerable advantage to him at a future period. To a person, easily diverted from his purpose, the company of friends whom he so highly esteemed, would have been thought a sufficient excuse for the suspension of every literary engagement. Cowper, however, laboured indefatigably at his translation, and instead of laying it aside because of his friend's visits, he gladly availed himself of their advice and assistance. We learn from the following remarks, extracted from a letter to his cousin, written about this time, that Cowper would not allow his friend Rose to pay him an idle visit;—"My dear cousin, the Newtons are still here, and will continue with us, I believe, till the 15th of the month. Here is also my friend, Mr. Rose, a valuable young man, who attracted by the effluvia of my genius, found me out in my retirement last January twelvemonth. I have not permitted him to be idle, but have made him transcribe for me the twelfth book of the Iliad. He brings me the compliments of several of the literati, with whom he is acquainted in town; and tells me that from Dr. Maclain, whom he saw lately, he learns that my book is in the hands of sixty different persons at the Hague, who are all enchanted with it; not forgetting the said Dr. Maclain himself, who tells him that he reads it every day, and is always the better for it. I desire to be thankful for this encouraging information, and am willing to ascribe it to its only legimate cause, the blessing of God upon my feeble efforts."

Shortly after Mr. Rose, and Mr. and Mrs. Newton, left Weston, the vacuum which the absence of their agreeable company made in Cowper's enjoyments, was supplied by the arrival of his cousin, Lady Hesketh, whose cheerful conversation contributed greatly to his comfort, and who diminished much of the labour of his translation by transcribing the manuscript, so that a fair copy might be forwarded to the printer's. In September, 1788, he finished the Iliad, and thus describes his feelings on the occasion, in a letter to his friend, Mr. Rose:—"The day on which you shall receive this, I beg you will remember to drink one glass at least, to the success of the Iliad, which I finished the day before yesterday, and yesterday began the Odyssey. It will be some time before I shall perceive myself travelling in another road; the objects around me are at present so much the same, Olympus and a council of gods meet me at my first entrance. To tell you the truth, I am weary of heroes and deities, and, with reverence be it spoken, shall be glad for variety's sake to change their company for that of a Cyclops."

Cowper's time was now so much employed, in his translation, that he had but little opportunity for keeping up his correspondence, and the letters he wrote at this period, abound with apologies for his apparent neglect. He still, however, found time to advert to passing events, sufficiently to prove that the best of his mind remained decidedly serious. To Mrs. King he thus writes:—"Mrs. Battison, your late relative at Bedford, being dead, I was afraid you would have no more calls there; but the marriage so near at hand, of the young lady you mention, with a gentleman of that place, gives me hope again, that you may occasionally approach us, as heretofore; and that on some of those occasions you will perhaps find your way to Weston. The deaths of some and the marriages of others, make a new world of it every thirty years. Within that space of time, the majority are displaced and a new generation has succeeded. Here and there one is permitted to stay a little longer, that there may not be wanting a few grave dons like myself, to make the observation. The thought struck me very forcibly the other day, on reading a paper which came hither in the package of some books from London. It contained news from Hertfordshire, and informed me, among other things, that at Great Berkhamstead, the place of my birth, there is hardly a family left of all those with whom, in my early days, I was so familiar. The houses, no doubt remain, but the greater part of their former inhabitants are now to be found by their gravestones. And it is certain that I might pass through a town in which I was once a sort of principal figure, unknowing and unknown. They are happy who have not taken up their rest in a world fluctuating as the sea, and passing away with the rapidity of a river. I wish from my heart, that you and Mr. King, may long continue, as you have already long continued, exceptions from the general truth of this remark."

Lady Hesketh remained at Weston through the greater part of the winter of 1788–9, and contributed much to revive Cowper's drooping spirits, and to cheer and animate him in his important undertaking; which seemed to engage more of his time the nearer it approached to a finish. The close attention which he found it indispensably necessary to bestow upon it, compelled him almost entirely to relinquish his correspondence. And, as a letter from him was esteemed a treasure by all his friends, many of whom began to make complaints of being neglected, he was often compelled, in those he did write, to advert to these complaints. We find him thus excusing himself for his apparent neglect:—"The post brings me no letters that do not grumble at my silence. Had not you, therefore, taken me to task as roundly as others, I should perhaps, have concluded that you were more indifferent to my epistles than the rest of my correspondents; of whom one says: 'I shall be glad when you have finished Homer; then possibly you will find a little leisure for an old friend.' Another says, 'I don't choose to be neglected, unless you equally neglect every one else.' Thus I hear of it with both ears, and shall till I appear in the shape of two great quarto volumes, the composition of which, I confess engrosses me to a degree that gives my friends, to whom I feel myself much obliged for their anxiety to hear from me, but too much reason to complain. Johnson told Mr. Martyn the truth, when he said I had nearly completed Homer, but your inference from that truth is not altogether so just as most of your conclusions are. Instead of finding myself the more at leisure, because my long labour draws to a close, I find myself the more occupied. As when a horse approaches the goal, he does not, unless he be jaded, slacken his pace, but quickens it: even so it fares with me. The end is in view; I seem almost to have reached the mark, and the nearness of it inspires me with fresh alacrity. But be it known to you that I have still two books of the Odyssey before me, and when they are finished, shall have almost the whole eight-and-forty to revise. Judge then, my dear Madam, if it is yet time for me to play or to gratify myself with scribbling to those I love. No, it is necessary that waking I should be all absorpt in Homer, and that sleeping I should dream of nothing else."

Busily engaged, however, as Cowper was with his translation, he found time to compose several short, but beautiful poems, on various subjects, as they happened to occur to his mind. These were eagerly sought after by his correspondents, and were forwarded to them respectively, as opportunities offered, accompanied generally with the poet's acknowledgements of their comparative insignificance, at least in his own esteem. Several of these productions were written to oblige his friends, for whom Cowper always had the highest regard, and whom he felt pleased on all occasions to accommodate; others were written at the request of strangers, whom he was not unwilling, when it lay fairly in his way, to oblige. On one occasion, the parish clerk of Northampton, applied to him for some verses, to be annexed to some bills of mortality, which he was accustomed to publish at Christmas. This singular incident, so illustrative of Cowper's real generosity, he relates in the following most interesting and sprightly manner:—"On Monday morning last, Sam brought me word that there was a man in the kitchen, who desired to speak with me. I ordered him in. A plain, decent, elderly-looking figure, made its appearance, and being desired to sit, spoke as follows: 'Sir, I am clerk of the parish of All Saints, in Northampton; brother of Mr. C. the upholsterer. It is customary for the person in my office to annex to a bill of mortality, which he publishes at Christmas, a copy of verses. You will do me a great favour, Sir, if you would furnish me with one.' To this I replied; Mr. C. you have several men of genius in your town, why have you not applied to some of them? There is a namesake of yours in particular, Mr. C. the statuary, who every body knows is a first rate maker of verses. He surely is the man, of all the world, for your purpose. 'Alas! Sir,' replied he, 'I have heretofore borrowed help from him, but he is a gentleman of so much reading, that the people of our town cannot understand him.' I confess I felt all the force of the compliment implied in this speech, and was almost ready to answer, perhaps, my good friend, they may find me unintelligible for the same reason. But on asking him whether he had walked over to Weston on purpose to implore the assistance of my muse, and on replying in the affirmative, I felt my mortified vanity a little consoled, and pitying the poor man's distress, which appeared to be considerable, promised to supply him. The wagon has accordingly gone this day to Northampton, loaded in part with my effusions in the mortuary style. A fig for poets who write epitaphs upon individuals, I have written one that serves two hundred persons."

On another occasion, Cowper thus writes to Mr. Hill, adverting to the numerous entreaties he sometimes received for the assistance of his muse. "My muse were a vixen, if she were not always ready to fly in obedience to your commands. But what can be done? I can write nothing in the few hours that remain to me of this day, that will be fit for your purpose; and, unless I could dispatch what I write by to-morrow's post, it would not reach you in time. I must add, too, that my friend the vicar of the next parish, engaged me the day before yesterday, to furnish him by next Sunday with a hymn to be sung on the occasion of his preaching to the children of the Sunday-school; of which hymn I have not yet produced a syllable. I am somewhat in the case of Lawyer Dowling, in Tom Jones; and could I split myself into as many poets as there are muses, I could find employment for them all."

These numerous engagements, however, did not prevent the poet from recording his sentiments respecting any circumstance that occurred which he thought deserving notice. About this time the following melancholy event happened, which drew from him lines expressive of his entire abhorrence of cruelty, by whomsoever perpetrated, and whether practised upon man or upon the lower order of animals. John A——, Esq., a young gentleman of large fortune, who was passionately fond of cock-fighting, came to his death in the following awful manner. He had a favourite cock, upon which he had won many large sums. The last bet he laid upon it he lost, which so enraged him, that he had the bird tied to a spit, and roasted alive, before a large fire. The screams of the suffering animal were so affecting, that some gentlemen who were present attempted to interfere, which so exasperated Mr. A——, that he seized the poker, and with the most furious vehemence declared that he would kill the first man who interfered; but in the midst of his passionate assertions, awful to relate, he fell down dead upon the spot. Cowper was so deeply affected by the circumstance, that he composed a poetic obituary on the occasion, which was inserted in the Gentleman's Magazine for May, 1789, from which we extract the following lines.

"This man (for since the howling wild
Disclaims him, man he must be styled)
Wanted no good below:
Gentle he was, if gentle birth
Could make him such, and he had worth,
If wealth can worth bestow.

Can such be cruel? such can be
Cruel as hell, and so was he;
A tyrant entertain'd
With barb'rous sports, whose fell delight
Was to encourage mortal fight,
'Twixt birds to battle trained.

One feathered champion he possessed,
His darling far beyond the rest,
Which never knew disgrace,
Nor e'er had fought, but he made flow
The life blood of his fiercest foe—
The Cæsar of his race,

It chanced, at last, when, on a day,
He pushed him to the desp'rate fray,
His courage droop'd, he fled;
The master stormed, the prize was lost,
And, instant, frantic at the cost,
He doom'd his favourite dead.

He seized him fast, and from the pit
Flew to the kitchen, snatch'd the spit,
And, Bring me cord, he cried;
The cord was brought, and at his word,
To that dire implement, the bird,
Alive, and struggling, tied.

The horrid sequel asks a veil,
And all the terrors of the tale
That can be, shall be sunk;
Led by the sufferer's screams aright,
His shock'd companions view the sight,
And him with pity, drunk.

All, suppliant, beg a milder fate,
For the old warrior at the grate:
He, deaf to pity's call,
Whirl'd round him, rapid as a wheel,
His culinary club of steel,
Death menacing on all.

But vengeance hung not far remote,
For while he stretched his clamorous throat,
And heaven and earth defied;
Big with a curse too closely pent,
That struggled vainly for a vent,
He totter'd, reel'd, and died.

'Tis not for us, with rash surmise,
To point the judgment of the skies;
But judgments plain as this,
That, sent for men's instruction, bring
A written label on their wing,
'Tis hard to read amiss."

It was Cowper's intention, after finishing his translation, to publish a third volume of original poems, which was to contain, in addition to a poem he intended to compose, similar to the Task, entitled "The Four Ages," all the minor unpublished productions of his pen. And it is deeply to be regretted that he was not permitted to carry this design into completion, as the interesting subject of the different stages of man's existence would have been admirably adapted for a complete developement of his poetic talents.

The readiness of Cowper to listen to any alterations in his productions, suggested by his correspondents, ought not to go unrecorded. To the Rev. Walter Bagot he thus writes. "My verses on the Queen's visit to London, either have been printed, or soon will be in the world. The finishing to which you objected I have altered, and have substituted two new stanzas in the room of it. Two others also I have struck out, another friend having objected to them. I think I am a very tractable sort of a poet. Most of my fraternity would as soon shorten the noses of their children because they were said to be too long, as thus dock their compositions, in compliance with the opinions of others. I beg that when my life shall be written hereafter, my authorship's ductibility of temper may not be forgotten."

CHAPTER XIV.

Mrs. Unwin much injured by a fall—Cowper's anxiety respecting her—Continues incessantly engaged in his Homer—Expresses regret that it should, in some measure, have suspended his correspondence with his friends—Revises a small volume of poems for children—State of his mind—Receives, as a present from Mrs. Bodham, a portrait of his mother—Feelings on the occasion—Interesting description of her character—His affectionate attachment to her—Translates a series of Latin letters from a Dutch minister of the Gospel—Continuance of his depression—Is attacked with a nervous fever—Completion of his translation—Death of Mrs. Newton—His reflections on the occasion—Again revises his Homer—His unalterable attachment to religion.

In the commencement of 1789, a circumstance occurred, which occasioned Cowper considerable uneasiness. Mrs. Unwin, his amiable inmate, and faithful companion, received so severe an injury by a fall, which she got when walking on a gravel path, covered with ice, that she was confined to her room for several weeks. Though she neither dislocated any joint, nor broke any bones, yet such was the effect of the fall, that it crippled her completely, and rendered her as incapable of assisting herself as a child. It happened providentially, that Lady Hesketh was at Weston, when this painful event occurred. By her kind attention to Mrs. Unwin, and her no less tender care over her esteemed relative, lest his mind should be too deeply affected by this afflicting occurrence, she contributed greatly to the recovery of the former, and to the support of the latter. It was, however, several weeks before Mrs. Unwin recovered her strength sufficiently to attend to her domestic concerns. Her progress too, when she began to amend, was so slow, as to be almost imperceptible, and her lengthened affliction, notwithstanding the precautionary measures adopted by herself, and by Lady Hesketh to prevent it, tended, in a great degree, to depress the mind of Cowper.

Early in the ensuing spring, Lady Hesketh was compelled to return to town. Mrs. Unwin had not then wholly recovered her strength; she was, however, so far convalescent, as to resume the management of her domestic concerns, and to pay the same kind attention to the poet's comfort as had distinguished all her former conduct towards him. The greater part of the year 1789, Cowper was incessantly engaged, principally in translating Homer; but occasionally, and indeed frequently, in composing original poems for the gratification of his friends, or in the more difficult employment of revising the productions of less gifted poets. The few letters he wrote at this time abound with apologies for his seeming negligence, and with descriptions of the manner in which he employed his time. To one of his correspondents he thus writes: "I know that you are too reasonable a man to expect anything like punctuality of correspondence from a translator of Homer, especially from one who is a doer also of many other things at the same time; for I labour hard, not only to acquire a little fame for myself, but to win it for others, men of whom I know nothing, not even their names, who send me their poetry, that by translating it out of prose into verse, I may make it more like poetry than it was. I begin to perceive that if a man will be an author, he must live neither to himself nor to his friends so much as to others whom he never saw nor shall see. I feel myself in no small degree unworthy of the kind solicitude which you express concerning me and my welfare, after a silence so much longer than you had reason to expect. I should indeed account myself inexcusable, had I not to allege in my defence, perpetual engagements of such a kind as could by no means be dispensed with. Had Homer alone been in question, Homer should have made room for you; but I have had other work in hand at the same time, equally pressing and more laborious. Let it suffice to say, that I have not wilfully neglected you for a moment, and that you have never been out of my thoughts a day together. Having heard all this, you will feel yourself disposed not only to pardon my long silence, but to pity me for the causes of it. You may, if you please, believe likewise, for it is true, that I have a faculty of remembering my friends even when I do not write to them, and of loving them not one jot the less, though I leave them to starve for want of a letter from me."

In a letter to Mr. Newton, 16th August, 1789, Cowper thus describes the situation in which he was then placed, and the state of his mind at the time: "Mrs. Newton and you are both kind and just in believing that I do not love you the less when I am long silent; perhaps a friend of mine who wishes to be always in my thoughts, is never so effectually possessed of the accomplishment of that wish, as when I have been long his debtor; for then I think of him, not only every day, but day and night; and indeed all day long. But I confess at the same time that my thoughts of you will be more pleasant to myself, when I shall have exonerated my conscience by giving you the letter, so long your due. Therefore, here it comes,—little worth your having, but payment such as it is, that you have a right to expect, and that is essential to my own tranquillity. That the Iliad and the Odyssey should have proved the occasion of my suspending my correspondence with you, is a proof how little we see the consequences of what we publish. Homer, I dare say, hardly at all suspected, that at the fag end of time, two personages would appear, one ycleped, Sir Newton, and the other Sir Cowper, who loving each other heartily, would nevertheless suffer the pains of an interrupted intercourse,—his poems the cause. So, however, it has happened; and though it would not, I suppose, extort from the old bard a single sigh, if he knew it, yet to me it suggests the serious reflection above mentioned. An author by profession had need narrowly to watch his pen, lest a line should escape it, which by possibility may do mischief, when he has been long dead and buried. What we have done when we have written a book, will never be known till the day of judgment: then the account will be liquidated, and all the good that it has occasioned, and all the evil, will witness, either for or against us. I am now in the last book of the Odyssey, yet have still I suppose, half a year's work before me. The accurate revisal of two such voluminous poems can hardly cost me less. I rejoice, however, that the goal is in prospect; for though it has cost me years to run this race, it is only now that I begin to have a glimpse of its termination. That I shall never receive any proportionable pecuniary recompense for my long labours, is pretty certain; and as to any fame that I may possibly gain by it, that is a commodity that daily sinks in value, in measure as the consummation of all things approaches. In the day when the lion shall dandle the kid, and a little child shall lead them, the world will have lost all relish for the fabulous legends of antiquity, and Homer and his translator may budge off the stage together."

Some months afterwards, to the same correspondent Cowper thus writes: "On this fine first of December, under an unclouded sky, and in a room full of sunshine, I address myself to the payment of a debt, long in arrear, but never forgotten by me, however I may have seemed to forget it. I will not waste time in apologies; I have but one, and that one will suggest itself unmentioned. I will only add that you are the first to whom I write, of several to whom I have not written many months, who all have claims upon me; and who, I flatter myself, are all grumbling at my silence. In your case, perhaps I have been less anxious than in the case of some others; because, if you have not heard from myself, you have heard from Mrs. Unwin. From her you have learned that I live, that I am as well as usual, and that I translate Homer: three short items, but in which is comprised the whole detail of my present history. Thus I fared when you were here; thus I have fared ever since you were here; and thus, if it please God, I shall continue to fare for some time longer: for, though the work is done, it is not finished; a riddle which you, who are a brother of the press, will solve easily. I have been the less anxious on your behalf, because I have had frequent opportunities to hear from you; and have always heard that you are in good health, and happy. Of Mrs. Newton too, I have heard more favourable accounts of late, which has given us both the sincerest pleasure. Mrs. Unwin's case is, at present, my only subject of uneasiness, that is not immediately personal, and properly my own. She has almost constant head-aches; almost a constant pain in her side, which nobody understands; and her lameness, within the last half year, is very little amended. But her spirits are good, because supported by comforts which depend not on the state of the body; and I do not know that with all her pain, her appearance is at all altered, since we had the happiness to see you here, unless indeed it be altered a little for the better. I have thus given you as circumstantial an account of ourselves as I could: the most interesting matter, I verily believe, with which I could have filled my paper, unless I could have made spiritual mercies to myself the subject. In my next perhaps I shall find time to bestow a few lines on what is doing in France, and the Austrian Netherlands; though, to say the truth, I am much better qualified to write an essay on the seige of Troy, than to descant on any of these modern revolutions. I question if, in either of the countries just mentioned, full of bustle and tumult as they are, there be a single character, whom Homer, were he living, would deign to make his hero. The populace are the heroes now, and the stuff of which gentlemen heroes are made, seems to be all expended."

The year 1790, found Cowper still indefatigably engaged in preparing his translation for the press. In a letter to Mrs. King, 4th January, he thus writes: "Your long silence has occasioned me a thousand anxious thoughts about you. So long it has been, that whether I now write to a Mrs. King at present on earth, or already in heaven, I know not. I have friends whose silence troubles me less, though I have known them longer; because, if I hear not from themselves, I yet hear from others, that they are still living, and likely to live. But if your letters cease to bring me news of your welfare, from whom can I gain the desirable intelligence? The birds of the air will not bring it, and third person there is none between us by whom it might be conveyed. Nothing is plain to me in this subject, but that either you are dead, or very much indisposed, or which would perhaps affect me with as deep a concern, though of a different kind, very much offended. The latter of those suppositions I think the least probable, conscious as I am of an habitual desire to offend nobody, especially a lady, and a lady too who has laid me under so many obligations. But all the three solutions above mentioned are very uncomfortable; and if you live, and can send me one that will cause me less pain than either of them, I conjure you by the charity and benevolence which I know influence you on all occasions, to communicate it without delay. It is possible, notwithstanding appearances to the contrary, that you are not become perfectly indifferent to me, and to what concerns me. I will therefore add a word or two on the subject which once interested you, and which is, for that reason, worthy to be mentioned, though truly for no other. I am well, and have been so (uneasiness on your part excepted) both in mind and body ever since I wrote to you last. I have still the same employment; Homer in the morning, and Homer in the evening, as constant as the day goes round. In the spring I hope to send the Iliad and the Odyssey to the press. So much for me and my occupations."

It would scarcely be supposed that a person performing such an Herculean task as that of translating Homer, would have troubled himself to compose, or even to revise, a volume of hymns for children. The following extract, however, will show that, anxious as Cowper was to finish his Homer, he could nevertheless, allow his attention to be, in a great measure, diverted from it, at least for a time, when he thought he could employ his talents usefully. "I have long been silent, but you have had the charity, I hope, and believe, not to ascribe my silence to a wrong cause. The truth is, I have been too busy to write to any body, having been obliged to give my early mornings to the revisal and correction of a little volume of hymns for children, written, by I know not whom; this task I finished yesterday, and while it was in hand, wrote only to my cousin, and to her rarely. From her, however, I knew that you would hear of my well being, which made me less anxious about my debts to you than I could have been otherwise. The winter has been mild; but our winters are in general such, that when a friend leaves us in the beginning of that season, I always feel in my heart a perhaps, importing that we may possibly have met for the last time, and that the robins may whistle on the grave of one of us before the return of summer. Though I have been employed as described above, I am still thrumming Homer's lyre; that is to say, I am still employed in my last revisal; and to give you some idea of the intenseness of my toils, I will inform you that it cost me all the morning yesterday, and all the evening, to translate a single simile to my mind. The transitions from one member of the subject to another, though easy and natural in the Greek, turn out often so intolerably awkward in an English version, that almost endless labour, and no little address, are requisite to give them grace and elegance. The under parts of the poem, (those, I mean, which are merely narrative,) I find the most difficult.—These can only be supported by the diction, and on these, for that reason, I have bestowed the most abundant labour. Fine similies, and fine speeches, are more likely to take care of themselves; but the exact process of slaying a sheep and dressing it, is not so easy in our language, and in our measure to dignify. But I shall have the comfort, as I before said, to reflect, that whatever may be hereafter laid to my charge, the sin of idleness will not,—justly, at least it never will. In the mean time, I must be allowed to say, that not to fall short of the original in everything, is impossible. I thank you for your German clavis, which has been of considerable use to me; I am indebted to it for a right understanding of the manner in which Achilles prepared pork, mutton, and goats' flesh, for the entertainment of his friends, on the night when they came deputed by Agamemnon to negotiate a reconciliation. A passage of which nobody in the world is perfectly master, myself only, and Schaulfelbergerus excepted, nor ever was, except when Greek was a living language."

About this time, Mrs. King appears to have been informed that it was Cowper's intention to leave Weston, and that Mrs. Unwin had been making inquiries after a house at Huntingdon. Adverting to this report, in a letter to that lady, he thus writes:—"The report that informed you of inquiries made by Mrs. Unwin, after a house at Huntingdon, was unfounded. We have no thought of quitting Weston, unless the same Providence that led us hither should lead us away. It is a situation the most eligible, perfectly agreeable to us both, and to me in particular, who write much, and walk much, and, consequently, love silence and retirement. If it has a fault, it is, that it seems to threaten us with a certainty of never seeing you. But may we not hope that when a milder season shall have improved your health, we may yet, notwithstanding the distance, be favoured with Mr. King's and your company? A better season will likewise improve the roads, and exactly in proportion as it does so, will, in effect, lessen the interval between us. I know not if Mr. Martyn be a mathematician, but most probably he is a good one, and he can tell you that this is a proposition mathematically true, though rather paradoxical in appearance."

In a letter to Mr. Newton, 5 February, 1790, Cowper again plaintively describes the state of his mind.—"Your kind letter deserved a speedier answer, but you know my excuse, which were I to repeat always, my letters would resemble the fag end of a newspaper, where we always find the price of stocks, detailed with little or no variation. When January returns, you have your feelings concerning me, and such as prove the faithfulness of your friendship. I have mine also concerning myself, but they are of a cast different from yours. Yours have a mixture of sympathy and tender solicitude, which makes them, perhaps, not altogether unpleasant. Mine, on the contrary, are of an unmixed nature, and consist simply, and merely, of the most alarming apprehensions. Twice has that month returned upon me, accompanied by such horrors, as I have no reason to suppose ever made part of the experience of any other man. I, accordingly, look forward to it, and meet it with a dread not to be imagined. I number the nights as they pass, and in the morning bless myself that another night is gone, and no harm has happened. This may argue, perhaps, some imbecility of mind, and, indeed, no small degree of it; but it is natural, I believe, and so natural as to be necessary and unavoidable. I know that God is not governed by secondary causes, in any of his operations; and that, on the contrary, they are all so many agents, in his hand, which strike only when he bids them. I know, consequently, that one month is as dangerous to me as another; and that in the middle of summer, at noonday, and in the clear sunshine, I am, in reality, unless guarded by Him, as much exposed as when fast asleep at midnight, and mid-winter. But we are not always the wiser for our knowledge, and I can no more avail myself of mine, in this case, than if it were in the head of any other man, and not in my own. I have heard of bodily aches and ails, that have been particularly troublesome when the season returned in which the hurt that occasioned them was received. The mind, I believe, (with my own, however, I am sure it is so,) is liable to similar periodical affection. But February is come; January, my terror, is passed; and some shades of the gloom that attended his presence have passed with him. I look forward with a little cheerfulness to the buds and the leaves that will soon appear, and say to myself, till they turn yellow, I will make myself easy. The year will go round, and January will approach. I shall tremble again, and I know it; but in the meantime I will be as comfortable as I can. Thus, with respect to peace of mind, such as it is, that I enjoy. I subsist, as the poor are vulgarly said to do, from hand to mouth; and of a Christian, such us you once knew me, am, by a strange transformation, become an epicurean philosopher, bearing this motto on my mind,—Quid sit futurum cras, fuge quærere."

Towards the end of this month, Cowper received as a present, from Mrs. Bodham, a cousin of his, then residing in Norfolk, his mother's portrait. The following extracts will show the powerful impression which this circumstance made upon his tender mind:—"My dearest Rose,* whom I thought withered and fallen from the stalk, but whom I find still alive: nothing could give me greater pleasure than to know it, and to learn it from yourself. I loved you dearly when you were a child, and love you not a jot the less for having ceased to be so. Every creature that bears any affinity to my mother is dear to me, and you, the daughter of her brother, are but one remove distant from her. I love you, therefore, and love you much, both for her sake, and for your own. The world could not have furnished you with a present so acceptable to me as the picture you have so kindly sent me. I received it the night before last, and received it with a trepidation of nerves and spirits, somewhat akin to what I should have felt had the dear original presented herself to my embraces. I kissed it, and hung it where it is the last object that I see at night, and, of course, the first that I open my eyes upon in the morning. She died when I had completed my sixth year, yet I remember her well, and am an ocular witness of the great fidelity of the copy. I remember too, a multitude of the maternal tendernesses which I received from her, and which have endeared her memory to me beyond expression. There is, I believe, in me, more of the Donne than of the Cowper, and though I love all of both names, and have a thousand reasons to love those of my own name, yet I feel the bond of nature draw me vehemently to your side. I was thought. in the days of my childhood, much to resemble my mother, and in my natural temper, of which, at the age of fifty-eight, I must be supposed a competent judge, can trace both her, and my late uncle, your father. Somewhat of his irritability, and a little. I would hope, both of his, and of her ——, I know not what to call it, without seeming to praise myself, which is not my intention; but speaking to you, I will even speak out, and say good nature. Add to all this, I deal much in poetry, as did our venerable ancestor, the Dean of St. Paul's, and I think I shall have proved myself a Donne at all points. The truth is, whatever I am, and wherever I am, I love you all."

* Mrs. Bobham's name is Anne, but Cowper always called her Rose, when a child, and was aware that she would remember his doing so.

To Lady Hesketh he thus adverts to the circumstance.—"I am delighted with Mrs. Bodham's kindness in giving me the only picture of my mother that is to be found, I suppose, in all the world. I had rather possess it than the richest jewel in the British crown, for I loved her with an affection, that her death, fifty years since, has not in the least abated. I remember her too, young as I was when she died, well enough to know that it is a very exact resemblance of her, and as such it is to me invaluable. Everybody loved her, and with an amiable character so impressed on all her features, everybody was sure to do so."

To John Johnson, Esq., 28th February, 1790, he thus records his feelings on this occasion. "I was never more pleased in my life than to learn, and to learn from herself, that my dearest Rose is still alive. Had she not engaged me to love her by the sweetness of her character when a child, she would have done it effectually now, by making me the most acceptable present in the world, my own dear mother's picture. I am perhaps the only person living who remembers her, but remember her well, and can attest on my own knowledge, the truth of the resemblance. Amiable and elegant as the countenance is, such exactly was her own; she was one of the tenderest parents, and so just a copy of her, is therefore to me invaluable. I wrote yesterday to my Rose, to tell her all this, and to thank her for her kindness in sending it! Neither do I forget your kindness, who intimated to her that I should be happy to possess it. She invites me into Norfolk, but alas! she might as well invite the house in which I dwell: for, all other considerations and impediments apart, how is it possible that a translator of Homer should lumber to such a distance. But though I cannot comply with her kind invitation, I have made myself the best amends in my power, by inviting her, and all the family of Donnes, to Weston." To Mrs. King, on the same interesting occasion, he writes: "I have lately received from a female cousin of mine in Norfolk, whom I have not seen these five-and-twenty years, a picture of my own mother. She died when I wanted two days of being six years old; yet I remember her perfectly, find the picture a strong resemblance of her, and because her memory has been ever precious to me, I have written a poem on the receipt of it; a poem which, one excepted, I had more pleasure in writing than any that I ever wrote. That one was addressed to a lady whom I expect in a few minutes to come down to breakfast, and who has supplied to me the place of my own mother—my own invaluable mother, these six-and-twenty years. Some sons may be said to have had many fathers, but a plurality of mothers is not common."

In May of this year, 1790, Cowper thus describes the manner in which he was employed. "I am still at my old sport—Homer all the morning, and Homer all the evening. Thus have I been held in constant employment, I know not exactly how many, but I believe these six years, an interval of eight months excepted. It is now become so familiar to me to take Homer from my shelf at a certain hour, that I shall, no doubt, continue to take him from my shelf at the same time, even after I have ceased to want him. That period is not far distant. I am now giving the last touches to a work, which had I foreseen the difficulty of it, I should never have meddled with; but which, having at length nearly finished it to my mind, I shall discontinue with regret."

Perhaps no one was ever better qualified to give sound and judicious advice to persons in various conditions in life than Cowper, and no one certainly ever gave it more cheerfully, or in a manner more perfectly unassuming. An instance of this occurred in a letter which he wrote in June of this year, to his cousin, John Johnson, Esq., who was then pursuing his studies at Cambridge, who had recently been introduced to him, and for whom he entertained the most affectionate regard. "You never pleased me more than when you told me you had abandoned your mathematical pursuits. It grieved me to think that you were wasting your time merely to gain a little Cambridge fame; not scarcely worth your having. I cannot be contented that your renown should thrive nowhere but on the banks of the Cam. Conceive a nobler ambition, and never let your honour be circumscribed by the paltry dimensions of a University. It is well that you have already, as you observe, acquired sufficient information in that science to enable you to pass creditably such examinations as I suppose you must hereafter undergo. Keep what you have gotten, and be content: more is needless. You could not apply to a worse than I am to advise you concerning your studies. I was never a regular student myself, but lost the most valuable part of my life in an attorney's office, and in the Temple. I will not therefore give myself airs, and affect to know what I know not. The affair is of great importance to you, and you should be directed by a wiser than I. To speak, however, in very general terms on the subject, it seems to me that your chief concern is with history, natural philosophy, logic, and divinity; as to metaphysics, I know but little about them. But the very little I do know has not taught me to admire them. Life is too short to afford time even for serious trifles; pursue what you know to be attainable; make truth your object, and your studies will make you a wise man."

In the summer of 1790, much as Cowper's time was occupied in giving the finishing touch to his Homer, he nevertheless, at the suggestion of some friend, undertook to translate a series of Latin letters, received from a Dutch minister of the gospel, at the Cape of Good Hope. This occupation, though it left him but little time for writing to his numerous correspondents, afforded him considerable pleasure. There was a congeniality in it to the prevailing disposition of his mind, and in a letter to Mr. Newton, who requested him to publish these letters, he thus writes: "I have no objection at all to being known as the translator of Van Leer's letters, when they shall be published. Rather, I am ambitious of it as an honour. It will serve to prove that if I have spent much time to little purpose in the translation of Homer, some small portion of my time has, however, been well disposed of."

It will have been perceived, from the extracts we have already made, that Cowper's gloomy peculiarity of mind still prevailed, at least occasionally, to a painful extent. It is true, he adverts to it in his letters, at this time, less frequently than formerly; he introduces it, however, sufficiently often to show, that it had undergone no diminution, and that it was suppressed only by the intense application which his engagements required. The following extracts from his letters written towards the close of 1790, will describe the state of his mind in this respect, at that period. "I have singularities of which I believe, at present you know nothing; and which would fill you with wonder if you knew them. I will add, however, in justice to myself, that they would not lower me in your good opinion; though perhaps they might tempt you to question the soundness of my upper story. Almost twenty years have I been thus unhappily circumstanced; and the remedy is in the hands of God only. That I make you this partial communication on the subject, conscious at the same time that you are well worthy to be entrusted with the whole, is merely because the recital would be too long for a letter, and painful both to me and to you. But all this may vanish in a moment, and if it please God, it shall. In the mean time, my dear Madam, remember me in your prayers, and mention me at those times, as one whom it has pleased God to afflict with singular visitations. Twice I have been overwhelmed with the blackest despair; and at those times, everything in which I have been at any time of my life concerned, has afforded to the enemy a handle against me. I tremble, therefore, almost at every step I take, lest on some future similar occasion, it should yield him opportunity, and furnish him with means to torment me."

On another occasion he thus writes:—"A yellow shower of leaves is now continually falling from all the trees in the country. A few moments only seem to have passed since they were buds; and in a few moments more they will have disappeared! It is one advantage of a rural situation, that it affords many hints of the rapidity with which life flies, that do not occur in towns and cities. It is impossible for a man, conversant with such scenes as surround me, not to advert daily to the shortness of his existence here, admonished of it, as he must be, by ten thousand objects. There was a time when I could contemplate my present state, and consider myself as a thing of the day with pleasure; when I numbered the seasons, as they passed in swift rotation, as a schoolboy numbers the days that interpose between the next vacation, when he shall see his parents, and enjoy his home again. But to make so just an estimate of a life like this, is no longer in my power. The consideration of my short continuance here, which was once grateful to me, now fills me with regret. I would live, and live always, and am become such another wretch as Mæcenas was, who wished for long life—he cared not at what expense of sufferings. The only consolation left me on this subject is, that the voice of the Almighty can, in one moment, cure me of this mental infirmity. That He can, I know by experience; and there are reasons for which I ought to believe that he will. But from hope to despair is a transition that I have made so often, that I can only consider the hope that may come, and that sometimes I believe will, as a short prelude to joy, to a miserable conclusion of sorrow, that shall never end. Thus are my brightest prospects clouded; and thus, to me, is hope itself become like a withered flower, that has lost both its hue and its fragrance. I ought not to have written in this dismal strain to you, nor did I intend it; you have more need to be cheered than saddened; but a dearth of other themes constrained me to choose myself for a subject, and of myself I can write no otherwise."

Early in December, 1790, Cowper had a short but severe attack of that nervous fever to which he was very subject, and which he dreaded above all others, because it generally preceded a most severe paroxysm of melancholy. Happily, on this occasion, it lasted only for a short time; and in a letter to Mrs. King, dated the last day of the year, he thus records his feelings on the occasion:—"I have lately been visited with an indisposition much more formidable than that which I mentioned to you in my last—a nervous fever, a disorder to which I am subject, and which I dread above all others, because it comes attended by a melancholy perfectly insupportable. This is the first day of my complete recovery, the first in which I have perceived no symptoms of my terrible malady. I wish to be thankful to the Sovereign Dispenser both of health and of sickness, that, though I have felt cause enough to tremble, He gives me now encouragement to hope that I may dismiss my fears, and expect an escape from my depressive malady. The only drawback to the comfort I now feel, is the intelligence contained in yours, that neither Mr. King nor yourself are well. I dread always, both for my own health and for that of my friends, the unhappy influences of a year worn out. But, my dear Madam, this is the last day of it, and I resolve to hope that the new year shall obliterate all the disagreeables of the old one. I can wish nothing more warmly, than that it may prove a propitious year for you."

In the autumn of this year Cowper had sent his "Homer" to the press; and through the whole of the ensuing winter he was closely employed in correcting the proof-sheets, and making such alterations as he still thought desirable. The time which this consumed, and the indefatigable industry with which he engaged in it, will be seen by the following extracts:—"My poetical operations, I mean of the occasional kind, have lately been pretty much at a stand. I told you, I believe, in my last, that 'Homer,' in the present stage of the process, occupied me more intensely than ever. He still continues to do so, and threatens, till he shall be completely finished, to make all other composition impracticable. I am sick and ashamed of myself that I forgot my promise, but it is actually true that I did forget it. You, however, I did not forget; nor did I forget to wonder and be alarmed at your silence, being myself perfectly unconscious of my arrears. All this, together with various other trespasses of mine, must be set down to the account of Homer; and, wherever he is, he is bound to make his apology to all my correspondents, but to you in particular. True it is, that if Mrs. Unwin did not call me from that pursuit, I should forget, in the ardour with which I persevere in it, both to eat and to drink, if not to retire to rest! This zeal has increased in me regularly as I have proceeded, and in an exact ratio, as a mathematician would say, to the progress I have made towards the point at which I have been aiming. You will believe this, when I tell you that, not contented with my previous labours, I have actually revised the whole work, and have made a thousand alterations in it since it has been in the press. I have now, however, tolerably well satisfied myself at least, and trust that the printer and I shall trundle along merrily to the conclusion."

In the commencement of 1791, Cowper's long-tried friend, Mr. Newton, lost his wife. She died sometime in January, after many months' severe suffering, borne with exemplary fortitude and patience. She had always taken a lively interest in Cowper's welfare; and, when she resided at Olney, had frequently assisted Mrs. Unwin in the arduous duty of watching over the poet, during his painful mental depression. Her decease, therefore, was sure to affect him deeply; and the following extracts from his letters to Mr. Newton, on this trying occasion, will not fail to be interesting:—"Had you been a man of the world, I should have held myself bound, by the law of ceremonies, to have sent you long since my tribute of condolence. I have sincerely mourned with you; and though you have lost a wife, and I only a friend, yet do I understand too well the value of such a friend as Mrs. Newton, not to have sympathized with you very nearly. But you are not a man of the world; neither can you, who have the scripture, and the Giver of the scripture to console you, have any need of aid from others, or expect it from such spiritual imbecility as mine."

"It affords me sincere pleasure that you enjoy serenity of mind, after your great loss. It is well in all circumstances, even in the most afflictive, with those who have God for their comforter. You do me justice in giving entire credit to my expressions of friendship for you. No day passes in which I do not look back to the days that are fled, and consequently none in which I do not feel myself affectionately reminded of you, and of her whom you have lost for a season. I cannot even see Olney spire from any of the fields in the neighbourhood, much less can I enter the town, and still less the vicarage, without experiencing the force of those mementoes, and recollecting a multitude of passages to which you and yours were parties. The past would appear a dream, were the remembrance of it less affecting. It was, in the most important respects, so unlike my present moment, that I am sometimes almost tempted to suppose it a dream! But the difference between dreams and realities long since elapsed, seems to consist chiefly in this: that a dream, however painful or pleasant at the time, and perhaps for a few ensuing hours, passes like an arrow through the air, leaving no trace of its flight behind it; but our actual experiences make a lasting impression. We review those which interested us much when they occurred, with hardly less interest than in the first instance; and whether few years or many have intervened, our sensibility makes them still present—such a mere nullity is time, to a creature to whom God gives a feeling heart and the faculty of recollection."

In June, 1791, having completed his long and arduous undertaking—the translation of "Homer," he thus writes to Mr. Newton on the occasion:—"Considering the multiplicity of your engagements, and the importance, no doubt, of most of them, I am bound to set the higher value on your letters; and, instead of grumbling that they come so seldom, to be thankful to you that they come at all. You are now going into the country, where I presume you will have less to do; and I am rid of "Homer:" let us try, therefore, if in the interval between the present hour and the next busy season (for I too, if I live, shall probably be occupied again,) we can contrive to exchange letters more frequently than for some time past. You do justice to me, and to Mrs. Unwin, when you assure yourself that to hear of your health, will give us pleasure. I know not, in truth, whose health and well-being could give us more. The years that we have seen together will never be out of our remembrance; and, so long as we remember them, we must remember you with affection. In the pulpit, and out of the pulpit, you have laboured in every possible way to serve us; and we must have a short memory indeed for the kindness of a friend, could we by any means become forgetful of yours. It would grieve me more than it does, to hear you complain of the effects of time, were not I also myself the subject of them. While he is wearing out you and other dear friends of mine, he spares not me; for which I ought to account myself obliged to him, since I should otherwise be in danger of surviving all that I have ever loved—the most melancholy lot that can befal a mortal. God knows what will be my doom hereafter; but precious as life necessarily seems to a mind doubtful of its future happiness, I love not the world, I trust, so much, as to wish a place in it when all my beloved shall have left it. As to Homer, I am sensible that, except as an amusement, he was never worth my meddling with; but, as an amusement, he was to me invaluable. As such, he served me more than five years; and in that respect I know not, at present, where I shall find his equal. You oblige me by saying, that you will read him for my sake. I verily believe that any person of a spiritual turn may read him to some advantage. He may suggest reflections that may not be unserviceable, even in a sermon; for I know not where we can find more striking examples of the pride, the arrogance, and the insignificance of man; at the same time that, by ascribing all events to a divine interposition, he inculcates constantly the belief of a Providence; insists much on the duty of charity towards the poor and the stranger; on the respect that is due to superiors, and to our seniors in particular; and on the expedience and necessity of prayer and piety towards the gods; a piety mistaken indeed in its object, but exemplary for the punctuality of its performance.—Thousands who will not learn from scripture to ask a blessing, either on their actions or on their food, may learn it, if they please, from Homer."

It appears from the above extract that Cowper had no expectations of again seeing his Homer until it was actually before the public. Johnson, the publisher, however, unexpectedly to him, sent him an interleaved copy, and recommended him to revise it again before it was fully committed to the press. On this occasion, he thus writes to his friend Mr. Newton:—"I did not foresee, when I challenged you to a brisker correspondence, that a new engagement of all my leisure time was at hand,—a new, and yet an old one. An interleaved copy of my Homer arrived soon after from Johnson, in which he recommended it to me to make any alterations that might yet be expedient, with a view to another impression. The alterations that I make are, indeed, but few, and they are also short; not more, perhaps, than half a line in two thousand. But the lines are, I suppose, nearly forty thousand in all; and to revise them critically must consequently be a work of time and labour. I suspend it, however, for your sake, till the present sheet be filled, and that I may not seem to shrink from my own offer. Were I capable of envying, in the strict sense of the word, a good man, I should envy Mr. Venn, and Mr. Berridge, and yourself, who have spent, and while they last, will continue to spend, your lives in the service of the only Master worth serving; labouring always for the souls of men, and not to tickle their ears, as I do. But this I can say, God knows how much rather I would be the obscure tenant of a lath and plaster cottage, with a lively sense of my interest in a Redeemer, than the most admired object of public notice without it. Alas! what is a whole poem, even one of Homer's, compared with a single aspiration that finds its way immediately to God, though clothed in ordinary language, or perhaps, not articulated at all.—These are my sentiments as much as ever they were, though my days are all running to waste among Greeks and Trojans. The night cometh when no man can work; and if I am ordained to work to better purpose, that desirable period cannot be far distant. My day is beginning to shut in, as every man's must, who is on the verge of sixty."

CHAPTER XV.

Publication of his Homer—Anxiety respecting it—To whom dedicated—Benefits he had derived from it—Feels the want of employment—Prepares materials for a splendid edition of Milton's poetic works—Vindicates his character—Attempts of his friends to dissuade him from his new engagement—His replies—The commencement of his acquaintance with Mr. Hayley—Pleasure it afforded Mr. Hayley—Mrs. Unwin's first attack of paralysis—Manner in which it affected Cowper—Remarks on Milton's labours—Reply to Mr. Newton's letter for original composition—Continuance of his depression—First letter from Mr. Hayley—Unpleasant circumstances respecting it—Mr. Hayley's first visit to Weston—Kind manner in which he was received—Mrs. Unwin's second severe paralytic attack—Cowper's feelings on the occasion—Mr. Hayley's departure—Cowper's warm attachment to him—Reflections on the recent changes he had witnessed—Promises to visit Eartham—Makes preparations for the journey—Peculiarity of his feelings on the occasion.

On the 1st July, 1791, Cowper's Homer appeared.—After so many years of incessant toil, it was not to be expected that he would feel otherwise than anxious respecting the reception it met with from the public. He had laboured indefatigably to produce a faithful and free translation of the inimitable original, and he could not be indifferent to the result. To Mrs. King he thus writes on the occasion:—"My Homer is gone forth, and I can sincerely say,—joy go with it! What place it holds in the estimation of the generality I cannot tell, having heard no more about it since its publication than if no such work existed. I must except, however, an anonymous eulogium from some man of letters, which I received about a week ago. It was kind in a perfect stranger, as he avows himself to be, to relieve me in some degree, at least, at so early a day, from much of the anxiety that I could not but feel on such an occasion: I should be glad to know who he is, only that I might thank him."

Cowper, very properly, dedicated the Illiad to his noble relative Earl Cowper, and the Odyssey to the dowager Countess Spencer, whom, in one of his letters he thus describes:—"We had a visit on Monday from one of the first women in the world; I mean, in point of character and accomplishments,—the Dowager Lady Spencer! I may receive, perhaps, some honours hereafter, should my translation speed according to my wishes, and the pains I have taken with it; but shall never receive any that I esteem so highly; she is indeed, worthy, to whom I should dedicate, and may but my Odyssey prove as worthy of her, I shall have nothing to fear from the critics."

Whether it arose from the unreasonable expectations of the public, or from the utter impossibility of conveying all the graces and the beauties of these unrivalled poems, in a translation, it is certain that the volumes, when they appeared, did not give that satisfaction, either to the author, or to his readers, which had been anticipated. It would, perhaps, be difficult, if not impossible, to assign a better reason, for the imperfection of Cowper's translation, if imperfection it deserves to be called, than that mentioned by his justly admired biographer, Mr. Hayley.—"Homer is so exquisitely beautiful in his own language, and he has been so long an idol in every literary mind, that any copy of him, which the best of modern poets can execute, must probably resemble in its effect, the portrait of a graceful woman, painted by an excellent artist for her lover; the lover, indeed, will acknowledge great merit in the work, and think himself much indebted to the skill of such an artist, but he will never acknowledge, as in truth he never can feel, that the best of resemblances exhibits all the graces that he discerns in the beloved original. So fares it with the admirers of Homer; his very translators themselves, feel so perfectly the power of this predominant affection, that they gradually grow discontented with their own labour, however approved in the moment of its supposed completion. This was so remarkably the case with Cowper, that in process of time we shall see him employed upon what may almost be called his second translation, so great were the alterations he made in a deliberate revisal of the work, for a second edition. And in the preface to that edition, he has spoken of his own labour with the most frank and ingenuous veracity. Yet of the first edition it may, I think, be fairly said, that it accomplished more than any of his poetical predecessors had achieved before him. It made the nearest approach to that sweet majestic simplicity which forms one of the most attractive features in the great prince and father of poets."

If Cowper had derived no other benefit from his translation, than that of constant employment, for so long a time, when he stood so much in need of it, it would have been to him invaluable, as the best and most effectual remedy for that inordinate sensibility to which he was subject. Besides this, however, it procured him other advantages of paramount importance; it improved the general state of his health; it introduced him to a circle of literary friends, whom he would otherwise never have known, and who, when they once knew him, could not fail to feel affectionately interested in his welfare; it brought him into closer contact with those with whom he had previously been acquainted, by inducing him to avail himself of their kind offers and assistance in the transcribing way,[*] which to a mind like his could not fail to become a source of almost uninterrupted enjoyment; it established his reputation as a most accomplished scholar, and unquestionably ranked him among the highest class of poets.

A living writer has well remarked, that "to Cowper's translation of Homer, we are beholden, not only for the pleasure which a perusal will be sure to afford to reasonable and patient readers, but we may attribute to its happy possession of his mind all the beautiful and inimitable letters which appear in his correspondence, during the progress of that work. The toil of daily turning over the thoughts of the greatest of poets, in every form of English that his ingenuity could devise, occupied, for many years, that very portion of his time which, with a person of no profession, and having no stated duties to perform, lies heaviest upon the spirit. The salutary exercise of his morning studies made him relish with keener zest, the relaxation of his social hours, or those welcome opportunities of epistolary converse with the absent, in which it is evident that much of the little happiness allowed to him lay; he is never more at home, consequently never more amiable, sprightly, and entertaining, and even poetical, than in his correspondence, when he pours out all the treasures of his mind and the affections of his heart, upon the paper which is to be the speaking representative of himself to those he loves. It has often been regretted that instead of this labour in vain, as the translation of Homer has sometimes seemed to many, he had not spent an equal portion of time and talent on original composition. The regret is at least as much bestowed in vain, as was that labour, for there is no well-founded reason to suppose, from the momentary jeopardy in which he lived, of being plunged into sudden, irretrievable despondence, that if he had been otherwise employed, he could have maintained even that small share of health and cheerfulness which he enjoyed.

[*] It is said that Broome assisted Pope very largely in his translation of Homer; but Cowper had no assistant in that way. All the Throckmorton family, Lady Hesketh, Mrs. Johnson, and many others, helped him as transcribers, and only as such.

It is not to be expected that a mind like Cowper's could remain for any lengthened period unemployed. Accustomed as he had long been to intense application, when he had completed his great work, he immediately felt the want of some other engagement. To a mind less active than his, replying to his correspondents, which had now become most extensive, would have been employment amply sufficient—especially as he was considerably in arrears with them, owing to his previous labours. This, however, was not enough for Cowper. He wanted something more worthy of his powers; something that required more vigour of thought, and demanded more severe application. Several of his friends again urged him for original composition, and in all probability they would have been successful, had he not, about this time, received a letter from his publisher, of whose judgment and integrity he had always entertained a high opinion, recommending him to prepare materials for a splendid edition of Milton. To this proposal Cowper immediately assented. He had always expressed himself delighted with Milton's poetry, and on one occasion, in a letter to his friend Mr. Unwin, had thus ventured to defend his character from the severe censures cast upon him by Johnson, in his "Lives of the Poets:"—"I have been well entertained with Johnson's biography, for which I thank you; with one exception, and that a swinging one, I think he has acquitted himself with his usual good sense and sufficiency. His treatment of Milton is unmerciful to the last degree. He has belaboured that great poet's character with the most industrious cruelty. As a man, he has hardly left him the shadow of one good quality. Churlishness in his private life, and a rancorous hatred of everything royal in his public, are the two colours with which he has smeared all the canvas. If he had any virtues, they are not to be found in the Doctor's picture of him, and it is well for Milton, that some sourness in his temper is the only vice, with which his memory has been charged; it is evident enough, that if his biographer could have discovered more, he would not have spared him. As a poet he has treated him with severity enough, and has plucked one or two of the most beautiful feathers out of his muse's wing, and trampled them under his great foot. He has passed sentence of condemnation upon Lycidas, and has taken occasion from that charming poem, to expose to ridicule (what is indeed ridiculous enough) the childish prattlings of pastoral compositions, as if Lycidas was the prototype and pattern of them all. The liveliness of the description, the sweetness of the numbers, the classical spirit of antiquity that prevails in it, go for nothing. I am convinced by the way, that he has no ear for poetical numbers, or that it was stopped by prejudice against the harmony of Milton's. Was there ever any thing so delightful as the music of the Paradise lost? It is like that of a fine organ; has the fullest and the deepest tones of majesty, with all the sofness and elegance of the Dorian flute. Variety without end, and never equalled, unless perhaps by Virgil. Yet the Doctor has little or nothing to say upon this copious theme, but talks something about the unfitness of the English language for blank-verse, and how apt it is, in the mouth of some readers, to degenerate into declamation."

Cowper had no sooner made up his mind on the subject of his new engagement, than he communicated it to his correspondents. To one he writes, "I am deep in a new literary engagement, being retained by my bookseller as editor of an intended most magnificent edition of Milton's Poetical Works. This will occupy me as much as Homer did, for a year or two to come; and when I have finished it, I shall have run through all the degrees of my profession, as author, translator, and editor. I know not that a fourth could be found; but if a fourth can be found, I dare say I shall find it. I am now translating Milton's Latin poems. I give them, as opportunity offers, all the variety of measures that I can. Some I render in heroic rhymes, some in stanzas, some in seven, some in eight syllable measure, and some in blank verse. They will altogether, I hope, make an agreeable miscellany for the English reader. They are certainly good in themselves, and cannot fail to please, but by the fault of their translator."

One of his most esteemed correspondents, the Rev. Walter Bagot, attempted to dissuade him from entering upon his new engagement, and urged him to publish in a third volume, what original pieces he had already composed, added to a translation of Milton's Latin and Italian poems. Had this plan been suggested to him earlier, he would, in all probability, have pursued it, as he thus writes to his friend on the subject. "As to Milton, the die is cast. I am engaged, have bargained with Johnson, and cannot recede. I should otherwise have been glad to do as you advise, to make the translation of his Latin and Italian poems, part of another volume, for with such an addition, I have nearly as much verse in my budget, as would be required for the purpose."

From some expressions in a letter to Rev. Mr. Hurdis, the author of The Village Curate, with whom Cowper had entered into a correspondence, a few months previous to this, and to whom he had written several most interesting letters; it would appear as if he entered upon his new engagement, rather precipitately, and without due consideration. "I am much obliged to you for wishing that I were employed in some original work, rather than in translation. To tell the truth, I am of your mind; and unless I could find another Homer, I shall promise (I believe) and vow, when I have done with Milton, never to translate again. But my veneration for our great countryman is equal to what I feel for the Grecian; and consequently I am happy, and feel myself honourably employed, whatever I do for Milton. I am now translating his Epitaphium Damonis; a pastoral, in my judgment, equal to any of Virgil's Bucolics, but of which Dr. Johnson (so it pleased him) speaks, as I remember, contemptuously. But he who never saw any beauty in a rural scene, was not likely to have much taste for a pastoral. In pace quiescat!"

Among other consequences resulting from his new undertaking, one of the most gratifying to himself was, its becoming the means of introducing him to an acquaintance with his esteemed friend, and future biographer, Mr. Hayley. This important event in Cowper's life,—so it afterwards proved,—is related with so much beauty and simplicity by Mr. Hayley, in his life of Cowper, and reflects a lustre so bright on both the biographer and the poet, that we cannot do better that give it in his own words. Mr. Hayley thus relates the circumstance. "As it is to Milton that I am in a great measure indebted for what I must ever regard as a signal blessing, the friendship of Cowper, the reader will pardon me for dwelling a little on the circumstances that produced it: circumstances which often lead me to repeat those sweet verses of my friend, on the casual origin of our valuable attachments."

"Mysterious are His ways whose power
Brings forth that unexpected hour,
When minds that never met before
Shall meet, unite, and part no more:
It is the allotment of the skies,
The hand of the supremely wise,
That guides and governs our affections,
And plans and orders our connections."

"These charming lines strike with peculiar force on my heart, when I recollect that it was an idle endeavour to make us enemies, which gave rise to our intimacy, and that I was providentially conducted to Weston at a season when my presence there afforded peculiar comfort to my affectionate friend, under the pressure of a very heavy domestic affliction which threatened to overwhelm his very tender spirits. The entreaty of many persons whom I wished to oblige, had engaged me to write a life of Milton, before I had the slightest suspicion that my work could interfere with the projects of any man; but I was soon surprised and concerned in hearing that I was represented in a newspaper as an antagonist of Cowper. I immediately wrote to him on the subject, and our correspondence soon endeared us to each other in no common degree. The series of his letters to me I value, not only as memorials of a most dear and honourable friendship, but as exquisite examples of epistolary excellence."

The above interesting extract will have informed the reader that Mr. Hayley paid Cowper a visit at Weston; this visit, however, so gratifying to both parties, did not take place till the beginning of May, 1792. In the December previous, Cowper met with one of the heaviest domestic calamities he had ever experienced. Mrs. Unwin, his affectionate companion who had watched over him, with so much tenderness and anxiety, for so many years, was suddenly attacked with strong symptoms of paralysis. In a letter to his friend, Mr. Rose, dated 21st December, 1791, Cowper thus relates this painful event:—"On Saturday last, while I was at my desk, near the window, and Mrs. Unwin at the fire-side opposite to it, I heard her suddenly exclaim, 'Oh! Mr. Cowper, don't let me fall!' I turned, and saw her actually falling, and started to her side just in time to prevent her. She was seized with a violent giddiness, which lasted, though with some abatement, the whole day, and was attended with some other very, very alarming symptoms. At present, however, she is relieved from the vertigo, and seems, in all respects, better. She has been my faithful and affectionate nurse for many years, and consequently has a claim on all my attentions. She has them, and will have them, as long as she wants them, which will probably be, at the least, a considerable time to come. I feel the shock, as you may suppose, in every nerve. God grant that there may be no repetition of it. Another such a stroke upon her would, I think, overset me completely; but, at present, I hold up bravely."

Notwithstanding the interruption of Cowper's studies, occasioned by Mrs. Unwin's indisposition, and by the extreme slowness of her recovery, he had now become so much accustomed to regular employment, and had derived from it so many advantages, that he could not possibly remain inactive. In the month of February we find him thus employed. "Milton, at present, engrosses me altogether. His Latin pieces I have translated, and have begun with the Italian. These are few, and will not detain me long. I shall proceed immediately to deliberate upon, and to settle the plan of my commentary, which I have hitherto had but little time to consider. I look forward to it, for this reason, with some anxiety. I trust, at least, that this anxiety will cease, when I have once satisfied myself about the best manner of conducting it. But, after all, I seem to fear more the labour to which it calls, than any great difficulty with which it is likely to be attended. To the labours of versifying I have no objection, but to the labours of criticism I am new, and apprehend that I shall find them wearisome. Should that be the case I shall be dull, but must be contented to share the censure of being so, with almost all the commentators that have ever existed. I will, however, have no horrida bella, if I can help it. It is, at least, my present purpose to avoid them if possible; for which reason, I shall confine myself merely to the business of an annotator, which is my proper province, and shall sift out of Warton's notes every tittle that relates to the private character, political or religious principles of my author. These are properly subjects for a biographer's handling, but by no means, as it seems to me, for a commentator's."

In reply to a pressing letter from his friend, Mr. Newton, for original composition, written about this time, Cowper thus expresses himself:—"Your demand for more original composition from me will, if I live, and it please God to afford me health, in all probability, be sooner or later gratified. In the meantime you need not, and if you turn the matter over in your thoughts a little, you will perceive that you need not, think me unworthily employed in preparing a new edition of Milton. His two principal poems are of a kind that call for an editor who believes the gospel, and is well grounded in evangelical doctrine. Such an editor they have never had, though only such an one can be qualified for the office."

The peculiarity of Cowper's religious feelings still continued to exist; and it seemed impossible for him to divest himself entirely of those gloomy apprehensions, of his own personal interest in the blessings of the gospel, which had harassed and distressed him for so many years. On every other subject he could write, and converse, with ease to himself, and with pleasure to others; but the morbid tendency of his mind to despondency, tinged all his remarks with midnight gloom whenever he adverted to this. An instance of this occurred in one of his letters to Mr. Newton about this time. After describing, in his own playful manner, some changes that had recently taken place in the circle of his immediate acquaintance, he thus closes his letter, which, notwithstanding the excellence of the remarks, evinces the existence of considerable depression. "Such is this variable scene, so variable, that, had the reflections I sometimes make upon it a permanent influence, I should tremble at the thought of a new connection; and to be out of the reach of its mutability, lead almost the life of a hermit. It is well with those, who, like you, have God for their companion; death cannot deprive them of him, and he changes not the place of his abode. Other changes, therefore, to them are all supportable; and what you say of your own experience is the strongest possible proof of it. Had you lived without God, you could not have endured the loss you mention. May he preserve me from a similar one; at least, till he shall be pleased to draw me to himself again. Then, if ever that day come, it will make me equal to my burden; at present, I can bear nothing well. I, however, generally manage to pass my time comfortably, as much so, at least, as Mrs. Unwin's frequent indisposition, and my no less frequent troubles of mind, will permit. When I am much distressed, any company but her's distresses me more, and makes me doubly sensible of my sufferings, though sometimes, I confess, it falls out otherwise; and by the help of more general conversation, I recover that elasticity of mind which is able to resist the pressure. On the whole, I believe, I am situated exactly as I should wish to be, were my situation determined by my own election; and am denied no comfort that is compatible with the total absence of the chief of all. I rejoiced, and had great reason to do so, in your coming to Weston, for I think the Lord came with you. Not, indeed, to abide with me, nor to restore me to that intercourse which I had with him, and which I enjoyed twenty years ago, but to awaken in me, however, more spiritual feeling than I have experienced, except in two instances, all that time. The comforts that I had received under your ministry in better days, all rushed upon my recollection; and, during two or three transient moments, seemed to be in a degree renewed. You will tell me that, transient as they were, they were yet evidences of a love that is not so; and I am desirous to believe it."

We have already informed our readers, that Cowper's engagement as the editor of Milton, became the means of introducing him to Mr. Hayley. He received the first letter from that gentleman in March, 1792. An incident occurred respecting this letter which ought not to go unrecorded; as it might have proved fatal to that friendship, which became to both the poets, a source of the purest enjoyment. Neither of these talented individuals, had, at that time, any knowledge of each other. Mr. Hayley had read Cowper's productions with no ordinary emotions of delight, and had consequently conceived the highest respect for their unknown author; and nothing could have occasioned him greater surprise, as well as uneasiness, than to be represented as the opponent of one whom he so highly respected. No sooner was he apprized of it than he wrote to Cowper, generously offering him any materials that he had collected, with as much assistance as it was in his power to afford, and being unacquainted with his address, directed his letter to the care of Johnson, his publisher. Either through the carelessness or inadvertence of Johnson, this letter remained in his hands for a considerable time, and was not delivered to Cowper till six weeks after it had been written. Immediately on receiving it Cowper wrote to Mr. Hayley, explaining the cause of his long delayed reply, and from that time, an interchange of many most interesting letters took place, which subsequently led to a friendship the most cordial and ardent, which it was only in the power of death to dissolve. In a letter to Lady Hesketh, Cowper thus adverts to this circumstance:—"Mr. Hayley's friendly and complimentary letter, from some unknown cause, at least to me, slept six weeks in Johnson's custody. It was necessary I should answer it without delay, accordingly I answered it the very evening on which I received it, giving him to understand, among other things, how much vexation the bookseller's folly had cost me, who had detained it so long, especially on account of the distress that I knew it must have occasioned to him also. From his reply, which the return of the post brought me, I learn that in the long interval of my non-correspondence he had suffered anxiety and mortification enough; so much so that I dare say he made twenty vows never to hazard again either letter or compliment to an unknown author. What, indeed, could he imagine less, than that I meant by such obstinate silence to tell him that I valued neither him nor his praises, nor his proffered friendship; in short, that I considered him as a rival, and, therefore, like a true author, hated and despised him. He is now, however, convinced that I love him, as indeed I do, and I account him the chief acquisition that my verse has ever procured me. Brute should I be if I did not, for he promises me every assistance in his power."

To Mr. Hayley, at the commencement of Cowper's correspondence with him, and after the above unpleasant occurrence had been satisfactorily accounted for, and amicably settled, he thus expresses his anxiety that the friendship thus formed might be lasting:—"God grant that this friendship of ours may be a comfort to us all the rest of our days, in a world where true friendships are rarities, and especially, where suddenly formed, they are apt soon to terminate. But, as I said before, I feel a disposition of heart towards you that I never felt for one whom I had never seen; and that shall prove itself, I trust, in that event, a propitious omen. It gives me the sincerest pleasure that I hope to see you at Weston; for as to any migrations of mine, they must, I fear, notwithstanding the joy I should feel in being a guest of yours, be still considered in the light of impossibilities. Come, then, my friend, and be as welcome, as the country people say here, as the flowers in May. I am happy, I say, in the expectation, but the fear or rather the consciousness, that I shall not answer on a nearer view, makes it a trembling kind of happiness, and invests it with many doubts. Bring with you any books that you think may be useful to my commentatorship, for with you for an interpreter, I shall be afraid of none of them. And in truth if you think you shall want them, you must bring books for your own use also, for they are an article with which I am heinously unprovided; being much in the condition of the man whose library Pope describes, as—

"No mighty store!
His own works neatly bound, and little more."

Mr. Hayley's projected visit, anticipated so fondly, both by himself and by Cowper, took place in May, 1792.—The interview between these talented individuals proved reciprocally delightful. Though Cowper was now in his sixty-first year, he felt none of the infirmities of advanced life, but was as active and vigorous, both in mind and body, as his best friends could wish him. Mrs. Unwin had nearly recovered from her late severe attack, and as her health was every day progressively improving, there seemed every probability of their enjoying a long continuance of domestic comfort. Mr. Hayley thus describes the manner in which he was received, and his sensations on the occasion.—"Their reception of me was kindness itself; I was enchanted to find that the manners and conversation of Cowper resembled his poetry, charming by unaffected elegance, and the graces of a benevolent spirit. I looked with affectionate veneration and pleasure on the lady, who, having devoted her life and fortune to the service of this tender and sublime genius, in watching over him with maternal vigilance, through so many years of the darkest calamity, appeared to be now enjoying a reward justly due to the noblest exertions of friendship, in contemplating the health, and the renown of the poet, whom she had the happiness to preserve. It seemed hardly possible to survey human nature in a more touching, and a more satisfactory point of view. Their tender attention to each other, their simple, devout gratitude for the mercies which they had experienced together, and their constant but unaffected propensity to impress on the mind and heart of a new friend, the deep sense which they incessantly felt, of their mutual obligations to each other; afforded me very singular gratification."

This scene of exquisite enjoyment to all parties, as is frequently the case in a world like ours, was suddenly exchanged for one of the deepest melancholy and distress. Mr. Hayley has related the painful event with so much tenderness and simplicity, that we cannot do better than present it to our readers in his own words.—"After passing our mornings in social study, we usually walked out together at noon; in returning from one of our rambles round the pleasant village of Weston, we were met by Mr. Greethead, an accomplished minister of the gospel, who resides at Newport Pagnel, and whom Cowper described to me in terms of cordial esteem. He came forth to meet us, as we drew near the house, and it was soon visible from his countenance and manner, that he had ill news to impart. After the most tender preparation that humanity could devise, he informed Cowper, that Mrs. Unwin was under the immediate pressure of a paralytic attack. My agitated friend, rushed to the sight of the sufferer; he returned to me in a state that alarmed me in the highest degree for his faculties: his first speech was wild in the extreme; my answer would appear little less so, but it was addressed to the predominant fancy of my unhappy friend, and with the blessing of heaven, it produced an instantaneous calm in his troubled mind. From that moment he rested on my friendship with such mild and cheerful confidence, that his affectionate spirit regarded me as sent providentially to support him in a season of the severest affliction."

The best means to promote the recovery of Mrs. Unwin, that could have been used under similar circumstances, were resorted to. Happily, they proved to a considerable degree successful, and she gradually recovered both her strength and the use of her faculties. The effect of this attack, however, upon Cowper's tender mind, was in the highest degree painful. This will not perhaps be surprising, when it is recollected how sincerely he was attached to his afflicted inmate, and how deeply he interested himself in everything that related to her welfare. The following beautiful lines will convey to the reader some idea of the exalted opinion he had formed of her character."

"Mary! I want a lyre with other strings,
Such aid from heaven as some have feigned they drew,
An eloquence scarce given to mortals, new
And undebased by praise of meaner things!
That ere through age or woe I shed my wings,
I may record thy worth, with honour due,
In verse as musical as thou art true—
Verse that immortalizes whom it sings!
But thou hast little need: there is a book,
By seraphs writ, with beams of heavenly light,
On which the eyes of God not rarely look!
A chronicle of actions just and bright!
There all thy deeds, my faithful Mary, shine,
And since thou own'st that praise, I spare thee mine."

The following extracts from Cowper's correspondence, immediately after this painful event, describe satisfactorily the state of his mind:—"I wish with all my heart, my dearest cousin, that I had not ill news for the subject of this letter: my friend, my Mary, has again been attacked by the same disorder that threatened me last year with the loss of her, of which you were yourself a witness. The present attack has been much the severest. Her speech has been almost unintelligible from the moment that she was struck: it is with difficulty she can open her eyes; and she cannot keep them open, the muscles necessary for that purpose being contracted; and as to self-moving powers from place to place, and the right use of her hand and arm, she has entirely lost them. I hope, however, she is beginning to recover: her amendment is indeed but very slow, as must be expected at her time of life. I am as well myself, and indeed better than you have ever known me in such trouble. It has happened well for me that, of all men living, the man best qualified to assist and comfort me, is here; though, till within these few days, I never saw him, and a few weeks since had no expectation that I ever should. You have already guessed that I mean Hayley—Hayley, who loves me as if he had known me from my cradle. When he returns to town, as he must, alas! he will pay his respects to you. He has, I assure you, been all in all to us, on this very afflictive occasion. Love him, I charge you, dearly, for my sake. Where could I have found a man, except himself, so necessary to me, in so short a time, that I absolutely know not how to live without him?"

Mr. Hayley left Weston early in June, at which time many pleasing symptoms of Mrs. Unwin's ultimate recovery began to appear. Cowper's letters to his friend after his departure, which were written almost daily, afford ample proofs of the warmth of his affection for him, and of the deep interest he took in promoting Mrs. Unwin's recovery. He thus commences his first letter to Mr. Hayley:—"ALL'S WELL! which words I place as conspicuously as possible, and prefix them to my letter, to save you the pain, my friend and brother, of a moment's anxious speculation. Poor Mary proceeds in her amendment, and improves, I think, even at a swifter rate than when you left her. The stronger she grows, the faster she gathers strength, which is perhaps the natural course of recovery. Yesterday was a noble day with her: speech, almost perfect—eyes, open almost the whole day, without any effort to keep them so,—and her step, wonderfully improved! Can I ever honour you enough for your zeal to serve me! Truly I think not. I am, however, so sensible of the love I owe to you on this account, that I every day regret the acuteness of your feelings for me, convinced that they expose you to much trouble, mortification and disappointment. I have, in short, a poor opinion of my destiny, as I told you when you were here; and though I believe, if any man living can do me good, you will, I cannot yet persuade myself that even you will be successful in attempting it. But it is no matter: you are yourself a good which I can never value enough; and, whether rich or poor in other respects, I shall always account myself better provided for than I deserve, with such a friend as you, than I can call my own. Let it please God to continue to me my William and Mary, and I shall be more reasonable than to grumble. I rose this morning, wrapt round with a cloud of melancholy, and with a heart full of fears; but if I see my Mary's amendment a little advanced, I shall be better."

"Of what materials can you suppose me made, if, after all the rapid proofs you have given me of your friendship, I do not love you with all my heart, and regret your absence continually. But you must permit me to be melancholy now and then; or, if you will not, I must be so without your permission; for that sable thread is so interwoven with the very thread of my existence as to be inseparable from it, at least while I exist in the body. Be content, therefore: let me sigh and groan, but always be sure that I love you. You will be well assured that I should not have indulged myself in this rhapsody about myself and my melancholy, had my present state of mind been of that complexion, or had not our poor Mary seemed still to advance in her recovery. It is a great blessing to us both, that, feeble as she is, she has a most invincible courage, and a trust in God's goodness that nothing shakes. She is certainly, in some degree, better than she was yesterday; but how to measure the degree I know not, except by saying—that it is just perceptible."

In a letter dated 11th June, 1792, Cowper thus discloses his state of mind to Lady Hesketh. "My dearest cousin, thou art ever in my thoughts, whether I am writing to thee or not, and my correspondence seems to grow upon me at such a rate, that I am not able to address thee so often as I would. In fact, I live only to write letters. Hayley is, as you see, added to the number of my correspondents, and to him I write almost as duly as I rise in the morning. Since I wrote last, Mrs. Unwin has been continually improving in strength, but at so gradual a rate, that I can only mark it by saying that she moves every day with less support than the former. On the whole, I believe she goes on as well as can be expected, though not quite so well as to satisfy me."

"During the last two months I seem to myself to have been in a dream. It has been a most eventful period, and fruitful to an uncommon degree, both in good and in evil. I have been very ill, and suffered excruciating pain. I recovered, and became quite well again. I received within my doors a man, but lately, an entire stranger, and who now loves me as his brother, and forgets himself to serve me. Mrs. Unwin has been seized with an illness, that for many days threatened to deprive me of her, and to cast a gloom, an impenetrable one, on all my future prospects. She is now granted to me again. A few days since I should have thought the moon might have descended into my purse as likely as any emolument, and now it seems not impossible. All this has come to pass with such rapidity as events move with in romance indeed, but not often in real life. Events of all sorts creep or fly exactly as God pleases."

While Mr. Hayley was at Weston, he had persuaded Cowper and Mrs. Unwin to promise him a visit at Eartham, some time in the summer. Believing that it would greatly improve Mrs. Unwin's health, and be an agreeable relaxation to Cowper, after the anxiety of mind he had felt respecting his esteemed invalid. Mr. Hayley wrote several pressing invitations to induce them to come as early as possible. The following extracts will show the state of Cowper's mind respecting it. To Mr. Bull he writes, "We are on the eve of a journey, and a long one. On this very day se'nnight we set out for Eartham, the seat of my brother bard, Mr. Hayley, on the other side of London, nobody knows where, a hundred and twenty miles off. Pray for us, my friend, that we may have a safe going and return. It is a tremendous exploit, and I feel a thousand anxieties when I think of it. But a promise made to him when he was here, that we would go if we could, and a sort of persuasion that we can if we will, oblige us to it. The journey and the change of air, together with the novelty to us of the scene to which we are going, may, I hope, be useful to us both; especially to Mrs. Unwin, who has most needof restoratives."

To Mr. Newton he thus discloses his feelings on the subject. "You may imagine that we, who have been resident in one spot for so many years, do not engage in such an enterprise without some anxiety. Persons accustomed to travel would make themselves merry with mine; it seems so disproportioned to the occasion. Once I have been on the point of determining not to go, and even since we fixed the day, my troubles have been almost insupportable. But it has been made a matter of much prayer, and at last it has pleased God to satisfy me, in some measure, that his will corresponds with our purpose, and that he will afford us his protection. You, I know, will not be unmindful of us during our absence from home; but will obtain for us, if your prayers can do it, all that we would ask for ourselves—the presence and favour of God, a salutary effect of our journey, and a safe return."

Anxious to enjoy the pleasure of Cowper's company at Eartham, Mr. Hayley, in his letters to the poet, urged him, by no means to defer his visit till late in the summer. From Cowper's replies we select the following interesting extracts. "The weather is sadly against my Mary's recovery; it deprives her of many a good turn in the orchard, and fifty times have I wished this very day, that Dr. Darwin's scheme of giving rudders and sails to the icelands, that spoil all our summers, were actually put into practice. So should we have gentle airs instead of churlish blasts, and those everlasting sources of bad weather, being once navigated into the southern hemisphere, my Mary would recover as fast again. We are both of your mind respecting the journey to Eartham, and think that July, if by that time she have strength for the journey, will be better than August. This, however, must be left to the Giver of all Good. If our visit to you be according to his will, he will smooth our way before us, and appoint the time of it; and I thus speak not because I wish to seem a saint in your eyes, but because my poor Mary actually is one, and would not set her foot over the threshold, unless she had, or thought she had, God's free permission. With that she would go through floods and fire, though without it she would be afraid of everything—afraid even to visit you, dearly as she loves, and much as she longs to see you."

In another letter to Mr. Hayley, he writes, "The progress of the old nurse in Terence is very much like the progress of my poor patient in the road to recovery. I cannot indeed say that she moves but advances not, for advances are certainly made, but the progress of a week is hardly perceptible. I know not, therefore, at present, what to say about this long postponed journey; the utmost that it is safe for me to say at this moment is this,—you know that you are dear to us both; true it is that you are so, and equally true, that the very instant we feel ourselves at liberty, we will fly to Eartham. You wish me to settle the time, and I wish with all my heart so to do; living in hopes, meanwhile, that I shall be able to do it soon. But some little time must necessarily intervene. Our Mary must be able to walk alone, to cut her own food, and to feed herself, and to wear her own shoes, for at present she wears mine. All these things considered, my friend and brother, you will see the expediency of waiting a little before we set off to Eartham. We mean, indeed, before that day arrives, to make a trial of her strength; how far she may be able to bear the motion of a carriage, a motion that she has not felt these seven years. I grieve that we are thus circumstanced, and that we cannot gratify ourselves in a delightful and innocent project, without all these precautions; but when we have leaf-gold to handle, we must do it tenderly."

The day was at length fixed for this long-intended journey; and the following letter to Mr. Hayley, written a day or two previously, describes Cowper's feelings respecting it:—

"Through floods and flames to your retreat
I win my desp'rate way,
And when we meet, if e'er we meet,
Will echo your huzza!"

"You will wonder at the word desperate in the second line, and at the if in the third; but could you have any conception of the fears I have had to bustle with, of the dejection of spirits I have suffered concerning this journey, you would wonder much that I still courageously persevere in my resolution to undertake it. Fortunately for my intention, it happens that as the day approaches my terrors abate; for had they continued to be, what they were a week ago, I must, after all, have disappointed you; and was actually once, on the very verge of doing it. I have told you something of my nocturnal experiences, and assure you now, that they were hardly ever more terrific than on this occasion. Prayer has, however, opened my passage at last, and obtained for me a degree of confidence, that I trust will prove a comfortable viaticum to me all the way. The terrors that I have spoken of, would appear ridiculous to most, but to you they will not, for you are a reasonable creature, and know well that to whatever cause it be owing, (whether to constitution or to God's express appointment) I am hunted by spiritual hounds in the night season. I cannot help it. You will pity me, and wish it were otherwise; and though you may think there is much of the imaginary in it, will not deem it, for that reason, an evil less to be lamented. So much for fears and distresses. Soon I hope they will all have a joyful termination, and I and my Mary be skipping with delight at Eartham."

The protracted indisposition of Mrs. Unwin, and the preparation which Cowper thought it necessary to make for his journey, had entirely diverted his mind from his literary undertaking. To Mr. Hayley, on this point, he thus writes:—"I know not how you proceed in your Life of Milton, but I suppose not very rapidly, for while you were here, and since you left us, you have had no other theme but me. As for myself, except my letters, and the nuptial song I sent you in my last, I have literally done nothing, since I saw you. Nothing, I mean, in the writing way, though a great deal in another; that is to say, in attending my poor Mary, and endeavouring to nurse her up for a journey to Eartham. In this I have hitherto succeeded tolerably well, and I had rather carry this point completely than be the most famous editor of Milton the world has ever seen, or shall see. As to this affair, I know not what will become of it. I wrote to Johnson a week since to tell him, that the interruption of Mrs. Unwin's illness still continued, and being likely to continue, I knew not when I should be able to proceed. The translations I said were finished, except the revisal of a part. I hope, or rather wish, that at Eartham I may recover that habit of study, which, inveterate as it once seemed, I now seem to have lost—lost to such a degree, that it is even painful for me to think of what it will cost me to acquire it again."

About this time, at the request of a much esteemed relative, Cowper sat to Abbot, the painter, for his portrait; and the following playful manner in which he adverts to the circumstance, exhibits the peculiarity of his case, and shows, that though he was almost invariably suffering under the influence of deep depression, he frequently wrote to his correspondents, in a strain the most sprightly and cheerful:—"How do you imagine I have been occupied these last ten days? In sitting, not on cockatrice eggs, nor yet to gratify a mere idle humour, nor because I was too sick to move, but because my cousin Johnson has an aunt who has a longing desire of my picture, and because he would, therefore, bring a painter from London to draw it. For this purpose I have been sitting, as I say, these ten days; and am heartily glad that my sitting time is over. The likeness is so strong, that when my friends enter the room where the picture is, they start, astonished to see me where they know I am not."

"Abbot is painting me so true,
That (trust me) you would stare,
And hardly know, at the first view,
If I were here, or there."

Miserable man that you are, to be at Brighton, instead of being here, to contemplate this prodigy of art, which, therefore, you can never see, for it goes to London next Monday to be suspended awhile at Abbot's, and then proceeds to Norfolk, where it will be suspended for ever."

Cowper and Mrs. Unwin set out for Eartham in the beginning of August, 1792. It pleased God to conduct them thither in safety; and though considerably fatigued with their journey, they were much less so than they had anticipated. Cowper's letters to his friends after his arrival, describe his feelings on the occasion, in a manner the most pleasing:—"Here we are, at Eartham, in the most elegant mansion that I have ever inhabited, and surrounded by the most beautiful pleasure-grounds that I have ever seen; but which, dissipated as my powers of thought are at present, I will not undertake to describe. It shall suffice me to say that they occupy three sides of a hill, which in Buckinghamshire might well pass for a mountain, and from the summit of which is beheld a most magnificent landscape, bounded by the sea, and in one part by the Isle of Wight, which may also be seen plainly from the window of the library, in which I am writing. It pleased God to carry us both through the journey with far less difficulty and inconvenience than I expected; I began it indeed with a thousand fears, and when we arrived the first evening at Barnet, found myself oppressed in spirit to a degree that could hardly be exceeded. I saw Mrs. Unwin weary, as well she might be, and heard such noises, both within the house and without, that I concluded she would get no rest. But I was mercifully disappointed. She rested, though not well, yet sufficiently. Here we found our friend Rose, who had walked from his house in Chancery-lane, to meet us, and to greet us with his best wishes. At Kingston, where we dined, the second day, I found my old and much valued friend, General Cowper, whom I had not seen for thirty years, and but for this journey should never have seen again: when we arrived at Ripley, where we slept the second night, we were both in a better condition of body and of mind, than on the day preceding. Here we found a quiet inn, that housed, as it happened, that night, no company but ourselves; we slept well and rose perfectly refreshed, and except some terrors that I felt at passing over the Sussex Hills at moonlight, met with little to complain of, till we arrived about ten o'clock, at Eartham. Here we are as happy as it is in the power of earthly good to make us. It is almost a paradise in which we dwell; and our reception has been the kindest that it was possible for friendship and hospitality to contrive."

While at Eartham, Cowper and Mr. Hayley employed the morning hours that they could bestow upon books, in revising and correcting Cowper's translation of Milton's Latin and Italian poems. In the afternoon they occasionally amused themselves by forming together a rapid metrical version of Andreini's Adamo. Cowper's tender solicitude for Mrs. Unwin, however, rendered it impossible for them to be very attentive to these studies. Adverting to the anxiety of Cowper respecting Mrs. Unwin, Mr. Hayley thus writes:—"I have myself no language sufficiently strong or sufficiently tender, to express my just admiration of that angelic, compassionate sensibility with which Cowper watched over his aged invalid. With the most singular and most exemplary tenderness of attention, he incessantly laboured to counteract every infirmity, bodily and mental, with which sickness and age had conspired to load the interesting guardian of his afflicted life."

Cowper had been at Eartham but a few days, when he received a letter from his friend, Mr. Hurdis, informing him of the loss he had sustained by the death of a beloved sister. His compassionate heart immediately prompted him to write the following reply:—"Your kind, but very affecting letter, found me not at Weston, to which place it was directed, but in a bower of my friend Hayley's garden, at Eartham, where I was sitting with Mrs. Unwin. We both knew, the moment we saw it, from whom it came; and observing a red seal, both comforted ourselves that all was well at Burwash; but we soon felt that we were called not to rejoice, but to mourn with you; we do, indeed, sincerely mourn with you; and, if it will afford you any consolation to know it, you may be assured that every eye here has testified what our hearts have suffered for you. Your loss is great, and your disposition, I perceive, such as exposes you to feel the whole weight of it. I will not add to your sorrow by a vain attempt to assuage it; your own good sense, and the piety of your principles, will, of course, suggest to you the most powerful motives of acquiescence in the will of God. You will be sure to recollect, that the stroke, severe as it is, is not the stroke of an enemy, but of a Friend and a Father; and will find, I trust, hereafter, that, like a Father, he has done you good by it. Thousands have been able to say, and myself as loud as any of them, it has been good for me that I have been afflicted; but time is necessary to work us to this persuasion; and in due time it will, no doubt, be yours."

The following extracts from letters to Lady Hesketh, dated Eartham, describe his feelings while he remained there:—"I know not how it is, my dearest cousin, but in a new scene like this, surrounded by strange objects, I find my powers of thinking dissipated to a degree, that makes it difficult for me even to write a letter, and even a letter to you; but such a letter as I can, I will, and I have the fairest chance to succeed this morning; Hayley, Romney, and Hayley's son, being all gone to the sea for bathing. The sea, you must know, is nine miles off, so that, unless stupidity prevent, I shall have opportunity to write, not only to you, but to poor Hurdis also, who is broken-hearted for the loss of his favourite sister, lately dead. I am, without the least dissimulation, in good health; my spirits are about as good as you have ever seen them; and if increase of appetite, and a double portion of sleep, be advantageous, such are the benefits I have received from this migration. As to that gloominess of mind which I have felt these twenty years, it cleaves to me even here; and could I be translated to paradise, unless I left my body behind me, would cleave to me even there also. It is my companion for life, and nothing will ever divorce us. Mrs. Unwin is evidently the better for her jaunt, though by no means as she was before her last attack, still wanting help when she would rise from her seat, and a support in walking, but she is able to take more exercise than when at home, and move with rather a less tottering step. God knows what he designs for me; but when I see those who are dearer to me than myself, distempered and enfeebled, and myself as strong as in the days of my youth, I tremble for the solitude in which a few years may place me."

"This is, as I have already told you, a delightful place; more beautiful scenery I have never beheld, nor expect to behold; but the charms of it, uncommon as they are, have not, in the least, alienated my affections from Weston. The genius of that place suits me better; it has an air of snug concealment, in which a disposition like mine feels peculiarly gratified; whereas here, I see from every window woods like forests, and hills like mountains, a wilderness in short, that rather increases my natural melancholy, and which, were it not for the agreeables I find within, would convince me that mere change of place can avail but little."

On the 17th September, 1792, Cowper, and Mrs. Unwin, left Eartham, for their beloved retreat at Weston. Their parting interview with their friends at Eartham, who had heaped upon them everything that the most affectionate kindness could invent, was deeply interesting to all parties, but particularly affecting to the sensitive mind of Cowper. According to a previous arrangement, the poet and Mrs. Unwin dined, and spent the day with General Cowper, at Kingston, who had come there on purpose to have the pleasure of Cowper's company, probably for the last time. A recollection of this so powerfully affected the poet's mind, that the pleasure of the interview was hardly greater than the pain he felt at parting with his venerable and beloved kinsman. The peculiar and burdened state of Cowper's mind respecting this visit, he thus describes:—"The struggles that I had with my own spirit, labouring, as I did, under the most dreadful dejection, are never to be told. I would have given the world to have been excused. I went, however, and carried my point against myself, with a heart riven asunder. I have reason for all this anxiety, which I cannot relate now; the visit, however, passed off well, and I returned with a lighter heart than I have known since my departure from Eartham, and we both enjoyed a good night's rest afterwards."

The good providence of God conducted these interesting travellers in safety to their home, where they arrived in the evening of the second day after they set out from Eartham. The unusual excitement occasioned by so long a journey, and by such a profusion of interesting objects, would, in ordinary cases, and in minds of almost any form, who had been so long confined to one spot, be very likely to be succeeded by considerable depression. Such was, however, much more likely to be the case on a mind like Cowper's. Accordingly we find, that when he arrived at Weston, he was, for a considerable time, subject to an unusual degree of depression. The following extracts from his letters to his friend Hayley, describe the state of his mind, and show how much he was then under the influence of his depressive malady:—"Chaos, himself, even the chaos of Milton, is not surrounded with more confusion, nor has a mind more completely in a hubbub, than I experience at the present moment. A bad night, succeeded by an east wind, and a sky all in sables, have such an effect on my spirits, that if I did not consult my own comfort more than yours, I should not write to-day, for I shall not entertain you much: yet your letter, though containing no very pleasant tidings, has afforded me some relief. It tells me, indeed, that you have been dispirited yourself; all this grieves me, but then there is warmth of heart, and a kindness in it, that do me good. I will endeavour not to repay you in notes of sorrow and despondence, though all my sprightly chords seem broken. In truth, one day excepted, I have not seen the day when I have been cheerful since I left you. My spirits, I think, are almost constantly lower than they were; the approach of winter is perhaps the cause, and if it be, I have nothing better to expect for a long time to come. I began a long letter to you yesterday, and proceeded through two sides of the sheet, but so much of my nervous fever found its way into it, that, looking over it this morning, I determined not to send it. Your wishes to disperse my melancholy would, I am sure, prevail, did that event depend on the warmth and sincerity with which you frame them; but it has baffled both wishes and prayers, and those the most fervent that could be made, so many years, that the case seems hopeless."

These frequent, and, indeed, almost continual attacks of depression, combined with the attention that Cowper paid to promote the comfort, and facilitate the recovery of Mrs. Unwin, prevented him entirely from persevering in his literary undertaking. In his letters he makes this a subject of particular regret. The benefits he had derived from his regular habits of study during his translation of Homer, made him anxious to be again regularly employed. To his friend Mr. Rose he thus describes the state of his mind in this respect:—"I wish that I were as industrious, and as much occupied as you, though in a different way, but it is not so with me. Mrs. Unwin's great debility is of itself a hinderance, such as would effectually disable me. Till she can work and read, and fill up her time as usual, (all which is at present entirely out of her power) I may now and then find time to write a letter, but I shall write nothing more. I cannot sit, with my pen in my hand, and my books before me, while she is in effect, in solitude, silent, and looking at the fire. To this hinderance that other has been added, of which you are aware, a want of spirits, such as I have never known when I was not absolutely laid by, since I commenced an author. How long I shall be continued in these uncomfortable circumstances is known only to Him, who, as he will, disposes of us all."

"I may yet be able, perhaps, to prepare the first book of Paradise Lost for the press, before it will be wanted, and Johnson himself seems to think there will be no haste for the second. But poetry is my favourite employment, and my poetical operations are in the meantime suspended; for while a work, to which I have bound myself, remains unaccomplished, I can do nothing else. Johnson's plan of prefixing my phiz to the edition of my poems is by no means a pleasant one to me, and so I told him in a letter I sent him from Eartham, in which I assured him that my objections to it would not be easily surmounted. But, if you judge that it may really have an effect in advancing the sale, I would not be so squeamish as to suffer the spirit of prudery to prevail on me to his disadvantage. Somebody told an author, I forget whom, that there was more vanity in refusing his picture than in granting it, on which he instantly complied. I do not perfectly feel all the force of the argument, but it shall content me that he did."

To his kinsman he writes:—"The successor of the clerk defunct, for whom I used to write, arrived here this morning, with a recommendatory letter from Joe Rye, and an humble petition of his own, entreating me to assist him, as I had assisted his predecessor. I have undertaken the service, although with no little reluctance, being involved in many arrears on other subjects, and very little dependance at present on my ability to write at all. I proceed exactly as when you were here—a letter now and then before breakfast, and the rest of my time all holiday, if holiday it may be called, that is spent chiefly in moping and musing, and 'forecasting the fashion of uncertain evils.' The fever on my spirits has harassed me much, and I have never had so good a night, nor so quiet a rising, since you went, as on this very morning. A relief that I account particularly seasonable and propitious, because I had, in my intentions, devoted this morning to you, and could not have fulfilled those intentions, had I been as spiritless as I generally am. I am glad that Johnson is in no haste for Milton, for I seem myself not likely to address myself presently to that concern with any prospect of success, yet something, now and then, like a secret whisper, assures and encourages me that it will yet be done."

To his friend Hayley he thus writes:—"Yesterday was a day of assignation with myself, a day of which I had said, some days before it came, when that day comes, I will, if possible, begin my dissertations. Accordingly, when it came, I prepared to do so; filled a letter case with fresh paper, furnished myself with a pretty good pen, and replenished my ink bottle; but partly from one cause, and partly from another, chiefly, however, from distress and dejection, after writing and obliterating about six lines, in the composition of which I spent near an hour, I was obliged to relinquish the attempt. An attempt so unsuccessful could have no other effect than to dishearten me, and it has had that effect to such a degree, that I know not when I shall find courage to make another. At present I shall certainly abstain from it, since I cannot well afford to expose myself to the danger of a fresh mortification."

Adverting to this subject, he thus again writes to Mr. Hayley, 25 Nov. 1792.—"How shall I thank you enough for the interest you take in my future Miltonic labours, and the assistance you promise me in the performance of them? I will some time or other, if I live, and live a poet, acknowledge your friendship in some of my best verses, the most suitable return one poet can make to another; in the mean time, I love you, and am sensible of all your kindness. You wish me warm in my work, and I ardently wish the same, but when I shall be so, God only knows. My melancholy, which seemed a little alleviated for a few days, has gathered about me again, with as black a cloud as ever; the consequence is, absolute incapacity to begin. Yet I purpose, in a day or two, to make another attempt, to which, however, I shall address myself with fear and trembling, like a man, who having sprained his wrist, dreads to use it. I have not, indeed, like such a man, injured myself by any extraordinary exertion, but seem as much enfeebled as if I had. The consciousness that there is so much to do, and nothing done, is a burden I am not able to bear. Milton especially is my grievance, and I might almost as well be haunted by his ghost, as goaded with continual reproaches for neglecting him. I will, therefore, begin; I will do my best, and if, after all, that best prove good for nothing, I will even send the notes, worthless as they are, that I have already; a measure very disagreeable to myself, and to which nothing but necessity shall compel me."

To his friend, Mr. Newton, who had ventured to express his apprehensions lest his Miltonic labours should become too severe, he thus writes, 9 Dec. 1792.—"You need not be uneasy on the subject of Milton; I shall not find that labour too heavy for me, if I have health and leisure. The season of the year is unfavourable to me respecting the former, and Mrs. Unwin's present weakness allows me less of the latter than the occasion seems to call for. But the business is in no haste; the artists employed to furnish the embellishments are not likely to be very expeditious; and a small portion only of the work will be wanted from me at once, for the intention is, to deal it out to the public piece-meal. I am, therefore, under no great anxiety on that account. It is not, indeed, an employment that I should have chosen for myself, because poetry pleases and amuses me more, and would cost me less labour, properly so called. All this I felt before I engaged with Johnson, and did, in the first instance, actually decline the service, but he was urgent, and at last I suffered myself to be persuaded. The season of the year, as I have already said, is particularly adverse to me; yet not in itself, perhaps, more adverse than any other; but the approach of it always reminds me of the same season in the dreadful seventy-three, and the more dreadful eighty-six. I cannot help terrifying myself with doleful misgivings and apprehensions; nor is the enemy negligent to seize all the advantage that the occasion gives him. Thus, hearing much from him, and having little or no sensible support from God, I suffer inexpressible things till January is over. And even then, whether increasing years have made me more liable to it, or despair, the longer it lasts, grows naturally darker, I find myself more inclined to melancholy than I was a few years since. God only knows where this will end; but where it is likely to end, unless he interpose powerfully in my favour, all may know."

On another occasion, to the same correspondent, he again writes:—"Oh for the day when your expectations of my final deliverance shall be verified! At present it seems very remote, so distant, indeed, that hardly the faintest streak of it is visible in my horizon. The glimpse with which I was favoured about a month ago, has never been repeated, but the depression of my spirits has. The future appears as gloomy as ever, and I seem to myself to be scrambling always in the dark, among rocks and precipices, without a guide, but with an enemy ever at my heels, prepared to push me headlong. Thus I have spent twenty years, but thus I shall not spend twenty years more: long before that period arrives, the grand question concerning my everlasting weal or woe will be decided."

To a lady, with whom he occasionally corresponded, he thus discloses his feelings:—"I would give you consolation, madam, were I not disqualified for that delightful service by a great dearth of it in my own experience. I too often seek, but cannot find it. I know, however, there are seasons when, look which way we will, we see the same dismal gloom enveloping all objects. This is itself an affliction; and the worse, because it makes us think ourselves more unhappy than we are. I was struck by an expression in your letter to Hayley, where you say that you 'will endeavour to take an interest in green leaves again.' This seems the sound of my own voice reflected to me from a distance; I have so often had the same thought and desire. A day scarcely passes, at this season of the year, when I do not contemplate the trees so soon to be stript, and say, 'perhaps I shall never see you clothed again.' Every year, as it passes, makes this expectation more reasonable: and the year with me cannot be very distant, when the event will verify it. Well, may God grant us a good hope of arriving, in due time, where the leaves never fall, and all will be right!"

Notwithstanding his gloomy forebodings, Cowper escaped any very severe attack of depression, in his dreaded month of the ensuing January, and as the spring advanced he became as busily engaged as he had ever been, partly in his Miltonic labours, but chiefly in preparing materials for a second edition of Homer. He had long been carefully revising the work, and had judiciously availed himself of the remarks of his friends, as well as of the criticisms of the reviewers. As soon, therefore, as it was determined to republish it, he made the best use of these materials, and in a few weeks prepared the work a second time for the press, in its new and much improved form. It was, however, thought advisable, in the second edition, to publish notes, for the assistance of unlearned readers; and the labour and research required to furnish these, occasioned Cowper much severe application, as the following extracts will show:—19 March, 1793. "I am so busy every morning before breakfast, strutting and stalking in Homeric stilts, that you must account it an instance of marvellous grace and favour that I write even to you. Sometimes I am seriously almost crazed with the multiplicity of matters before me, and the little or no time that I have for them; and sometimes I repose myself after the fatigue of that distraction, on the pillow of despair; a pillow which has often served me in time of need, and is become, by frequent use, if not very comfortable, at least, convenient. So reposed, I laugh at the world and say,—Yes, you may gape, and expect both Homer and Milton from me, but I 'll be hanged if ever you get them. In Homer, however, you must know, I am advanced as far as the fifteenth book of the Iliad, leaving nothing behind that can reasonably offend the most fastidious; and I design him for a new dress as soon as possible, for a reason which any poet may guess if he will but thrust his hand into his pocket. My time, therefore, the little that I have, is now so entirely engrossed by Homer, that I have, at this time, a bundle of unanswered letters by me, and letters likely to be so. Thou knowest, I dare say, what it is to have a head weary with thinking; mine is so fatigued by breakfast time, three days out of four, that I am utterly incapable of sitting down to my desk again for any purpose whatever. I rise at six every morning, and fag till near eleven, when I breakfast; the consequence is, that I am so exhausted as not to be able to write when the opportunity offers. You will say, breakfast before you work, and then your work will not fatigue you. I answer, perhaps I might, and your counsel would probably prove beneficial; but I cannot spare a moment for eating in the early part of the morning, having no other time for study; all this time is constantly given to Homer, not to correcting and amending him, for that is all over, but in writing notes. Johnson has expressed a wish for some, that the unlearned may be a little illuminated concerning classical story, and the mythology of the ancients; and his behaviour to me has been so liberal, that I can refuse him nothing. Poking into the old Greek commentators, however, blinds me. But it is no matter, I am the more like Homer. I avail myself of Clarke's excellent annotations, from which I select such as I think likely to be useful, or that recommend themselves by the amusement they afford, of which sorts there are not a few.—Barnes also affords me some of both kinds, but not so many, his notes being chiefly paraphrastical or grammatical. My only fear is, lest between them both, I should make my work too voluminous."

In a letter to Mr. Newton, written 12th June, 1793, Cowper thus expresses himself respecting the state of his own mind, and that of Mrs. Unwin. "You promise to be contented with a short line, and a short one you must have, hurried over in the little interval I have happened to find, between the conclusion of my morning task and breakfast. Study has this good effect, at least: it makes me an early riser, a wholesome practice from which I have never swerved since March. The scanty opportunity I have, I shall employ in telling you what you principally wish to be told, the present state of mine and Mrs. Unwin's health. In her I cannot perceive any alteration for the better; and must be satisfied, I believe, as indeed I have great reason to be, if she does not alter for the worse. She uses the orchard-walk daily, but always supported between two, and is still unable to employ herself as formerly. But she is cheerful, seldom in much pain, and has always strong confidence in the mercy and faithfulness of God. As to myself, I have invariably the same song to sing—well in body, but sick in spirit; sick, nigh unto death."

> 'Seasons return, but not to me returns
> God, or the sweet approach of heavenly day,
> Or sight of cheering truth, or pardon seal'd,
> Or joy, or hope, or Jesus' face divine,
> But clouds or ——.'

I could easily set my complaint to Milton's tone, and accompany him through the whole passage on the subject of a blindness more deplorable than his; but time fails me.

During this year, several of Cowper's correspondents were visited either with domestic affliction, or with painful bereavements. On such occasions, all the sensibility and sympathy of his peculiarly tender mind never failed to be called into lively exercise. The deep depression of his own mind, did not deter him from attempting at least, to alleviate the distress of others. To Mr. Hayley, who had recently lost a friend, he thus writes:—"I truly sympathize with you under your weight of sorrow, for the loss of our good Samaritan. But be not broken-hearted my friend; remember, the loss of those we love is the condition on which we live ourselves; and that he who chooses his friends wisely, from among the excellent of the earth, has a sure ground to hope concerning them when they die, that a merciful God will make them far happier than they could be here, and that we shall join them soon again: this is solid comfort, could we but avail ourselves of it, but I confess the difficulty of doing so always. Sorrow is like the deaf adder, that hears not the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely; and I feel so myself for the death of Austen, that my own chief consolation is, that I had never seen him. Live yourself, I beseech you, for I have seen so much of you, that I can by no means spare you, and I will live as long as it shall please God to permit. I know you set some value upon me, therefore let that promise comfort you, and give us not reason to say, like David's servant, 'We know that it would have pleased thee more if all we had died, than this one, for whom thou art inconsolable.' You have still Romney, and Carwardine, and Grey, and me, and my poor Mary, and I know not how many beside; as many I suppose as ever had an opportunity of spending a day with you. He who has the most friends, must necessarily lose the most; and he whose friends are numerous as yours, may the better spare a part of them. It is a changing transient scene: yet a little while, and this poor dream of life will be over with all of us. The living, and they who live unhappy, they are indeed the subjects of sorrow."

To his esteemed friend, Rev. Mr. Hurdis, who, as above related, had lost one beloved sister, and was in great danger of losing another, he thus writes, June, 1793: "I seize a passing moment, merely to say that I feel for your distresses, and sincerely pity you, and I shall be happy to learn from your next that your sister's amendment has superseded the necessity you feared of a journey to London. Your candid account that your afflictions have broken your spirits and temper, I can perfectly understand, having laboured much in that fire myself, and perhaps more than any man. It is in such a school that we must learn, if we ever truly learn it, the natural depravity of the human heart, and of our own in particular, together with the consequence that necessarily follows such wretched premises; our indispensable need of the atonement, and our inexpressible obligations to Him who made it. This reflection cannot escape a thinking mind, looking back on those ebullitions of fretfulness and impatience to which it has yielded in a season of great affliction."

Early in the spring of this year, 1793, Cowper's esteemed relative, Rev. John Johnson, after much mature and solemn deliberation, had resolved to take holy orders. Cowper had always regarded him with the most paternal affection, and had wished that he should enter upon the important office of a christian minister, with a high sense of the greatness of the work, and with suitable qualifications for a proper discharge of its solemn duties. In accordance with these wishes, when Mr. Johnson, in a previous year, had relinquished his intentions of taking orders at that time, Cowper had thus addressed him. "My dearest of all Johnnys, I am not sorry that your ordination is postponed. A year's learning and wisdom, added to your present stock, will not be more than enough to satisfy the demands of your function. Neither am I sorry that you find it difficult to fix your thoughts to the serious point at all times. It proves, at least, that you attempt, and wish to do it, and these are good symptoms. Woe to those who enter on the ministry of the gospel without having previously asked, at least from God, a mind and spirit suited to their occupation, and whose experience never differs from itself, because they are always alike vain, light, and inconsiderate. It is therefore matter of great joy to me to hear you complain of levity, as it indicates the existence of anxiety of mind to be freed from it."

The gratification it afforded Cowper to find that his beloved relative entered into the ministry with scriptural views and feelings, is thus expressed: "What you say of your determined purpose, with God's help, to take up the cross, and despise the shame, gives us both great pleasure: in our pedigree is found one, at least, who did it before you. Do you the like, and you will meet him in heaven, as sure as the scripture is the word of God. The quarrel that the world has with evangelic men and doctrines, they would have with a host of angels in human form, for it is the quarrel of owls with sunshine; of ignorance with divine illumination. The Bishop of Norwich has won my heart by his kind and liberal behaviour to you, and if I knew him I would tell him so. I am glad that your auditors find your voice strong, and your utterance distinct; glad, too, that your doctrine has hitherto made you no enemies. You have a gracious Master, who, it seems, will not suffer you to see war in the beginning. It will be a wonder, however, if you do not find out, sooner or later, that sore place in every heart, which can ill endure the touch of apostolic doctrine. Somebody will smart in his conscience, and you will hear of it. I say not this to terrify you, but to prepare you for what is likely to happen, and which, troublesome as it may prove, is yet devoutly to be wished; for, in general, there is little good done by preachers till the world begins to abuse them. But understand me right. I do not mean that you should give them unnecessary provocation, by scolding and railing at them, as some, more zealous than wise, are apt to do. That were to deserve their anger. No; there is no need of it. The self-abasing doctrines of the gospel will, of themselves, create you enemies; but remember this for your comfort—they will also, in due time, transform them into friends, and make them love you as if they were your own children. God give you many such; as, if you are faithful to his cause I trust he will."

About this time Mr. Hayley appears to have applied to Cowper for his assistance, in a joint literary undertaking of some magnitude, with himself and two other distinguished literary characters. Anxious, however, as Cowper was on all occasions to oblige his friend, he could not give his consent to this measure. His reply, given partly in poetry and partly in prose, while it shows the peculiar state of his mind, exhibits, at the same time, so much of that amiable modesty by which he was always distinguished, that it cannot be read without interest.

> "Dear architect of fine chateaux in air,
> Worthier to stand for ever if they could,
> Than any built of stone, or yet of wood,
> For back of royal elephant to bear!
> Oh, for permission from the skies to share,
> Much to my own, though little to thy good,
> With thee (not subject to the jealous mood!)
> A partnership of literary ware!
> But I am bankrupt now, and doomed henceforth
> To drudge in descant dry, or other's lays—
> Bards, I acknowledge, of unequalled'd worth!
> But what is commentator's happiest praise?
> That he has furnished lights for other eyes,
> Which they who need them use, and then despise."

"What remains for me to say on this subject, my dear brother, I will say in prose. There are other impediments to the plan you propose, which I could not comprise within the bounds of a sonnet. My poor Mary's infirm condition makes it impossible for me, at present, to engage in a work such as you propose. My thoughts are not sufficiently free; nor have I, nor can I, by any means find opportunity; added to it comes a difficulty which, though you are not at all aware of it, presents itself to me under a most forbidding appearance. Can you guess it? No, not you: neither, perhaps, will you be able to imagine that such a difficulty can possibly exist. If your hair begins to bristle, stroke it down again; for there is no need why it should erect itself. It concerns me, not you. I know myself too well not to know that I am nobody in verse, unless in a corner and alone, and unconnected in my operations. This is not owing to want of love to you, my brother, or in the most consummate confidence in you—I have both in a degree that has not been exceeded in the experience of any friend you have or ever had. But I am so made up—I will not enter into a philosophical analysis of my strange constitution, in order to detect the true cause of the evil; but, on a general view of the matter, I suspect that it proceeds from that shyness which has been my effectual and almost total hinderance on many other important occasions, and which I should feel, I well know, on this, to a degree that would perfectly cripple me. No! I shall neither do, nor attempt, anything of consequence more, unless my poor Mary get better: nor even then, unless it should please God to give me another nature. I could not thus act in concert with any man, not even with my own father or brother, were they now alive! Small game must serve me at present, and till I have done with Homer and Milton. The utmost that I aspire to, and Heaven knows with how feeble a hope, is to write, at some future and better opportunity, when my hands are free, The Four Ages. Thus I have opened my heart unto thee." On another occasion he thus plaintively writes:—"I find that much study fatigues me, which is a proof that I am somewhat stricken in years. Certain it is that, ten or sixteen years ago, I could have done as much, and did actually do much more, without suffering the least fatigue, than I can possibly accomplish now. How insensibly old age steals on us, and how often it is actually arrived before we suspect it! Accident alone; some occurrence that suggests a comparison of our former with our present selves, affords the discovery. Well, it is always good to be undeceived, especially in an article of such importance."

To a person less intimately acquainted with Cowper than Mr. Hayley was, the above reply would have been amply sufficient to have prevented him from making any further application of a similar nature. He, however, was not to be thus easily diverted from his purpose. Of the talents of Cowper he had justly formed the highest opinion, and had wisely concluded, that if they could only be again brought fairly and fully into exercise, in the composition of original poetry, the result would be everything that could be wished. Immediately, therefore, on receiving the above letter, he proffered Cowper his own assistance, and the assistance of two other esteemed friends, in composing the projected poem, "The Four Ages," and proposed that it should be their joint production. His principal object was, unquestionably, to induce Cowper to employ his unrivalled talents. The pleasure he anticipated in having such a coadjutor, gratifying as it must have been to his feelings, was only a secondary consideration. Averse as Cowper was to the former proposal, he immediately consented to this, and the following extract will show what were his feelings on the occasion:—"I am in haste to tell you how much I am delighted with your projected quadruple alliance, and to assure you that, if it please God to afford me health, spirits, ability and leisure, I will not fail to devote them all to the production of my quota in "The Four Ages." You are very kind to humour me as you do, and had need be a little touched yourself with all my oddities, that you may know how to administer to mine. All whom I love do so, and I believe it to be impossible to love heartily those who do not. People must not do me good in their way, but in my own, and then they do me good indeed. My pride, my ambition, and my friendship for you, and the interest I take in my own dear self, will all be consulted and gratified, by an arm-in-arm appearance with you in public; and I shall work with more zeal and assiduity at Homer; and when Homer is finished, at Milton, with the prospect of such a coalition before me. I am at this moment, with all the imprudence natural to poets, expending nobody knows what, in embellishing my premises, or rather the premises of my neighbour Courtenay, which is more poetical still. Your project, therefore, is most opportune, as any project must needs be, that has so direct a tendency to put money into the pocket of one so likely to want it."

"Ah, brother poet! send me of your shade,
And bid the zephyr's hasten to my aid;
Or, like a worm unearthed at noon, I go,
Despatched by sunshine to the shades below."

It is deeply to be regretted that the pleasing anticipations of both Mr. Hayley and Cowper, respecting this joint production, were never realized. Had this poem been written, it would, in all probability, have been equal to any that had ever been published. Cowper was, however, at this time, rapidly sinking into that deep and settled melancholy which it now becomes our painful duty to relate, and in which he continued during the remaining period of his life, notwithstanding the united and indefatigable exertions of his friends to afford him relief.

CHAPTER XVII.

Mr. Hayley's second visit to Weston—Finds Cowper busily engaged—Great apprehensions respecting him—Mrs. Unwin's increasing infirmities—Cowper's feelings on account of it—Vigour of his own mind at this period—Severe attack of depression—Deplorable condition to which he was now reduced—Management of his affairs kindly undertaken by Lady Hesketh—Mr. Hayley's anxieties respecting him—Is invited by Mr. Greathead to pay Cowper another visit—Complies with the invitation—Arrival at Weston—How he is received by Cowper—Inefficiency of the means employed to remove his depressson—Handsome pension allowed him by his Majesty—His removal from Weston to Norfolk, under the care of the Rev. J. Johnson—Death of Mrs. Unwin—How it affected Cowper—Recovers sufficiently to resume his application to Homer—Finishes his notes—Letter to Lady Hesketh descriptive of his feelings—Composes some original poems—Translates some of Gay's fables into Latin—Rapid decay of his strength—Last illness—Death.

In the beginning of November, 1793, Mr. Hayley made his second visit to Weston. He found Cowper in the enjoyment of apparent health; and though incessantly employed, either on Homer or Milton, pleasing himself with the society of his young kinsman, from Norfolk, and his esteemed friend Mr. Rose, who had arrived from the seat of Lord Spencer, in Northamptonshire, with an invitation from his lordship to Cowper and his guests, to pay him a visit. All Cowper's friends strongly recommended him to avail himself of this mark of respect from an accomplished nobleman whom he cordially respected. Their entreaties, however, were entirely in vain; his constitutional shyness again prevailed, and he commissioned his friends, Rose and Hayley, to make an apology to his Lordship for declining so honourable an invitation.

The manner in which Cowper employed his time during the continuance of his friend Mr. Hayley at Weston, is pleasingly described in the following extract from a letter to Mrs. Courtenay, 4th Nov. 1793:—"I am a most busy man, busy to a degree that sometimes half distracts me; but if complete distraction be occasioned by having the thoughts too much and too long attached to any single point, I am in no danger of it, with such perpetual whirl are mine whisked about from one subject to another. When two poets meet, there are fine doings, I can assure you. My 'Homer' finds work for Hayley, and his 'Life of Milton' work for me; so that we are neither of us one moment idle. Poor Mrs. Unwin in the mean time sits quiet in her corner, occasionally laughing at us both, and not seldom interrupting us with some question or remark, for which she is continually rewarded by me with a 'hush!' Bless yourself, my dear Catherina, that you are not connected with a poet, especially that you have not two to deal with!"

During Mr. Hayley's visit, he saw, with great concern, that the infirmities of Mrs. Unwin were rapidly sinking her into a state of the most pitiable imbecility. Unable any longer to watch over the tender health of him whom she had guarded for so many years, and unwilling to relinquish her authority, her conduct at this period presented that painful spectacle, which we are occasionally called to witness, of declining nature seeking to retain that power which it knows not how to use nor how to resign. The effect of these increasing infirmities on her whom Cowper justly regarded as the guardian of his life, added to apprehensions which he now began to feel that his increasing expenses, occasioned by Mrs. Unwin's protracted illness, would involve him in difficulties, filled him with the. greatest uneasiness; and the depressing influence it had upon his mind, became painfully evident to all his friends. So visibly was such the case, that Mr. Hayley felt fully persuaded that, unless some speedy and important change took place in Cowper's circumstances, his tender mind would inevitably sink under the multiplicity of its cares. To effect this desirable object, as far as was in his power, he embraced the earliest opportunity, after leaving Weston, of having an interview with Lord Spencer, and of stating to him the undisguised condition of the afflicted poet. His lordship entered feelingly into the case, and shortly afterwards mentioned it to his majesty. It was owing to this that his majesty, some time afterwards, granted to Cowper such a pension as was sufficient to secure to him a comfortable competence for the remainder of his life. It is however deeply to be regretted that this seasonable and well-merited bounty was not received till the poet's mind was enveloped in that midnight gloom from which it never afterwards wholly emerged.

The increasing infirmities of Mrs. Unwin did not, in the slightest degree, dimish Cowper's regard for her; on the contrary, they seemed rather to augment it, as the following beautiful poem, written about this time, will show:—

TO MARY.

"The twentieth year is well nigh past
Since first our sky was overcast,
And would that this might be the last,
My Mary!

Thy spirits have a fainter glow;
I see thee daily weaker grow;
'Twas my distress that brought thee low,
My Mary!

Thy needles once a shining store,
For my sake restless heretofore;
Now rust disused, and shine no more,
My Mary!

For though thou gladly wouldst fulfil
The same kind office for me still,
Thy sight now seconds not thy will,
My Mary!

But well thou play'dst the huswife's part,
And all thy threads, with magic art,
Have wound themselves about my heart,
My Mary!

Thy indistinct expressions seem
Like language uttered in a dream;
Yet me they charm whate'er the theme,
My Mary!

Thy silver locks, once auburn bright,
Are still more lovely in my sight
Than golden beams of orient light,
My Mary!

For could I view nor them nor thee,
What sight worth seeing could I see?
The sun would rise in vain for me,
My Mary!

Partakers of thy sad decline,
Thy hands their little force resign,
Yet gently prest, press gently mine,
My Mary!

Such feebleness of limbs thou prov'st,
That now, at every step thou mov'st,
Upheld by two, yet still thou lov'st,
My Mary!

And still to love, though prest with ill,
In wintry age to feel no chill,
With me is to be lovely still,
My Mary!

But, ah! by constant heed I know
How oft the sadness that I show
Transforms thy smiles to looks of woe,
My Mary!

And should my future lot be cast
With much resemblance of the past,
Thy worn-out heart will break at last,
My Mary!

Cowper retained his admirable powers in their full vigour, during the whole of 1793, and till the middle of January, of the following year. His letters, written subsequently to Mr. Hayley's visit, though but few, afford unquestionable proofs, that his talents had not suffered the slightest diminution. The following extract, in reply to some remarks on a disputed passage in his Homer, will show that his faculties were then unimpaired. To Mr. Hayley, 5th January, 1794, he writes. "If my old friend would look into my preface, he would find a principle laid down there which perhaps it would not be easy to invalidate, and which, properly attended to, would equally secure a translation from stiffness, and from wildness. The principle I mean is this—'Close, but not so close as to be servile! free, but not so free as to be licentious! A superstitious fidelity loses the spirit, and a loose deviation the sense of the translated author—a happy moderation in either case is the only possible way of preserving both."

"Imlac, in Rasselas, says—I forget to whom, 'You have convinced me that it is impossible to be a poet.' In like manner, I might say to his Lordship, you have convinced me that it is impossible to be a translator—to be one, on his terms at least, is, I am sure, impossible. On his terms, I would defy Homer himself, were he alive, to translate the Paradise Lost into Greek. Yet Milton had Homer much in his eye when he composed that poem. Whereas, Homer never thought of me, or my translation. There are minutiæ in every language, which, translated into another, would spoil the version. Such extreme fidelity is, in fact, unfaithful. Such close resemblance takes away all likeness. The original is elegant, easy, natural; the copy is clumsy, constrained, and unnatural. To what is this owing? To the adoption of terms not congenial to your purpose, and of a context, such as no man writing an original would make use of. Homer is everything that a poet should be. A translation of him, so made, will be everything a translation of Homer should not be. Because it will be written in no language under heaven. It will be English, and it will be Greek, and therefore it will be neither. He is the man, whoever he may be, (I do not pretend to be that man myself)—he is the man best qualified as a translator of Homer, who has drenched, and steeped, and soaked himself in the effusions of his genius, till he has imbibed their colour to the bone, and who, when he is thus dyed, through and through, distinguishing what is essentially Greek, from what may be habited in English, rejects the former, and is faithful to the latter, as far as the purposes of fine poetry will permit, and no farther; this, I think, may be easily proved. Homer is everywhere remarkable for ease, dignity, energy of expression, grandeur of conception, and a majestic flow of numbers. If we copy him so closely as to make every one of these excellent properties of his absolutely unattainable, which will certainly be the effect of too close a copy, instead of translating, we murder him. Therefore, after all his Lordship has said, I still hold freedom to be an indispensable. Freedom, I mean, with respect to the expression; freedom so limited as never to leave behind the matter, but at the same time indulged with a sufficient scope, to secure the spirit, and as much as possible of the manner; I say as much as possible, because an English manner must differ from a Greek one, in order to be graceful, and for this there is no remedy. Can an ungraceful awkward translator of Homer be a good one? No; but a graceful, easy, natural, faithful version of him, will not that be a good one? Yes: allow me but this, and I insist upon it, that such a one may be produced on my principles, and can be produced on no other. Reading his Lordship's sentiments over again, I am inclined to think that in all I have said, I have only given him back the same in other terms. He disallows both the absolute free, and the absolute close; so do I, and if I understand myself, have said so in my preface. He wishes to recommend a medium, though he will not call it so; so do I; only we express it differently. What is it then that we dispute about? I confess my head is not good enough today to discover."

This was almost the last letter Cowper wrote to Mr. Hayley, and with a very few exceptions, the last that he ever wrote at all. Shortly after he had forwarded this, he experienced a more severe attack of depression than he had ever before felt, which paralyzed all his powers, and continued almost wholly unmitigated, through the remaining period of his life. The situation to which he was now reduced, was deeply affecting; imagination can scarcely picture to itself a scene of wretchedness more truly deplorable. Mrs. Unwin's infirmities had reduced her to a state of second childhood; a deep-seated melancholy, which nothing could remove, preyed upon Cowper's mind, and caused him to shun the sight of all except the individual who was utterly incapable of rendering him any assistance; his domestic expenses were daily increasing, and as his capabilities of preventing it were now entirely suspended, there was every probability of his being involved in considerable embarrassment. The providence of God, however, which had watched over, and preserved him during the whole of his life, and had appeared on his behalf in several instances of peculiar distress, in a manner truly striking and affecting, did not abandon him in his present painful emergency. Lady Hesketh, his amiable cousin, and favourite correspondent, now generously undertook the arduous task of watching over the melancholy poet and his feeble associate. The painful duties of this important office, which every one who is at all acquainted with the great anxiety of mind required in all cases of mental aberration, will admit to be in no ordinary degree arduous, she discharged with the utmost christian tenderness and affection. Nor did she discover any disposition to relinquish her charge, though it made considerable inroads upon her health, owing to the confinement and exertion it required, until an opportunity offered of placing these interesting invalids under the care of those who she knew would feel the greatest pleasure in laying themselves out for their comfort.

Hearing nothing from Cowper for several days beyond the time when he was accustomed to write, Mr. Hayley began to fear that his apprehensions respecting his friend's health were realized. He did not, however, receive the painful intelligence of his relapse until some time afterwards, when he was informed of it by a letter from Lady Hesketh, detailing the particulars of his distressing case. About this time the Rev. Mr. Greatheed, with whom Cowper had long been on terms of intimacy, and whom he very highly esteemed, paid him a visit. Such, however, was the distressing state to which Cowper was now reduced, that he refused to see any one, but his own domestics, on whatever friendly terms he might have been with them formerly. The hopes that his friends had cherished, of his recovery, in some degree, at least, as the summer advanced, were now entirely cut off; and they were all fully persuaded that unless some improvement took place in the state of his mind, the worst consequences were to be apprehended. The best advice had been taken without the slightest benefit, and the case began to appear altogether hopeless. It occurred to Lady Hesketh that probably the presence of Mr. Hayley would cheer the poet's mind, and rouse him from his present state of almost absolute despair. She suggested this to Mr. Greatheed, but said she could not venture to mention the subject in her letters to Mr. Hayley, as it appeared unreasonable to request a person to come so great a distance with so little real chance of success. Mr. Greatheed immediately wrote the following letter to Mr. Hayley, on the subject, which describes the melancholy condition to which Cowper was then reduced, and the great anxiety of mind manifested by his friends on his behalf:—"Dear Sir, Lady Hesketh's correspondence has acquainted you with the melancholy relapse of our dear friend at Weston; but I am uncertain whether you know that within the last fortnight, he has refused food of every kind, except now and then a very small piece of toasted bread, dipped generally in water, sometimes mixed with a little wine. This, her Ladyship informs me, was the case till last Saturday, since then he has eaten a little at each family meal. He persists in refusing to take such medicines as are indispensable to his state of body. In such circumstances his long continuance in life cannot be expected. How devoutly to be wished is the alleviation of his sufferings and distress! You, dear Sir, who know so well the worth of our beloved and admired friend, sympathize with us in this affliction, and deprecate his loss doubtless in no ordinary degree. You have already most effectually expressed and proved the warmth of your friendship. I cannot think that anything but your society would have been sufficient, during the infirmity under which his mind has long been oppressed, to have supported him against the shock of Mrs. Unwin's paralytic attack. I am certain that nothing else could have prevailed upon him to undertake the journey to Eartham. You have succeeded where his other friends knew they could not, and where they apprehended no one could. How natural, therefore, is it, for them to look to you, as most likely to be instrumental, under the blessing of God, to bring him relief in the present distressing and alarming crisis. It is, indeed, not a little unreasonable to ask any person to take such a journey, to witness so melancholy a scene, with an uncertainty of the desired success, increased as the present difficulty is, by dear Mr. Cowper's aversion to all company. On these accounts Lady Hesketh does not ask it of you, rejoiced as she would be at your arrival. Am not I, dear Sir, a very presumptuous person, who, in the face of all opposition, dare do this? I am emboldened by these two powerful supporters—conscience, and experience. Were I at Eartham, I would certainly undertake the journey I have presumed to recommend, for the bare possibility of restoring Mr. Cowper to himself, to his friends, and to the public."

Mr. Hayley was too affectionately attached to Cowper, to hesitate for a moment, what steps he should take on the receipt of this letter. The remotest probability of his being useful to his afflicted friend, was amply sufficient to have induced him to undertake a much longer journey than this, to whatever dangers and inconveniences it might have exposed him. He accordingly made immediate arrangements for a visit to Weston, where he arrived a few days afterwards, with his talented son, a youth of great promise, to whom Cowper was most affectionately attached. Little or no benefit, however, resulted from this visit. The suffering invalid was too deeply overwhelmed by his depressive malady to show even the slightest symptoms of satisfaction at the appearance of one whom he had ever been accustomed to welcome with such affectionate delight. His acute anguish had nearly extinguished all the finest faculties of his mind, and annihilated, at least for a time, all the best affections of his heart. He seemed to shrink from every human creature, and if he allowed any one, except his own domestics, to approach him, it was with so much obvious reluctance and aversion, that no benefit could be expected to arise from the interview. The only exception was in the case of Mr. Hayley's son, in whose company he would occasionally, for a short time, seem pleased; which Mr. Hayley "attributed partly to the peculiar charm which is generally found in the manners of tender ingenuous children; and partly to that uncommon sweetness of character which had inspired Cowper with a degree of parental partiality towards this highly promising youth." The united efforts, however, of both father and son, could not produce the slightest alleviation of Cowper's sufferings.

Shortly after Mr. Hayley's arrival at Weston, Lady Hesketh embraced the opportunity of leaving her interesting invalids for a few days in his charge, that she might, by a personal interview, consult the eminent Dr. Willis, who had prescribed so successfully in the case of his Majesty George III., on the subject of Cowper's malady. Lord Thurlow had written to the Doctor in Cowper's behalf, and at his and Lady Hesketh's request, he was induced to visit the interesting sufferer at Weston. Here again, however, the expectations of his friends were greatly disappointed; as the Doctor's skill on this occasion proved wholly unsuccessful.

Mr. Hayley remained at Weston for some weeks, exerting all the means that ingenuity could invent, or that affection could dictate, to afford some relief to his suffering friend; he had, however, the mortification to perceive that his well-directed efforts were entirely useless. The circumstances in which Cowper was now placed, were exceedingly unfavourable to mental relief. Associated with one whose daily increasing infirmities were rapidly reducing her to a state of the most affecting imbecility; the constant sight of which was of itself, almost sufficient to have produced melancholy in a tender mind like Cowper's, it was hardly probable that, under such circumstances, he should recover from his most depressive malady. And yet to have separated him from the being with whom he had been so long associated, would have been an act of cruelty, which he would not, in all probability, have survived. All that could be done was to mitigate, as much as possible, the sufferings of each individual, and to persevere in the use of such means, as would be most likely, under such circumstances, to promote the poet's recovery, leaving the event at His disposal who, in a manner altogether unexpected, had formerly appeared for him on several distressing occasions.

One morning in April, 1794, while Mr. Hayley was at Weston, musing, as he and Lady Hesketh were sometimes accustomed to do, over the melancholy scene of Cowper's sufferings, with aching and almost broken hearts, at the utter inefficacy of every measure that had been taken to afford him relief, they were suddenly almost overjoyed at the receipt of a letter from Lord Spencer, announcing it to be his Majesty's gracious intention to allow Cowper the grant of such a pension for life as would secure to him an honourable competence. The only subject of regret, at this pleasing circumstance, was that he whom it was chiefly intended to benefit, and who, if he had been free from his depressive malady, would have been gratified in the highest degree at this instance of royal generosity, was in a condition that rendered it impossible for him to receive, even the faintest glimmering of joy on the occasion. It was, however, fondly hoped by his friends, that he would ultimately recover, and that the day would at length arrive, when he would be able gratefully to acknowledge this princely beneficence. Well was it, indeed, for his friends, that they supported their minds by indulging these hopes of amendment. Had they known that he was doomed to pass six years in the same depressed and melancholy condition, with scarcely a single alleviation, and was, at the expiration of that lengthened period, to leave the world under the influence of this midnight gloom, they would themselves have almost become the subjects of despair. Such, however, was the case; and it is doubtful, though Cowper subsequently recovered in some slight degree from his depression, whether he was ever in a condition fully to appreciate the value of his Majesty's grant.

Mr. Hayley's departure from Weston, which was now become to him as much a scene of suffering, as it had formerly been of enjoyment, he thus affectingly records:—"After devoting a few weeks at Weston, I was under the painful necessity of forcing myself away from my unhappy friend, who, though he appeared to take no pleasure in my society, expressed extreme reluctance to let me depart. I hardly ever endured an hour more dreadfully distressing than the hour in which I left him. Yet the anguish of it would have been greatly increased, had I been conscious that he was destined to years of this dark depression, and that I should see him no more. I still indulged the hope, from the native vigour of his frame, that as he had formerly struggled through longer fits of the depressive malady, his darkened mind would yet emerge from this calamitous eclipse, and shine forth again with new lustre. These hopes were considerably increased at a subsequent period: but, alas! they were delusive! for though he recovered sufficient command of his faculties to write a few occasional poems, and to retouch his 'Homer,' yet the prospect of his perfect recovery was never realized; and I had beheld the poet of unrivalled genius, the sympathetic friend, and the delightful companion, for the last time!"

Cowper remained in the same most distressing state, from the time of Mr. Hayley's departure, which was in the spring of 1794, till the summer of 1795. During the whole of this time he was most affectionately watched over by his amiable cousin: she procured for him the best medical advice, and employed every means that promised the slighest chance of proving beneficial. All these, however, were ineffectual to lighten that ponderous burden which incessantly pressed upon and weighed down his spirits. He had now been eighteen months in this deplorable state, and, instead of becoming better, if any alteration had taken place at all, it was evidently for the worse. Lady Hesketh's health was beginning to fail, owing to the intense anxiety of mind she had experienced for so long a period; and it became at length desirable to try what effect a change of air and of scene would have upon him. Almost all his friends recommended this measure, which was no sooner determined upon, than his highly esteemed relative of Norfolk, the Reverend J. Johnson, who had been several weeks at Weston, assisting Lady Hesketh, voluntarily and generously undertook the charge of both these suffering but interesting individuals. Their removal from Weston to North Tuddenham, in Norfolk, took place under the immediate guidance of Mr. Johnson, on the 28th July, 1795. They performed their journey in safety and ease in three days. Here they were accommodated with a commodious parsonage-house, by the kindness of the Rev. Leonard Shelford, with whom Mr. Johnson had previously made arrangements for their reception, fearing lest the activity and bustle that occasionally prevailed in the vicinity of his own house, situated in the market-place at East Dereham, should harass and perplex the tender mind of Cowper.

They continued in their new residence only a very short time. In the following August Mr. Johnson conducted them to Mundesley, a village on the Norfolk coast, hoping that a situation by the sea-side might prove amusing to Cowper, and become ultimately the means of reviving his spirits. Here they remained till the following October, without appearing to derive any benefit whatever. While in this situation Cowper, who had long discontinued all correspondence with his friends, ventured to write the following letter to the Reverend Mr. Buchanan, which, while it shows the melancholy depression under which he still laboured, proves that he was not without some occasional intermissions of pleasure:—"I will forget for a moment that, to whomsoever I may address myself, a letter from me can no otherwise be welcome than as a curiosity. To you, Sir, I address this, urged to it by extreme penury of employment, and the desire I feel to learn something of what is doing, and has been done, at Weston (my beloved Weston) since I left it.

"The coldness of these blasts, even in the hottest days, has been such, that, added to the irritation of the salt spray, with which they are always charged, they have occasioned me an inflammation in the eyelids, which threatened, a few days since, to confine me entirely; but by absenting myself as much as possible from the beach, and guarding my face with an umbrella, that inconvenience is in some degree abated. My chamber commands a very near view of the ocean, and the ships, at high water, approach the coast so closely, that a man, furnished with better eyes than mine, might I doubt not discern the sailors from the window. No situation, at least when the weather is clear, can be more pleasant; which you will easily credit, when I add, that it imparts something a little resembling pleasure, even to me. Gratify me with news of Weston! If Mr. Gregor, and your neighbours the Courtenays, are there, mention me to them in such terms as you see good. Tell me, if my poor birds are living? I never see the herbs I used to give them, without a recollection of them, and sometimes am ready to gather them, forgetting that I am not at home."

In the beginning of October, 1795, Mr. Johnson took the two interesting invalids to his own residence at Dereham, where they remained about a month, when they removed to Dunham Lodge, which was then unoccupied, and was pleasantly situated in a park, a few miles from Swaffham, and which from that time became their settled residence. Here they were constantly attended by two of the most interesting females that could possibly have been selected, Miss Johnson and Miss Perowne. The latter took so lively an interest in Cowper's welfare, and exerted so much ingenuity, in attempting to produce some alleviation of his sufferings, that he ever afterwards honoured her with his peculiar regard, and preferred her attendance to that of every other individual by whom he was surrounded; and she continued her kind attention to him to the close of his life. The providence of God (as Mr. Hayley justly remarks) was strikingly displayed towards Cowper, in supplying him with attendants, during the whole of his life, peculiarly suited to the exigencies of mental dejection."

Cowper's melancholy depression still remained unalleviated. In June, 1796, however, an incident occurred, which for a time, though it removed not his dejection, revived the spirits of his friends, and cheered them with the hope of his ultimate recovery. Mr. Johnson invariably procured copies of all such new publications as were likely to interest the mind of Cowper; and as Cowper had discontinued the use of his pen, and manifested considerable disinclination to read himself, Mr. Johnson kindly undertook to read these publications to his relative whenever suitable opportunities offered. About this time Mr. Wakefield published his edition of Pope's Homer. It occurred to Mr. Johnson, who always readily embraced the slightest incident that seemed likely to diminish the anguish of his afflicted relative, that this work might probably excite the poet's attention sufficiently to rouse him, in some degree, from his dejection. He immediately, therefore, procured a copy, and ingeniously placed it in a conspicuous part of a large unfrequented room, through which he knew Cowper would have to pass, in his way from Mrs. Unwin's apartments, and in which, he was aware, it was Cowper's practice, daily, to take some turns, observing previously to his afflicted relative, that the work contained some occasional comparison of Pope with Cowper. The plan succeeded far beyond Mr. Johnson's expectation: to his agreeable surprise, he discovered, the next day, that Cowper had not only found the passages to which he had adverted, but had corrected his translation at the suggestion of some of them. Perceiving that the poet's attention was arrested, it was vigilantly cherished by the utmost efforts of Mr. Johnson; and from that time Cowper regularly engaged in a revisal of his own version, and for some weeks produced almost sixty new lines a-day. He continued this occupation so steadily, and with so much deliberation, that all his friends began to rejoice, at the prospect of his almost immediate recovery. Their hopes, however, were of short duration. In a few weeks he again relapsed into the same state of hopeless depression. In the ensuing autumn, Mr. Johnson again made trial of a change of air, and of scene, and removed the family to the delightful village of Mundesley. No apparent benefit, however, resulted from this change, and towards the close of October, 1796, it was thought desirable to remove the family to Mr. Johnson's house at Dereham, and to remain there during the winter, as the Lodge was at too great a distance from Mr. Johnson's churches.

In the following December it became evident that Mrs. Unwin's life was rapidly drawing to a close; she had been gradually sinking for a considerable time; and on the seventeenth day of this month, in the 72d year of her age, she peacefully, and without a groan, or a sigh, resigned her happy spirit into the hands of God. Her life had been eminently distinguished by the most fervent and unaffected piety, which she had displayed in circumstances the most trying and afflicting, and her end was peace. The day before she expired, Cowper, as he had long been accustomed to do at regular periods, spent a short time with his afflicted and long-tried friend; and though to his inmates he appeared so absorbed in his own mental anguish, as to take little, if any notice of her condition, it was evident afterwards that he clearly perceived how fast she was sinking; for, as a faithful servant of himself and his afflicted friend, was opening the window of his chamber the following morning, he addressed her in a tone the most plaintive and affecting, "Sally, is there life above stairs!" a convincing proof that the acuteness of his own anguish had not prevented him from bestowing great attention to the sufferings of his aged friend. He saw her, for the last time, about an hour before she expired; and, notwithstanding the intensity of his own distress, he was much affected, though he clearly perceived that she enjoyed the utmost tranquillity. He saw the corpse once after her decease; and after looking at it attentively for a short time, he suddenly withdrew, under the influence of the strongest emotions. She was buried in Dereham church, on the 23d December, 1796, and a marble tablet was raised to her memory, with the following inscription:

MARY,

WIDOW OF THE REV. MORLEY UNWIN,

AND

BURIED IN THIS CHURCH, 1796.

Trusting in God with all her heart and mind,
This woman proved magnanimously kind,
Endured affliction's desolating hail,
And watched a poet through misfortune's vale.
Her spotless dust, angelic guards defend!
It is the dust of Unwin, Cowper's friend!
That single title in itself is fame,
For all who read his verse revere her name."

Had Cowper been in the enjoyment of health, and had his mind been entirely free from his gloomy forebodings, at the time of Mrs. Unwin's decease, so tender and lively were his feelings, that it would undoubtedly have proved to him one of the severest shocks he had ever experienced. Such, however, was the influence of his melancholy depression, that he never afterwards adverted to the event, even in the most distant way, nor did he even make the slightest inquiries respecting her funeral. A more striking proof of the intense anguish of his own sufferings cannot possibly be given. Dreadful, indeed, must have been those feelings that could have produced an insensibility so great in his tender mind, for the loss of such a friend!

In the summer of 1797, Cowper's health appeared in some measure to improve, and in the following September, at the earnest entreaty of his kinsman, he again resumed the revisal of his Homer; and, notwithstanding the severity of his mental anguish, he persevered in it, with some occasional interruption, till the eighth of May, 1799, on which day he completed the work. It was evidently owing to the rare talents exerted by Mr. Johnson on the mind of Cowper, that he was induced to bring this great work to a successful close. And it would have been exceedingly difficult, if not utterly impossible, to have found an individual who could, with so much tenderness, have exerted an influence so beneficial over the distressed mind of the poet. He was, however, indefatigable in his efforts to divert his mind from the melancholy depression which spread its pernicious influence over his soul. And, during the whole of the summer of 1798, he endeavoured, by frequent change of scene, sometimes residing for a week or two at Mundesley, and then returning to Dereham, to restore the mind of his revered relative to its proper tone. And though he had not the satisfaction to see his efforts crowned with complete success, yet he was pleased to perceive them prove in some degree, at least, beneficial to the interesting sufferer. In his sketch of Cowper's life, published in the last edition of the poet's works, he "records it as a subject of much gratitude, that a merciful providence should again have appointed his afflicted relative the employment alluded to, as, more than anything else, it diverted his mind from a contemplation of its miseries, and seemed to extend his breathing, which was at other times short, to a depth of respiration more compatible with ease."

The happy means pursued by Mr. Johnson to induce Cowper to complete the revisal of his Homer, and its successful result, ought not to go unrecorded. He thus relates it in the excellent sketch above referred to:—"His kinsman resolved, if it were possible, to reinstate him in the revisal of his Homer. One morning, therefore, after breakfast, in the month of September, 1797, he placed the commentaries on the table one by one, namely, Villoison, Barnes, and Clarke, opening them all, together with the poet's translation, at the place where he had left off a twelvemonth before; but, talking with him as he paced the room, upon a very different subject, namely, the impossibility of the things befalling him, which his imagination had represented; when, as his companion had wished, Cowper said to him, 'And are you sure that I shall be here till the book you are reading is finished.' Quite sure, replied his kinsman, and that you will also be here to complete the revisal of your Homer, pointing to the books, if you will resume it to-day. As he repeated these words, he left the room, rejoicing in the well-known token of their having sunk deep into the poet's mind, namely, his seating himself on the sofa, taking up one of the books, and saying, in a low and plaintive voice, 'I may as well do this, for I can do nothing else.'"

In July, 1798, the Dowager Lady Spencer paid the afflicted poet a visit. Had he been in the enjoyment of health, he would undoubtedly have received her with the greatest respect and affection, and the conversation between them would have been equally pleasing to both parties; such, however, was his melancholy depression, that he seemed not to derive any pleasure from the visit, and on no occasion could he be prevailed upon to converse with his distinguished visitor with any apparent pleasure.

While residing at Mundesley, in October, 1798, Cowper felt himself so far relieved from his depressive malady as to undertake, without solicitation, to write to Lady Hesketh. The following extract from this letter, will show the severity of his mental anguish, even at that period:—"You describe delightful scenes, but you describe them to one, who, if he even saw them, could receive no delight from them, who has a faint recollection, and so faint as to be like an almost forgotten dream, that once he was susceptible of pleasure from such causes. The country that you have had in prospect, has been always famed for its beauties; but the wretch who can derive no gratification from a view of nature, even under the disadvantage of her most ordinary dress, will have no eyes to admire her in any. In one day,—in one minute, I should rather have said,—she became an universal blank to me, and though from a different cause, yet with an effect as difficult to remove as blindness itself."

Mr. Johnson again removed from Mundesley to Dereham, towards the end of October, and pursuing their journey, on this occasion, with himself, Miss Perowne, and Cowper, in the postchaise, they were overturned. Cowper discovered no particular alarm on the occasion, and through the blessing of Providence, they all escaped unhurt.

As soon as Cowper had finished the revisal of his Homer, Mr. Johnson laid before him the papers containing the commencement of his projected poem—The Four Ages. He, however, declined undertaking it, as a work far too important for him to attempt in his present situation. Several other literary projects, of easier accomplishment, were then suggested to him by his kinsman, who was aware of the great benefit he had derived from employment, and was seriously apprehensive that the want of it would add to his depression: all of them, however, were objected to by the poet, who, at length, replied, that he had just thought of six Latin verses, and if he could do anything, it must be in pursuing something of that description. He, however, gratified his friends, by occasionally employing the powers of his astonishing mind, which still remained in full vigour, in the composition of some short original poems. In this way he produced the poem entitled Montes Glaciales, founded upon an incident, which he had heard read from the Norwich paper, several months previous; to which, at the time, owing to his depression, he appeared to pay no attention. This poem he afterwards, at the request of Miss Perowne, translated into Latin. Translation was his principal amusement; sometimes from Latin and Greek into English, and occasionally from English into Latin. In this way he translated several of Gay's Fables, and communicated to them, in their new dress, all that ease and vivacity which they have in the original. Thus elegantly employed, he continued, with some intermissions, almost to the close of his life.

The last original poem he composed was entitled The Castaway, and was founded upon an incident, related in Anson's Voyage, of a mariner who was washed overboard in the Atlantic, and lost, which he remembered to have read in that work many years ago, and which, according to the following stanzas, selected from it, he appears to have regarded as an illustration of his own case:

"Obscurest night involved the sky,
  The Atlantic billows roared,
When such a destined wretch as I,
  Washed headlong from on board,
Of friends, of hope, of all bereft,
His floating home for ever left.

He long survives who lives an hour
  In ocean self-upheld,
And so long he, with unspent power,
  His destiny repelled;
And ever, as the minutes flew,
Entreated help, or cry'd 'Adieu!'

No poet wept him, but the page
  Of narrative sincere,
That tells his name, his worth, his age,
  Is wet with Anson's tear:
And tears, by bards or heroes shed,
Alike immortalize the dead.

I therefore purpose not, or dream,
  Descanting on his fate!
To give the melancholy theme
  A more enduring date.
But misery still delights to trace
Its semblance in another's case.

No voice divine the storm allay'd,
  No light propitious shone,
When snatched from all effectual aid,
  We perished, each alone;
But I beneath a rougher sea,
And whelmed in deeper gulphs than he!"

Anxious as all his friends now were, that he should be constantly employed, as this proved the best remedy for his depression, they were frequently pained to see him reduced to a state of hopeless inactivity, owing to the severity of his mental anguish. At these seasons, what suited him best, was, Mr. Johnson's reading to him, which he was accustomed to do, almost invariably for a length of time, every day. And so industriously had he persevered in this method of relieving the poet's mind, that after having exhausted numerous works of fiction, which had the power of attracting his attention, he began to read to his afflicted relative the poet's own works. Cowper evinced no disapprobation to this till the reader arrived at the history of John Gilpin, when he entreated his relative to desist.

It became evident towards the close of 1799, that his bodily strength was rapidly declining, though his mental powers, notwithstanding the unmitigated severity of his depression, remained unimpaired. In January, 1800, Mr. Johnson observed in him many symptoms which he thought very unfavourable. This induced him to call in additional medical advice. His complaint was pronounced to be, not as has been generally stated, dropsical, but a breaking up of the constitution. Remedies, however, were tried, and he was recommended to take as much gentle exercise as he could bear. To this recommendation he discovered no particular aversion, and Mr. Johnson took him for a ride in a postchaise, as often as circumstances would permit; it was, however, with considerable difficulty he could be prevailed upon to use such medicines as it was thought necessary to employ.

About this time his friend Mr. Hayley wrote to him, expressing a wish that he would new-model a passage in his translation of the Iliad, where mention is made of the very ancient sculpture in which Dædalus had represented the Cretan dance for Ariadne. "On the 31st January," says Mr. Hayley, "I received from him his improved version of the lines in question, written in a firm and delicate hand. The sight of such writing from my long-silent friend, inspired me with a lively, but too sanguine hope, that I might see him once more restored. Alas! the verses which I surveyed as a delightful omen of future letters from a correspondent so inexpressibly dear to me, proved the last effort of his pen."

Cowper's weakness now very rapidly increased, and by the end of February it had become so great as to render him incapable of enduring the fatigue of his usual ride, which was hence discontinued. In a few days he ceased to come down stairs, though he was still able, after breakfasting in bed, to adjourn to another room, and to remain there till the evening. By the end of the ensuing March, he was compelled to forego even this trifling exercise. He was now entirely confined to his bed-room; he was, however, still able to sit up to every meal, except breakfast.

His friend Mr. Rose, about this time, paid him a visit. Such, however, was the melancholy change which his complicated maladies had produced upon his mind, that he expressed no pleasure at the arrival of one whom he had previously been accustomed to greet with the most cordial reception. Mr. Rose remained with him till the first week in April, witnessing with much sorrow the sufferings of the afflicted poet, and kindly sympathising with his distressed relations and friends. Little as Cowper had appeared to enjoy his company, he evinced symptoms of considerable regret at his departure.

Both Lady Hesketh, and Mr. Hayley, would have followed the humane example of Mr. Rose, in visiting the dying poet, had they not been prevented by circumstances over which they had no control. The health of the former, had suffered considerably by her long confinement with Cowper, at the commencement of his last attack, and the latter was detained by the impending death of a darling child.

Mr. Johnson informs us, in his sketch of the poet's life, that, "on the 19th April the weakness of this truly pitiable sufferer had so much increased that his kinsman apprehended his death to be near. Adverting, therefore, to the affliction, as well of body as of mind, which his beloved inmate was then enduring, he ventured to speak of his approaching dissolution as the signal of his deliverance from both these miseries. After a pause of a few moments, which was less interrupted by the objections of his desponding relative than he had dared to hope, he proceeded to an observation more consolatory still—namely, that in the world to which he was hastening, a merciful Redeemer, who had prepared unspeakable happiness for all his children, and therefore for him ——. To the first part of this sentence he had listened with composure, but the concluding words were no sooner uttered than his passionately expressed entreaties that his companion would desist from any further observations of a similar kind, clearly proving that though he was on the eve of being invested with angelic light, the darkness of delusion still veiled his spirit."

On the following day, which was Sunday, he revived a little. Mr. Johnson, on repairing to his room, after he had discharged his clerical duties, found him in bed and asleep. He did not, however, leave the room, but remained watching him, expecting he might, on awaking, require his assistance. Whilst engaged in this melancholy office, and endeavouring to reconcile his mind to the loss of so dear a friend, by considering the gain which that friend would experience, his reflections were suddenly interrupted by the singularly varied tone in which Cowper then began to breathe. Imagining it to be the sound of his immediate summons, after listening to it for several minutes, he arose from the foot of the bed on which he was sitting, to take a nearer, and, as he supposed, a last view of his departing relative, commending his soul to that gracious Saviour, whom, in the fulness of mental health, he had delighted to honour. As he put aside the curtains, Cowper opened his eyes, but closed them again without speaking, and breathed as usual. On Monday he was much worse; though, towards the close of the day, he revived sufficiently to take a little refreshment. The two following days he evidently continued to sink rapidly. He revived a little on Thursday, but, in the course of the night, he appeared exceedingly exhausted; some refreshment was presented to him by Miss Perowne, but, owing to a persuasion that nothing could afford him relief, though without any apparent impression that the hand of death was already upon him, he mildly rejected the cordial with these words, the last he was heard to utter: "What can it signify?"

Early on Friday morning, the 25th, a decided alteration for the worse was perceived to have taken place. A deadly change appeared in his countenance. In this insensible state he remained till a few minutes before five in the afternoon, when he gently, and without the slightest apparent pain, ceased to breathe, and his happy spirit escaped from his body, in which, amidst the thickest gloom of darkness, it had so long been imprisoned, and took its flight to the regions of perfect purity and bliss. In a manner so mild and gentle did death make its approach, that though his kinsman, his medical attendant, and three others were standing at the foot of the bed, with their eyes fixed upon his dying countenance, the precise moment of his departure was unobserved by any.

"From this mournful period," writes Mr. Johnson, "till the features of his deceased friend were closed from his view, the expression which the kinsman of Cowper observed in them, and which he was affectionately delighted to suppose an index of the last thoughts and enjoyments of his soul in its gradual escape from the depths of despondence, was that of calmness and composure, mingled, as it were, with holy surprise."

He was buried in that part of Dereham Church, called St. Edmund's Chapel, on Saturday, the 2d May, 1800; and his funeral was attended by several of his relatives. In a literary point of view, his long and painful affliction had ever been regarded as a national calamity; a deep and almost universal sympathy was felt in his behalf; and by all men of learning and of piety, his death was looked upon as an event of no common importance.

As he died without a will, his amiable and beloved relation, Lady Hesketh, kindly undertook to become his administratrix. She raised a tablet monument to his memory with the following inscription:—

IN MEMORY OF

WILLIAM COWPER, Esq.

BORN IN HERTFORDSHIRE,

1731.

BURIED IN THIS CHURCH,

1800.

Ye who with warmth the public triumph feel
Of talents, dignified by sacred zeal,
Here, to devotion's bard, devoutly just,
Pay your fond tribute, due to Cowper's dust!
England, exulting in his spotless fame,
Ranks with her dearest sons his favourite name!
Sense, fancy, wit, suffice not all to raise
So clear a title to affection's praise:
His highest honours to the heart belong—
His virtues formed the magic of his song.

The following lines have been kindly handed to the author by a friend, in manuscript. He is not sure they have never been in print, though he rather inclines to think such is the case.

And is the spirit of the Poet fled?
Yes, from its earthly tenement 'tis flown;
And death at length hath added to the dead
The sweetest minstrel that the world has known.

Too nice, too great, his sympathy of soul;
For, oh! his feelings were so much refined,
That sense became impatient of control,
And darkness seized the empire of his mind.

But when Reflection threw her eagle eye
Athwart the gloom of unpropitious fate,
Faith op'd a splendid vista to the sky,
And gave an earnest of a happier state:

To see, whilst sceptics to the effects of chance
Ascribe creation's ever-varying form;
To see distinctly, at the first slight glance,
Who wings the lightning, and who drives the storm,

To brush the cobweb follies from the great,
Which Art, with all her sophistry has spread
Uphold the honour of a sinking state,
And bid Religion raise her drooping head.

Such were the objects of the enraptured bard,
In such his lucid intervals he passed;
And knowing Virtue was her own reward,
Wooed, and revered, and loved her to the last.

Know, then, that Death has added to his list
As sweet a bard as ever swept a lyre:
In Death's despite his memory shall exist
In numbers pregnant with celestial fire.

Yes, Cowper! with thy own expressive lays,
Lays which have haply many a mind illum'd,
Thy name shall triumph o'er the lapse of days,
And only perish when the world 's consumed!

CHAPTER XVIII.

Description of his person, his manners, his disposition, his piety —His attachment to the Established Church—His attainments —Originality of his poetry—His religious sentiments—The warmth of his friendship—His attachment to the British constitution—His industry and perseverance—Happy manner in which he could console the afflicted—His occasional intervals of enjoyment—Character as a writer—Powers of description—Beauty of his letters—His aversion to flattery, to affectation, to cruelty—His love of liberty, and dread of its abuse—Strong attachment to, and intimate acquaintance with the scriptures—Pleasure with which he sometimes viewed the works of creation —Contentment of his mind—Extract from an anonymous critic—Poetic tribute to his memory.

It is scarcely necessary to add anything on the subject of Cowper's character, after the ample delineation that has already been given of it in this memoir; we shall, however, subjoin the following brief remarks, which could not so conveniently be introduced in any other part of the narrative.

Cowper was of the middle stature; he had a fine, open, and expressive countenance; that indicated much thoughtfulness, and almost excessive sensibility. His eyes were more remarkable for the expression of tenderness than of penetration. The general expression of his countenance partook of that sedate cheerfulness, which so strikingly characterizes all his original productions, and which never failed to impart a peculiar charm to his conversation. His limbs were more remarkable for strength than for delicacy of form. He possessed a warm temperament; and he says of himself, in a letter to his cousin Mrs. Bodham, dated February 27, 1790, that he was naturally "somewhat irritable," but, if he was, his religious principle had so subdued that tendency, that a near relation, who was intimately acquainted with him the last ten years of his life, never saw his temper ruffled in a single instance.

His manners were generally somewhat shy and reserved, particularly to strangers: when, however, he was in perfect health, and in such society as was quite congenial to his taste, they were perfectly free and unembarrassed; his conversation was unrestrained and cheerful, and his whole deportment was the most polite and graceful, especially to females, towards whom he conducted himself, on all occasions, with the strictest delicacy and propriety.

Much as Cowper was admired by those who knew him only as a writer, or as an occasional correspondent, he was infinitely more esteemed by his more intimate friends; indeed, the more intimately he was known, the more he was beloved and revered. Nor was this affectionate attachment so much the result of his brilliant talents, as it was of the real goodness of his disposition, and gentleness of his conduct.

Cowper was emphatically, in the strictest and most scriptural sense of the term, a good man. His goodness, however, was not the result of mere effort, unconnected with Christian principles, nor did it arise from the absence of those evil dispositions of which all have reason, more or less, to complain; on the contrary, all his writings prove that he felt and deplored the existence of evil affections, and was only able to suppress them by a cordial reception of the gospel of Christ, and the diligent use of those means enforced under that pure and self-denying dispensation. Nor was the goodness of Cowper a mere negative goodness, inducing him only to avoid doing evil; it is evident, from many passages, both from his poetic and prose productions, that he ever looked upon his talents, not as his own, but as belonging to Him from whom he had received them. Under the influence of this impression, all his best and most important original productions were unquestionably written. Desirous of communicating to his fellow-men the same invaluable benefits which he had himself received from the simple yet sublime truths of Christianity, and incapable of attempting it in any other way than that of becoming an author, he took up his pen and produced those unrivalled poems, which, while they delight the mere literary reader for their elegance, beauty, and sublimity, are no less interesting to the Christian for the accurate and striking delineations of real religion, with which they abound. As long as the English language exists, they will be most eagerly sought after, both by the scholar and by the Christian.

Cowper was warmly attached to the religion of the established church, in which he had been trained up, and which, like his friend Mr. Newton, he calmly and deliberately preferred to any other. His attachment, however, was not that of the narrow-minded bigot which blinds the mind to the excellencies of every other religious community; on the contrary, it was the attachment of the firm and steady friend of religious liberty, in the most liberal sense of the term. Of a sectarian spirit he was ever the open and avowed opponent. He sincerely and very highly respected the conscientious of all parties. In one of his letters to Mr. Newton, adverting to a passage in his writings that was likely to expose him to the charge of illiberality, he thus writes. "When I wrote the passage in question, I was not at all aware of any impropriety in it. I am, however, glad you have condemned it; and though I do not feel as if I could presently supply its place, shall be willing to attempt the task, whatever labour it may cost me; and rejoice that it will not be in the power of the critics, whatever else they may charge me with, to accuse me of bigotry, or a design to make a certain denomination odious at the hazard of the public peace. I had rather my book should be burnt, than a single line guilty of such a tendency should escape me."

Cowper's attainments as a scholar were highly respectable; he was master of four languages, besides his own: Greek, Latin, Italian, and French; and though his reading was by no means so extensive as that of some, it was turned to better account, as he was a most thoughtful and attentive reader, and it was undoubtedly amply sufficient for every purpose, with a genius so brilliant and a mind so original as his.

The productions of Cowper were eminently and entirely his own; he had neither borrowed from nor imitated any one. He copied from none either as to his subjects, or the manner of treating them. All was the creation of his own inventive genius. Adverting to this circumstance, in one of his letters, he thus writes:—"I reckon it among my principal advantages as a composer of verses that I have not read an English poet these thirteen years, and but one these twenty years. Imitation even of the best models is my aversion; it is a servile and mechanical trick, that has enabled many to usurp the name of author, who could not have written at all if they had not written upon the pattern of some original. But when the ear, and the taste have been much accustomed to the style and manner of others, it is almost impossible to avoid it, and we imitate, in spite of ourselves, just in the same proportion as we admire." Cowper's mode of expressing his thoughts was entirely original. His blank-verse is not the blank-verse of Milton, or of any other poet. His numbers, his pauses, his diction, are all of his own growth, without transcription, and without imitation. If he thinks in a peculiar train, it is always as a man of genius, and, what is better still, as a man of ardent and unaffected piety. His predecessors had circumscribed themselves, both in the choice and management of their subjects, by the observance of a limited number of models, who were thought to have exhausted all the legitimate resources of the art. "But Cowper," says a great modern critic, "at once ventured to cross this enchanted circle, and thus regained the natural liberty of invention, and walked abroad in the open field of observation as freely as those by whom it was originally trodden. He passed from the imitation of poets to the imitation of nature, and ventured boldly upon the representation of objects that none before him had imagined could be employed in poetic imagery. In the ordinary occupations, occurrences, and duties of domestic life, he found a multitude of subjects for ridicule and reflection, for pathetic and picturesque description, for moral declamation and devotional rapture, that would have been looked upon with disdain or despair by all his predecessors. He took as wide a range in language too, as in matter; and shaking off the tawdry incumbrance of that poetical diction which had nearly reduced poetry to a skilful collection of a set of appropriated phrases, he made no scruple to set down in verse every expression that would have been admitted in prose; and to take advantage of all the varieties and changes of which our language is susceptible."

It has been justly remarked, "that between the poetry of Cowper and that of Dryden and Pope, and some of their successors, there is an immense difference. It would be easy to show how little he owed to his immediate forerunners, and how much his immediate followers have been indebted to him. All the cant phrases, all the technicalities of the former school, he utterly threw away; and by his rejection of them, they became obsolete. He boldly adopted cadences of verse unattempted before, which, though frequently uncouth, and sometimes scarcely reducible to rhyme, were not seldom ingeniously significant and signally energetic. He feared not to employ colloquial, philosophical, judicial idioms, and forms of argument and illustration, which enlarged the vocabulary of poetical terms, less by recurring to obsolete ones, than by hazardous, and generally happy innovations of his own invention, which have since become dignified by usage; but which Pope and his imitators durst not have touched. The eminent adventurous revivers of English poetry, about thirty years ago, Southey, Wordsworth, and Coleridge, in their blank-verse, trode directly in the steps of Cowper; and, in their early productions at least, were each in a measure what he had made them. Cowper may be legitimately styled the father of this triumvirate, who are, in truth, the living fathers of an innumerable company of modern poets, whom no ingenuity can well classify and arrange."

The poetry of Cowper is in the highest degree deserving the honourable appellation of Christian Poetry. He consecrated his muse to the service of that pure and self-denying religion, taught by Christ and his apostles. In this respect his poems differed from the productions of any writers that had then appeared, with the exception of Milton and Young. Both these individuals, though they wrote on religious subjects, yet in all probability wrote principally for fame; with Cowper, however, the desire of doing good predominated over every other feeling; and the hope of emolument, nay, even the love of fame itself, was looked upon as subordinate to this great object, the last to which poets generally pay any consideration. To YOUNG, Cowper was evidently superior, in everything that constitutes real poetic excellence; and equal to MILTON in the ease and elegance of his compositions, and in the vivacity and beauty of his imagery, though seldom, and perhaps never, rising to that majestic sublimity to which the author of Paradise Lost sometimes soared, and in which he stands unrivalled among modern, if not among ancient poets. Milton's matchless poem is a most sublime description of the great facts of the Christian system; every line of it fills the reader with surprise. Hurried on through a profusion of imagery splendid and grand, and never inelegant, tawdry or ungraceful, the mind becomes astonished, and is much more powerfully affected than the heart. We look in vain for those touching appeals to the affections with which Cowper's poetry abounds, which come home to the bosoms and hearts of all.

"Poet and Saint, to him is justly given,
The two most sacred names of earth and heaven."

In the productions of Milton and Young, there is not much of practical, and still less of experimental, piety. They confined themselves chiefly to the theory of religion. Cowper, on the contrary, whose views of the great leading truths of Christianity were equally, if not more comprehensive, describes, with unequalled simplicity and beauty, those less splendid, but not less useful, parts of religion, which his predecessors had left almost untouched: hence the superiority of his muse to theirs in these respects. No uninspired orator ever so happily and so strikingly described the operations of Divine grace upon the human soul. The gospel had come home to him, not in word only, but in demonstration of the Spirit, and in power. He not only possessed a comprehensive knowledge of the Christian system, which enabled him, whenever he had occasion for it, to describe and illustrate, with all the force and beauty of poetic enchantment, that solid foundation on which the Christian builds his hopes, but he had himself felt the astonishing efficacy of these truths on the heart, when truly and cordially received. This accounts for the unrivalled felicity with which he describes the happy influence of Christianity in all cases where it is rightly embraced, unless, as in his own case, its influence be prevented by some unaccountable bodily distemper. Treating the great peculiarities of the Christian system—the depravity of man—the necessity of regeneration—the efficacy of the atonement—access to God, through the Divine Spirit—justification by faith, with others of a like kind, not merely as subjects of inquiry, but as things which had been to him matters of actual experience, it is no wonder that his muse sometimes carried him to a depth of Christian feeling, unsung, and even unattempted before. As he himself, in his poem on Charity, beautifully sings—

> "When one that holds communion with the skies
> Has fill'd his urn, where these pure waters rise,
> And once more mingles with us meaner things,
> 'Tis e'n as if an angel shook his wings;
> Immortal fragrance fills the circuit wide,
> That tells us whence his treasures are supplied."

"Cowper," as Mr. Hayley justly observes, "accomplished, as a poet, the sublimest object of ambition,—he has dissipated the general prejudice that held it hardly possible for a modern author to succeed in sacred poetry. He has proved that verse and devotion are natural allies. He has shown that true poetical genius cannot be more honourably or more delightfully employed than in diffusing through the heart and mind of man a filial affection for his Maker, with a firm and cheerful trust in his word. He has sung in a strain, in some degree at least equal to the great subject, the blessed advent of the Messiah; and perhaps it will not be saying too much, to assert that his poetry will have no inconsiderable influence in preparing the world for the cordial reception of all the rich blessings which this event was intended to introduce."

Up to the period when Cowper's productions were given to the world, it was foolishly imagined impossible successfully to employ the graces and beauties of poetry on the side of virtue. A great modern critic had inconsiderately declared that "contemplative piety cannot be poetical." Had he asserted only, that it had very rarely been so, the assertion would not have been unjust. It would, indeed, have coincided with the views entertained by Cowper himself; for, of his predecessors' productions, with few exceptions, no one could have formed a more correct opinion, as will appear by the following lines:

> "Pity religion has so seldom found
> A skilful guide into poetic ground!
> The flowers would spring where'er she deigned to stray,
> And every muse attend her in her way.
> Virtue indeed meets many a rhyming friend,
> And many a compliment politely penned;
> But unattired in that becoming vest
> Religion weaves for her, and half undressed,
> Stands in the desert, shivering and forlorn,
> A wintry figure, like a withered thorn."

This censure, severely as it may fall on most of Cowper's predecessors, is not unjust. His muse, however, was the first to show that poetry, may be made the handmaid to religion. When he gave to the world the productions of his unrivalled pen, they saw, indeed, > ——————————"a bard all fire,

> Touched with a coal from heaven, assume the lyre,
> And tell the world, still kindling as he sung,
> With more than mortal music on his tongue,
> That he who died below, and reigns above,
> Inspires the song, and that his name was love."

Cowper's religious sentiments were undoubtedly Calvinistic, and though his views of divine truth were generally unexceptionable, they were sometimes rather strongly tinged with the peculiarities of that system. On no occasion, however, that comes within our recollection, do we find him speaking of the character of God in such terms as would lead any, who were sincerely desirous of approaching Him in the way of his own appointment, to doubt of gracious reception at his hands. His own case, indeed, must be excepted, as his melancholy depression ever led him to regard himself as a solitary instance of the rejection of God and of the reversal of his decree. It could seldom, if ever, be inferred from any of his representations, that he thought the Divine Being, by the mere exercise of his sovereignty, continued any of his creatures, except, indeed, it were himself, in a state of suffering in the present life, or placed them beyond the means of escaping from misery, in the future. His views of the atonement and of the infinite extent of its efficacy, were such as led him, whenever he had occasion to advert to it, to represent it truly, as a solid ground of hope and comfort, to every converted sinner, whatever might have been his character. He felt an entire conviction that he whose infinite compassion had prompted him to make provision for the restoration of fallen man to his favour, intended it to be universally beneficial; and that the perverseness and obstinacy of men were the only reasons why it was not so. That he should have regarded his own case as an exception, and should, consequently, have passed the greater part of his life in the bitterness of despair, is a difficulty which we are persuaded will, in the present life, for ever remain unaccounted for. To assert, as some have done, on no other foundation than that of mere opinion, that had he not been religious he would never have been melancholy, is utterly at variance with all the leading facts of his history. To every well regulated mind it will be abundantly evident, that whatever reasons may be assigned for the affecting peculiarity of his case, the deep concern he felt for religion could never have been the cause. On the contrary, it will appear clearly to have been much more likely to become the best preventive, as, in fact, the events of his life prove it to have been, though, owing to some unaccountable organic conformation, much less completely than might have been hoped.

No person was ever more alive to the benefits of real friendship, or had ever formed more correct conceptions of its obligations and delights. His inimitable stanzas, on this most interesting subject, which are perhaps superior to anything that has ever been written upon it, prove incontestibly that he understood what were its indispensable prerequisites, and his whole conduct through life shows that he felt the full force of that friendship which he so admirably described. It is difficult to make extracts from a poem, every line of which is almost alike excellent, we cannot, however, deny ourselves the pleasure of presenting our readers with the following admirable lines:—

> "Who hopes a friend, should have a heart
> Himself, well furnished for the part
>   And ready on occasion,
> To show the virtue that he seeks;
> For 'tis an union that bespeaks
>   A just reciprocation.
> A man renowned for repartee
> Will seldom scruple to make free
>   With friendship's finest feeling;
> Will thrust a dagger at your breast,
> And tell you 'twas a special jest,
>   By way of balm for healing.
> Beware of tatlers! keep your ear
> Close stopt against the tales they bear,
>   Fruits of their own invention!
> The separation of chief friends
> Is what their business most intends,
>   Their sport is your dissension.
> Religion should extinguish strife,
> And make a calm of human life:
>   But even those who differ
> Only on topics left at large,
> How fiercely will they meet, and charge;
>   No combatants are stiffer.
> Then judge, before you choose your man,
> As circumspectly as you can;
>   And having made election,
> See that no disrespect of yours,
> Such as a friend but ill endures,
>   Enfeeble his affection.
> As similarity of mind,
> Or something not to be defined,
>   First rivets our attention;
> So manners decent and polite,
> The same we practised at first sight,
>   Must save it from declension.
> The man who hails you Tom, or Jack,
> And proves, by thumping on your back,
>   His sense of your great merit;
> Is such a friend, that one had need
> Be very much his friend indeed,
>   To pardon, or to bear it.
> Some friends make this their prudent plan,
> Say little, and hear all you can;
>   Safe policy, but hateful!
> So barren sands imbibe the shower,
> But render neither fruit nor flower
>   Unpleasant and ungrateful.
> They whisper trivial things, and small;
> But to communicate at all
>   Things serious, deem improper.

Their feculence and froth they show,
But keep their best contents below,
Just like a simmering copper.

Pursue the theme, and you will find
A disciplin'd and furnish'd mind
To be at least expedient;
And, after summing all the rest,
Religion ruling in the breast,
A principal ingredient.

True friendship has, in short, a grace,
More than terrestrial in its face,
That proves it heav'n-descended:
Man's love of woman not so pure,
Nor when sincerest, so secure,
To last till life is ended."

Cowper was, through life, the warm, though not the blind admirer of the British constitution; and though he made no pretensions to the character of a politician, yet he took the liveliest interest in all that related to the honour and prosperity of his country. In one of his letters to Mr. Newton, he thus writes:—"I learned when I was a boy, being the son of a staunch Whig, and a man that loved his country, to glow with that patriotic enthusiasm which is apt to break forth into poetry, or at least to prompt a person, if he has any inclination that way, to poetical endeavours. After I was grown up, and while I lived in the Temple, I produced several halfpenny ballads, two or three of which had the honour of being popular. But unhappily, the ardour I felt upon the occasion, disdaining to be confined within the bounds of fact, pushed me upon uniting the prophetical with the poetical character, and defeated its own purpose. I am glad it did. The less there is of this sort in my productions the better. The stage of national affairs is such a fluctuating scene, that an event which seems probable to-day becomes impossible to-morrow; and unless a man were indeed a prophet, he cannot, but with the greatest hazard of losing his labour, bestow his rhymes upon future contingencies, which perhaps are never to take place, but in his own wishes and in the reveries of his own fancy."

The time which Cowper bestowed upon his translation of Homer, and the indefatigable diligence with which he laboured in this great work, notwithstanding his melancholy depression, until he had completed it, prove that he was not easily to be diverted from what he had once undertaken; and that few men were equal, and perhaps none superior, to him, in those essential qualities of a truly great mind,—industry and perseverance.

It might be imagined that Cowper's very retired manner of life, had deprived him of that manly independence of mind, which is a prime constituent in the character of every great man. Several incidents, however, are related of him, which go to prove that such was very far from being the case. His conduct to Mr. Unwin and Mr. Newton, who both in their turns, at different times, thought themselves entitled to complain of some neglect, proves that he allowed not the affection of friendship to intrench upon his right to judge at all times for himself. Alluding to Mr. Newton's displeasure, he remarks to another friend:—"If he says more on the subject, I shall speak freely, and perhaps please him less than I have already done." Almost in the same breath, however, evincing his deep knowledge of human nature, he adds:—"But we shall jumble together again, as people, who have an affection for each other at the bottom, never fail to do." On one occasion, some friend having remarked to Cowper, that he knew a person who wished to see a sample of his verse, before subscribing for his edition of Homer, he replied,—"that when he dealt in wine, or cloth, or cheese, he would give samples, but of verse never." The same independence he evinced on another occasion, writing to the friend whom he had employed to negotiate for the publication of his second volume of poetry, he remarks:—"If Johnson should stroke his chin, look up to the ceiling, and cry nymph! anticipate him, I beseech you, at once, by saying, that you know I should be very sorry he should undertake for me to his own disadvantage, or that my volume should be in any degree pressed upon him."

The depressive malady under which Cowper laboured through the greater part of his life, might naturally be supposed to have disqualified him entirely for the kind office of comforting those who were in distress: in truth, however, no one had better learned the divine skill of strengthening the weak mind, of encouraging the timid and trembling believer, of lifting up the weak hands that were hanging down, wiping the tear of sorrow from the mournful eye, and directing the Christian to look alone to heaven for support in all his difficulties. His poems abound with passages the most tender and consolatory; enforcing with an eloquence, persuasive and almost irresistible, humble submission to the Divine will, in circumstances the most discouraging. The following lines, forming part of a poetic epistle to a lady in France, show how admirably he could pour the healing oil of comfort into the wounded spirits of others, though he was unable to assuage the grief of his own.

"The path of sorrow, and that path alone,
Leads to the land where sorrow is unknown;
No trav'ller ever reached that blessed abode
Who found not thorns and briars on the road.
The world may dance along the flowery plain,
Cheer'd as they go by many a sprightly strain.

* * * * * * *

But He, who knew what human hearts would prove
How slow to learn the dictates of his love;
That hard by nature, and of stubborn will,
A life of ease would make them harder still;
In pity to a chosen few, designed
To escape the common ruin of their kind,
And said—Go spend them in the vale of tears!
Oh balmy gales of soul-reviving air,
Oh salutary streams that murmur there,
These flowing from the fount of grace above!
Those breathed from lips of everlasting love!
The flinty soil indeed their feet annoys,
Chill blasts of trouble nip their springing joys,
An envious world will interpose its frown,
To mar delights superior to its own,
And many a pang, experienced still within,
Reminds them of their hated inmate, sin!
But ills of every shape, of every name,
Transformed to blessings, miss their cruel aim,
And every moment's calm that soothes the breast,
Is given in earnest to eternal rest.
Ah! be not sad! although thy lot be cast
Far from the flock, and in a boundless waste;
No shepherd's tents within thy view appear,
But the Chief Shepherd even there is near.
Thy tender sorrows and thy plaintive strain
Flow in a foreign land, but not in vain;
Thy tears all issue from a source divine,
And every drop bespeaks a Saviour thine."

Notwithstanding the almost unmitigated severity of Cowper's sufferings, there were seasons in which he enjoyed some internal tranquillity, and was enabled to exercise a trembling, if not an unshaken confidence in the Almighty. It was undoubtedly on one of these occasions that he penned the following lines—

"I see, or think I see,
A glimmering from afar—
A beam of day that shines for me
To save me from despair.
Forerunner of the sun,
It marks the pilgrim's way:
I'll gaze upon it while I run,
And watch the rising day."

Had it not been for Cowper's depressive malady, he would certainly have been, on all occasions, the most lively and agreeable companion. Even as it was, it must not be imagined that in his conversation he was never sprightly and cheerful. Frequently, when his own heart was suffused with grief, arising from the severity and peculiarity of his malady, such an air of innocent pleasantry and humour, delicate and perfectly natural, ran through his conversation and correspondence, as could not fail to delight all who happened to be in his company, or who were occasionally favoured with the productions of his pen. It would be easy to produce proofs of this, both from his poetic and prose productions. His rhyming letter, to Mr. Newton, in which there is such a happy mixture of the grave and the gay, as no other writer could produce, evinces the occasional sprightliness of of his mind.—"My very dear friend, I am going to send, what, when you have read, you may scratch your head, and say, I suppose there's nobody knows, whether what I have got, be verse or not; by the tune and the time, it ought to be rhyme, but if it be, did ever you see, of late or yore, such a ditty before?

"I have writ charity, not for popularity, but as well as I could, in hopes to do good; and if the reviewer, should say, to be sure, the gentleman's muse, wears Methodist shoes, you may know by her pace, and talk about grace, that she and her bard, have little regard, for taste and fashions, and ruling passions, and hoydening play, of the modern day; and though she assume a borrowed plume, and now and then wear a tittering air, 'tis only her plan to catch if she can, the giddy and gay, as they go that way, by a production on a new construction; she has baited her trap, in hopes to snap, all that may come, with a sugar-plum.—His opinion in this will not be amiss; 'tis what I intend, my principal end, and if I succeed, and folks should read till a few are brought to a serious thought, I shall think I am paid, for all I have said, and all I have done, though I have run, many a time, after a rhyme, as far as from hence, to the end of my sense, and by hook or by crook, write another book, if I live and am here another year.

"I have heard before, of a room with a floor, laid upon springs, and such like things, with so much art, in every part, that when you went in, you were forced to begin a minuet pace, with an air and a grace, swimming about, now in and now out, with a deal of state, in a figure of eight, without pipe or string, or any such thing; and now I have writ, in a rhyming fit, what will make you dance, and as you advance, will keep you still, though against your will, dancing away, alert and gay, till you come to an end, of what I have penned, which that you may do, ere madam and you, are quite worn out, with jigling about, I take my leave, and here you receive, a bow profound, down to the ground, from your humble me, W. C."

The following jeu d' esprit, written by the poet, as descriptive of one of his rural excursions, through the whole of which runs a strain of pleasantry, innocent, and perfectly natural, shows that his life was not one unbroken series of despair, but that he enjoyed, occasionally, at least, some lucid intervals, when, to gratify his friends, he would trifle in rhyme with an affectionate and endearing gaiety. As it has never been published in any of his works, the reader will not regret its having a place here.

I sing of a journey to Clifton,*
We would have performed if we could;
Without cart or barrow to lift on Poor Mary or me through the mud.
Sle, sla, slud,
Stuck in the mud,
Oh, it is pretty to wade through a flood.

So away we went slipping and sliding,
Hop, hop,—a la mode de deux frogs;
'Tis near as good walking as riding,
When ladies are dressed in their clogs.
Wheels no doubt,
Go briskly about,
But they clatter, and rattle, and make such a rout.

DIALOGUE.

SHE.

"Well—now I protest it is charming,
How finely the weather improves;
That cloud, though, is rather alarming,
How slowly and stately it moves."

HE.

"Pshaw! never mind,
'Tis not in the wind,
We are travelling south and shall leave it behind."

SHE.

"I am glad we are come for an airing,
For folks may be pounded and penn'd,
Until they grow rusty, not caring
To stir half a mile to an end."

HE.

"The longer we stay,
The longer we may;
It 's a folly to think about weather or way."

SHE.

"But now I begin to be frighted,
If I fall what a way I should roll!
I am glad the bridge was indicted,
Stay! stop! I am sunk in a hole."

HE.

"Nay, never care,
'Tis a common affair;
You 'll not be the last that will set a foot there."

SHE.

"Let me breathe now a little and ponder,
On what it were better to do;
That terrible lane I see yonder,
I think we shall never get through."

HE.

"So think I,—
But by the bye,
We shall never know, if we never should try."

SHE.

"But should we get there, how shall we get home;
What a terrible deal of bad road we have pass'd,
Slipping and sliding; and if we should come
To a difficult state, I am ruined at last.
Oh, this lane!
Now it is plain,
That struggling and striving is labour in vain."

HE.

"Stick fast there, while I go and look."

SHE.

"Don't go away for fear I should fall;"

HE.

"I have examined it every nook,
And what you have here is a sample of all:
Come wheel around,
The dirt we have found,
Would by an estate at a farthing a pound."

Now sister Ann,* the guitar you must take,
Set it and sing it, and make it a song;
I have varied the verse for variety's sake,
And cut it off short because it was long.
'Tis hobbling and lame,
Which critics won't blame,
For the sense and the sound they say should be the same.

As a writer, Cowper's powers of description, both in poetry and prose, were of the highest order; equalled by few, and excelled by none. His richly cultivated mind, united to an imagination as brilliant as it was chaste, enabled him to paint the visible beauties of the material, as well as the ideal charms of the moral world, with an ease and felicity equally delightful. No one could describe the feelings of the heart with more vivid force, or knew better how to levy contributions on the rich and varied scenes of nature. He possessed all the requisite qualifications for a poet of the highest class;—a familiar acquaintance with the ancient classics; a comprehensive mind, well stored with accurate information on almost every subject; a fertile genius; a rich fancy; an excursive, but chaste imagination to all which were added, an extensive knowledge of the varied feelings of the human heart, and a most devout regard to the solemn claims of religion.

To take a comprehensive review of the poet's original productions, in the order in which they appeared, would require a much greater space than it would be prudent to devote to it here. TABLE TALK is a dialogue, carried on with uncommon spirit and vivacity, in which a variety of most interesting topics are happily introduced and descanted on with great force and beauty. The PROGRESS OF ERROR is much more serious than its predecessor; and though it contains passages of unrivalled excellence, it exhibits occasional marks of weakness, and is less beautiful than any other in the volume.

TRUTH exhibits a wonderful combination of different powers, in which passages, humorous and affecting, are scattered with delightful profusion.

EXPOSTULATION, founded on a sermon by Mr. Newton, is an impassioned appeal to men, in almost all conditions, on behalf of religion; it abounds with imagery, grand, impressive, and awful, exhibiting proofs of the poet's deep acquaintance with the inspired prophetic records. HOPE is less impassioned than its predecessor, but not less beautiful. It is written throughout with great elegance, beauty, and force, and the sentiments it breathes are purely evangelical. Charity is a poem of less vigour, but equally instructive, admonitory, and delightful.

* A village near Olney.

* Lady Austen.

In Conversation, the poet appears in the character of a teacher of manners, as well as of morals, and delineates with exquisite and unerring skill, many of the follies and frailties of life. The loquacious—the incommunicative—the noisy and tumultuous—the disputatious—the scrupulous and irresolute—the furious and intractable—the ludicrous—the censorious—the peevish—the bashful—with others of similar kind, may here find their character drawn by the pen of a master, in the liveliest colours, and with striking accuracy.

Many excellent and judicious remarks are to be found in this admirable poem, on the manner in which conversation, to make it really edifying, must be carried on; and the certain benefits resulting from it, where it is so conducted, are forcibly and clearly pointed out.

Retirement, will be read with delight by all, but especially by those who are looking forward to that season when—

"Hackney'd in business, wearied at that oar,
Which thousands, once fast chain'd to, quit no more,
But which, when life at ebb runs weak and low,
All wish, or seem to wish, they could forego."

The poet happily ridicules the fallacy of supposing it impossible to be pious while following the active pursuits of life,

"Truth is not local, God alike pervades
And fills the world of traffic and the shades,
And may be fear'd amidst the busiest scenes,
Or scorn'd where business never intervenes."

In the same happy strain he exposes the absurdity of seeking retirement as an excuse for indolence.

"An idler is a watch that wants both hands,
As useless as it goes as when it stands.

* * * * *

Absence of occupation is not rest;
A mind quite vacant is a mind distrest."

The Task, however, is by far the poet's greatest production, and had he written nothing else, would have immortalized his name, and given him a place among the highest class of poets. Here his muse kindled into its happiest inspirations, and burst forth into its sublimest strains. Commencing with objects the most familiar, and in a manner inimitably playful, the poet touches on a vast variety of subjects, many of them unsung, and unattempted before, scattering wherever he goes an exuberance of beauty and elegance, that enchains the reader, carrying him through the muse's adventurous track, without the least restraint, and without feeling a moment's uneasiness. The transitions are the happiest imaginable; after delineating one object with matchless felicity and force, presenting it in shapes almost endlessly diversified, ere he is aware of it, another and another starts up before the reader, with magical effect, but without the slightest confusion, or the least violation of perspicuity. This admirable poem may be repeatedly read with increasing delight. It yields an almost inexhaustible source of pleasure and instruction. The reader rises from its perusal, not only filled with astonishment at the mighty powers of its author, but what is of equal, and perhaps of greater importance, with feelings of the most unfeigned esteem for the poet, and with sentiments of benevolence towards all mankind.

"From grave to gay, from lively to severe,"

The letters of Cowper are unquestionably among the best productions of this interesting class of writings that are to be found in the English language. Easy and natural, and everywhere simple and elegant, without the slightest affectation of formality, or the most distant approach to that studied and artificial style, which invariably destroys the beauty of such productions, they never fail to interest and delight the reader; and will ever be regarded as perfect models of epistolary correspondence. Their peculiar charm is, perhaps, to be attributed chiefly, if not entirely, to that affectionate glow of pure friendship, by which they are so pre-eminently distinguished. Fascinating as they are to every reader of taste, for the chaste, yet unornamented style in which they are composed; for their easy and natural transitions; and for their concise, yet sufficiently copious descriptions, it is to that sprightly and genuine affection which runs through the whole of them, causing the reader to peruse them with almost as much interest as if they were addressed to him personally, that they are principally indebted for their claim to superiority.

To the above remarks on Cowper's letters, we have great pleasure in adding the following testimony of the late distinguished scholar and writer, the Rev. Robert Hall of Bristol, whose eloquence was unrivalled, and whose powers being all consecrated to the cause of religion, rendered him an ornament to the age in which he lived. In a letter to Rev. J. Johnson, Cowper's justly esteemed relative, he thus writes: "It is quite unnecessary to say that I perused the letters with great admiration and delight. I have always considered the letters of Mr. Cowper as the finest specimens of the epistolary style in our language. To an air of inimitable ease and carelessness, they unite a high degree of correctness, such as could result only from the clearest intellect, combined with the most finished taste. I have scarcely found a single word which is capable of being exchanged for a better. Literary errors I can discern none. The selection of the words, and the structure of the periods, are inimitable; they present as striking a contrast as can well be conceived, to the turgid verbosity which passes at present for fine writing, and which bears a great resemblance to the degeneracy which marks the style of Ammianus Marcellinus, as compared to that of Cicero or Livy. A perpetual effort and struggle is made to supply the place of vigour; garish and dazzling colours are substituted for chaste ornament; and the hideous distortions of weakness for native strength. In my humble opinion, the study of Cowper's prose may, on this account, be asiousefu in forming the taste of young people as his poetry."

Poets have almost invariably been charged with adulation, whenever they have ventured to eulogize an individual, however much he may have been distinguished by his virtues and his talents. In many cases, they have undoubted richly merited this censure; but there are some honourable exceptions, and amonst this class Cowper is pre-eminently distinguished. Of this wicked and foolish practice he had the utmost abhorrence; and in some instances it may be doubted whether he did not carry his aversion to flattery, almost to an opposite extreme; withholding praise where he knew it was due. The following lines occur almost at the commencement of his Table Talk. After painting the portrait of that most virtuous monarch, George the Third, in language as just as it is beautiful, he abruptly exclaims,

"Guard what you say; the patriotic tribe
Will sneer, and charge you with a bribe—a bribe!
The worth of his three kingdoms I defy
To lure me to the baseness of a lie:
And of all lies, (be that one poet's boast,)
The lie that flatters, I abhor the most."

In the character of Cowper there was not the slighest particle of ostentation; on no occasion did he assume any airs of consequence; he never aimed, or wished to be what he was not. Everything in the shape of affectation was the object of his disgust. He loved simplicity without rudeness, and detested that squeamish mimicry of fine feeling which not unfrequently, either under the assumed garb of superior sanctity, or of ardent friendship, conceals the most pitiable imbecility and ignorance.

It must be acknowledged that Cowper sometimes dipped his pen in gall. Some expressions the most bitterly sarcastic are to be found in his poems. Of his first volume it was said, by one of his friends, "There are many passages delicate, many sublime, many beautiful, many tender, many sweet, and many acrimonious." Cowper's satire, however, though keen and powerful as a whip of scorpions, was employed only to expose and punish the openly profligate, and the hypocritical professors of religion. Everything in the shape of deception he ever held in perfect detestation. The castigation of vice, of ignorance, or of dissimulation, was his object, when he became a satirist. If he held up philosophy to ridicule, it was that glare of false philosophy, which, instead of being beneficial to men, only led them from the plain and beaten track of truth, into paths of error and misery. He never wantonly, for the sake only of his own gratification, inflicted his satiric lash on a single individual. He became a satirist, not to give vent to a waspish, revengeful, and malicious disposition, (to feelings of this kind he was an entire stranger,) but for the same purpose as the holy prophets of old were satirists to expose, in mercy to mankind, the hideous deformity of those vices, which have ever been the fruitful parents of misery to mankind.

The exquisite sensibility of Cowper, and the real goodness of his disposition, with his entire abhorrence of cruelty, whether practised by man towards his own species, or towards any part of the Creator's works, are evinced by the following striking lines.

"I would not enter on my list of friends,
Though graced with polished manners and fine sense,
Yet wanting sensibility, the man
Who needlessly sets foot upon a worm.
An inadvertant step may crush the snail
That crawls at evening in the public path;
But he that has humanity, forewarned,
Will tread aside, and let the reptile live.
Ye, therefore, who love mercy, teach your sons
To love it too. The spring-time of our years
Is soon dishonoured and defiled in most
By budding ills, that ask a prudent hand
To check them. But, alas! none sooner shoots,
If unrestrained, into luxuriant growth
Than cruelty, most devilish of them all!
Mercy, to him that shows it, is the rule
And righteous limitation of its art,
By which Heaven moves in pardoning guilty man;
And he that shows none, being ripe in years,
And conscious of the outrage he commits,
Shall seek it, and not find it, in his turn.
Distinguished much by reason, and still more
By our capacity of grace divine,
From creatures that exist but for our sake,
Which, having served us, perish, we are held
Accountable: and God, some future day,
Will reckon with us roundly for the abuse
Of what he deems no mean or trivial trust!

Liberty has always been the soul-inspiring theme of poets. On no subject has the muse sung in sweeter strains, or towered to more sublime heights. Cowper has given ample proofs that his muse felt all the fire of this ennobling theme. In his Table Talk, some beautiful lines will be found on this interesting subject, so dear to the heart of every Englishman; but in his most masterly production, the Task, he thus sings—

"'Tis liberty alone that gives the flower
Of fleeting life its lustre and perfume;
And we are weeds without it. All constraint
Except what wisdom lays on evil men,
Is evil: hurts the faculties, impedes
Their progress in the road of science; blinds
The eyesight of discovery; and begets
In those that suffer it a sordid mind,—
Bestial—a meagre intellect, unfit
To be the tenant of man's noble form.
Thee, therefore, still, blameworthy as thou art,
Thee I account still happy, and the chief
Among the nations, seeing thou art free,
My native nook of earth! Thy clime is rude,
Replete with vapours, and disposes much
All hearts to sadness, and none more than mine;
Yet, being free, I love thee for the sake
Of that one feature, can be well content,
Disgraced as thou hast been, poor as thou art,
To seek no sublunary rest beside.
But once enslaved, farewell. I could endure
Chains nowhere patiently; and chains at home,
Where I am free by birthright, not at all!"

The liberty of Cowper was not, however, that lawless restraint which, under the sacred name of liberty, would burst asunder all those bands that hold society together, and introduce confusion infinitely more to be dreaded than the most absolute despotism. It was not the wild and unrestrained liberty of the ferocious mob; it was the liberty that is compatible with wholesome restraint, and with the due administration of law. It was the liberty not of disorder but of discipline, as will be seen by the following beautiful lines—

"Let Discipline employ her wholesome arts;
Let magistrates alert perform their parts,
Not skulk, or put on a prudential mask,
As if their duty was a desperate task.
Let active laws apply the needful curb,
To guard the peace that riot would disturb;
And liberty, preserved from wild excess,
Shall raise no feuds for armies to suppress.
When Tumult lately burst his prison door,
And set plebeian thousands in a roar,
When he usurped Authority's just place,
And dared to look his master in the face;
When the rude rabble's watch-word was—'Destroy!'
And blazing London seemed a second Troy!
Liberty blushed, and hung her drooping head—
Beheld their progress with the deepest dread;
Blushed that effects like these she could produce,
Worse than the deeds of galley-slaves let loose;
She loses in such storms her very name,
And fierce Licentiousness should bear the blame!"

Powerful as were the charms of subjects like these to Cowper, there were others of a different character which he held as more dear, and ever regarded as more important. Like his great predecessor, Milton, he had made the sacred scriptures his constant study; not so much because he admired the sublime imagery of the holy penmen, (alive as he was to their beauties in this respect,) as because he felt the full force of divine truth upon his heart; which, notwithstanding the severe pressure of his malady, would sometimes yield him an interval of pleasure. It was undoubtedly on one of these happy occasions that he penned the following lines, so strikingly descriptive of the refined pleasure with which the Christian can view the works of nature.

"He looks abroad into the varied field
Of nature; and though poor, perhaps, compared
With those whose mansions glitter in his sight,
Calls the delighful scenery all his own:
His are the mountains, and the valleys his,
And the resplendent rivers: his to enjoy
With a propriety that none can feel,
But who, with filial confidence inspired,
Can lift to heaven an unpresumptuous eye,
And smiling say—My Father made them all!
Are they not his by a peculiar right?
And by an emphasis of interest his
Whose eyes they fill with tears of holy joy;
Whose heart with praise, and whose exalted mind
With worthy thoughts of that unwearied love
That planned, and built, and still upholds a world
So clothed with beauty for rebellious man?
Yes! Ye may fill your garners, ye that reap
The loaded soil; and ye may waste much good
In senseless riot; but ye will not find
In feast, or in the chase, in song or dance,
A liberty like his, who, unimpeached
Of usurpation, and to no man's wrong
Appropriates nature as his Father's work,
And has a richer use of yours than you."

Although Cowper, towards the close of his life, before he received his Majesty's pension, owing to the heavy expenses occasioned by his own and Mrs. Unwin's illness, was scarcely able to keep his expenditure within the limits of his income, yet he was never once heard to complain, nor even to indulge the slightest disposition to be otherwise than contented in the station where Providence had placed him. Writing to his intimate friend, Mr. Hill, on one occasion, whom he appears to have made his treasurer, he remarks:—"Your tidings respecting the slender pittance yet to come, are, as you observe, of a melancholy cast. Not being gifted, however, by nature with the means of acquiring much, it is well that she has given me a disposition to be contented with little. I have now been so many years habituated to small matters, that I should probably find myself incommoded by greater, and, may I but be enabled to shift, as I have been hitherto, unsatisfied wishes will not trouble me much."

On another occasion, to the same individual he writes:—"I suppose you are sometimes troubled on my account, but you need not. I have no doubt that it will be seen, when my days are closed, that I served a Master who would not suffer me to want anything that was good for me. He said to Jacob, 'I will surely do thee good;' and this he said not for his sake only, but for ours also, if we trust in him. This thought relieves me from the greatest part of the distress I should else suffer in my present circumstances, and enables me to sit down peacefully upon the wreck of my fortune." The same sentiment is still more forcibly expressed in the following lines:—

"Fair is the lot that's cast for me;
I have an Advocate with Thee:

They whom the world caresses most
Have no such privilege to boast.
Poor though I am, despised, forgot,
Yet God, my God, forgets me not;
And he is safe, and must succeed,
For whom the Lord vouchsafes to plead."

Perhaps no individual ever felt more fully the power of religion in his heart, or embodied it more completely in his life, than Cowper. The apprehensions, for his ultimate safety, by which he was so continually harassed, depressive as was their influence on his mind, never relaxed, in any degree, that severe watchfulness which religion had taught him to exercise over his thoughts and conduct. On the contrary, they seem rather to have operated as a continual check upon those corrupt inclinations which are common to our fallen nature; and to which, even Cowper, was not a stranger. It would be ridiculous to say he had no imperfections; he felt them; he often mourned over them, and the vivid perception he had of them, associated, as it invariably was, with a powerful constitutional tendency to melancholy, often filled him with the greatest anxiety and dread. His conceptions of the purity of that sublime religion taught us in the gospel, and of the paramount importance of a holy life in its professors, were such as led him to regard the least deviation from the strict line of christian duty, in his own case at least, as an entire disqualification for the reception of spiritual comfort. No individual's conscience was ever more tremblingly alive to the importance of habitual watchfulness and uniform consistency of conduct. He could make ample allowances for the imperfections of others, but nothing could prevail upon him to make any for his own.

The notice we have already taken of Cowper's productions, renders it unnecessary that we should view them any further in detail. We cannot, however, suppress the following admirable observations of an anonymous critic, subjoined to Mr. Hayley's life of Cowper. "The noblest benefits and delights of poetry can be but rarely produced, because all the requisites for producing them so seldom meet. A vivid mind and happy imitative power, may enable a poet to form glowing pictures of virtue, and almost produce in himself a short-lived enthusiasm of goodness. But although even these transient and factitious movements of mind may serve to produce grand and delightful effusions of poetry, yet when the best of these are compared with the poetic productions of a genuine lover of virtue, a discerning judgment will scarcely fail to mark the difference. A simplicity of conception and expression; a conscious and therefore unaffected dignity; an instinctive adherence to sober reason, even amid the highest flights; an uniform justness and consistency of thought; a glowing, yet temperate ardour of feeling; a peculiar felicity, both in the choice and combination of terms, by which even the plainest words acquire the truest character of eloquence, and which is rarely to be found except where a subject is not only intimately known, but cordially loved; these, I conceive, are the features peculiar to the real votary of virtue, and which must of course give to his strains a perfection of effect never to be attained by the poet of inferior moral endowments. I believe it will be granted that all these qualities were never more perfectly combined than in the poetry of Milton. And I think, too, there will be little doubt that the next to him, in every one of these instances, beyond all comparison, is Cowper. The genius of the latter did certainly not lead him to emulate the songs of the Seraphim. But though he pursues a lower walk of poetry than his great master, he appears no less the enraptured votary of pure unmixed goodness. Nay, perhaps he may in this one respect possess some peculiar excellences which may make him seem more the bard of Christianity. That divine religion infinitely exalts, but it also deeply humbles the mind it inspires. It gives majesty to the thoughts, but it impresses meekness on the manners, and diffuses tenderness through the feelings. It combines sensibility and fortitude, the lowliness of the child, and the magnanimity of the hero."

"The grandest features of the Christian character were never more gloriously exemplified than in that spirit which animates the whole of Milton's poetry. His own Michael does not impress us with the idea of a purer, or more awful virtue than that which we feel in every portion of his majestic verse; and he no less happily indicates the source from which his excellence was derived, by the bright beams which he ever and anon reflects upon us from the sacred Scriptures. But the milder graces of the gospel are certainly less apparent. What we behold is so awful, it might almost have inspired a wish, that a spirit, equally pure and heavenly, might be raised to illustrate, with like felicity, the more attractive and gentler influences of our divine religion. In Cowper, above any poet that ever lived, would such a wish seem to be fulfilled. In his charming effusions we have the same spotless purity, the same elevated devotion, the same vital exercise of every noble and exalted quality of the mind, the same devotedness to the sacred Scriptures, and to the peculiar doctrines of the gospel. The difference is, that instead of an almost reprehensive dignity, we have the sweetest familiarity; instead of the majestic grandeur of the Old Testament, we have the winning graces of the New; instead of those thunders by which angels were discomfited, we have, as it were, the still small voice of Him who was meek and lowly of heart. May we not then venture to assert, that from that spirit of devoted piety, which has rendered both these great men liable to the charge of religious enthusiasm, but which, in truth, raised the minds of both to a kind of happy residence a peculiar character has been derived to the poetry of them both, which distinguishes their compositions from those of almost all the world besides. I have already enumerated some of the superior advantages of a truly virtuous poet, and presumed to state, that these are realized, in an unexampled degree, in Milton and Cowper. That they both owed this eminence to their vivid sense of religion, will, I conceive, need no demonstration, except what will arise to every reader of taste and feeling on examining their works. It will here, I think, be seen at once, that that sublimity of conception, that delicacy of virtuous feeling, that majestic independence of mind, that quick relish for all the beauties of nature, at once so pure and so exquisite, which we find ever occurring in them both, could not have existed in the same unrivalled degree, if their devotion had been less intense, and of course, their minds more dissipated amongst low and distracting objects."

To the above remarks on the poet's character, we cannot forbear subjoining the two following exquisite pictures of him, one drawn undesignedly by himself, and the other by the Rev. Dr. Randolph, of Bath, on seeing his portrait by Lawrence.

Forms, opens, and gives scent to every flower;
But seldom (as if fearful of expense)
Vouchsafes to man a poet's just pretence—
Fervency, freedom, fluency of thought,
Harmony, strength, words exquisitely sought;
Fancy, that from the bow that forms the sky,
Brings colours dipt in heaven, that never die;
A soul exalted above earth; a mind
Skilled in the characters that form mankind;
And as the Sun, in rising beauty drest,
Looks to the westward from the dappled east,
And marks, whatever clouds may interpose
Ere yet his race begins, its glorious close;
And eye like his, to catch the distant goal;
Or ere the wheels of verse begin to roll,
Like his to shed illuminating rays
On every scene and subject it surveys:
Thus graced, the man asserts a poet's name,
And the world cheerfully admits the claim."

COWPER.

"Sweet Bard, whose mind, thus pictured in thy face,
O'er every feature spreads a nobler grace;
Whose keen but softened eye appears to dart
A look of pity through the human heart:
To search the secrets of man's inward frame;
To weep with sorrow o'er his guilt and shame;
Sweet Bard, with whom, in sympathy of choice,
To join the song that all the creatures raise
To carol forth their great Creator's praise;
Or, wrapt in visions of immortal day,
Have gazed on Truth in Zion's heavenly way.
Sweet Bard, may this, thine image, all I know,
Or ever may, of Cowper's form below,
Teach one who views it with a Christian's love
To seek and find thee in the realms above."

NATURE AND REVELATION TO THE BEING, PERFECTIONS, AND GOVERNMENT OF GOD.

BY THE

Rev. HENRY FERGUS, Dunfermline,

AUTHOR OF THE HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, TILL THE TERMINATION OF THE WAR OF INDEPENDENCE, IN LARDNER'S CYLOPÆDIA.

PREFACE.

The proofs of the Being, Perfections, and Government of God, may be indefinitely increased; for, as our knowledge of creation extends, the evidences of design multiply upon us. It is the aim of the following Treatise to show, within narrow limits, that contrivance, wisdom, and goodness, appear not in one province only, but in every department of the Universe which falls under our observation. Ray, Derham, and Paley, have distinguished themselves in this branch of learning; and of their excellent works the Author has occasionally availed himself.

The subject is of universal interest, and has a paramount claim to earnest attention. Without reverence for Deity man is a degraded and forlorn prodigal: but religion felicitates and exalts our nature; and it is the first step in religion to believe that God is, and "that he is the rewarder of them who diligently seek him." Creation declares the existence of the Creator, invites us to contemplate his perfections in the works of his hand, reminds us of our relation to Him in "whom we live, and move, and have our being," and claims our grateful adoration for his unwearied kindness towards us. To accustom ourselves to recognise the hand of God in the appearances of nature and the events of providence, to observe the adaptation of parts to each other, and the combination of means for the attainment of ends, is an exercise worthy of the high faculties which our Maker has bestowed upon us, and cannot fail to promote both our intellectual and moral improvement.

To whatever quarter we turn our eye, we find ample materials for this study. Animate and inanimate nature are alike instructive; and their relation to each other indicates that unity of counsel which presided in the formation of the world. The atmosphere, for example, though invisible, connects distant and dissimilar parts of the system, and combines them for the accomplishment of beneficial purposes. Without it no animal could live, no plant grow, no light shine, and no sound be heard; all would be sterility, desolation, and silence. But the earth is fitted up as a pleasant habitation for many sentient creatures. Man is its noblest inhabitant; and, in order to understand the plan of the Almighty with regard to him, it is necessary to attend to his character and condition. He is a rational, immortal, and accountable being, in a course of education for a higher stage of existence. He is subject to trials; and those trials have been eagerly seized, and plausibly urged, as inconsistent with the attributes of a benevolent Creator. The structure of the earth, the qualities of some of the inferior animals, and the vices and miseries of mankind, have been favourite arguments among infidels. To meet and answer the sceptical conclusions which have been drawn from these facts is the design of a considerable portion of the following work; but we trust its limits will not be considered as exceeding its importance.

After an attentive examination of the phenomena, we may not be able to explain every difficulty; but we are not left in doubt and uncertainty, for God has favoured us with an explicit revelation of his will in the Holy Scriptures. The Gospel is closely allied to Natural Religion, and its accordance with the appearances of the world, and the constitution of the human mind, is a proof of their common origin. It brightens our prospects under the trials of life, and gives clearer and more comprehensive views of faith and duty than the volume of Creation affords. There are many valuable works on evangelical truth in common circulation; and therefore, instead of enlarging on this part of the subject, the Author has satisfied himself with giving a general view of the evidences of divine revelation, of its harmony with the intimations of nature, and of the duties of piety and obedience to which it leads. In delivering his pages to the Public, he indulges the hope, that the serious consideration of the whole may, under the blessing of God, help to confirm the faith, comfort the heart, and encourage the pious exertions of those who love the truth, and desire to obey it.

OF THE ORIGIN OF THE WORLD.

OF THE GENERAL BELIEF OF MANKIND.

Crantz, in his History of Greenland, tells us that a native of that country once addressed him in the following manner: "It is true we were ignorant heathens and knew little of God till you came. But you must not imagine that no Greenlander thinks about these things. A kajak (a Greenland boat), with all its tackle and implements, cannot exist but by the labour of man. But the formation of the meanest bird requires more skill than that of the best kajak, and no man can make a bird. There is still more skill required to make a man: by whom then was he made? He proceeded from his parents, and they from their parents. But some must have been the first parents, and whence did they proceed? Common report says they grew out of the earth. If so, why do not men grow out of the earth still? And whence came the earth itself, the sun, the moon, and the stars? Certainly there must be some Being who made all these things; a Being more wise than the wisest man." Such was the reasoning of the untutored inhabitant of the frozen coast of Greenland, and in some such way, have mankind always reasoned; for no truth has been more universally received than the existence of God. "Who," says Ælian, "does not admire the wisdom of the barbarians, none of whom ever fell into the atheistical absurdities of Eumenes, Diagoras, Epicurus, and other philosophers? No Indian, Celt, or Egyptian, ever questioned whether there were Gods, or whether they concerned themselves with the affairs of men."

Some errors and some vices characterize society in particular stages of its progress, or when placed in peculiar circumstances: but atheism is never the error of society, in any stage or in any circumstances whatsoever. It is the hypothesis of a few thinly-scattered individuals in civilized nations, at times when from caprice, vanity, and ostentation, the most obvious truths are denied, and the most whimsical and pernicious paradoxes are zealously published and defended. Belief in the existence of God has prevailed in every age, and in every quarter of the world, and in every stage of society. In this point the savage and the sage have agreed. The rude hunter of the wilderness, and the polished inhabitant of the magnificent city, between whom there is a vast difference of habits, of knowledge, and of opinions, unite in the belief of the existence of Deity, and with equal earnestness supplicate his favour. On this subject the great error has been not the denial of one God, but the belief of many: polytheism, however, has been a popular and poetical rather than a philosophical error. Men have entertained false notions of the nature of God, but still they have believed in his existence; and the erroneous conceptions which have accompanied this belief, instead of attaching any discredit to the interesting truth tend to confirm it. They show that the existence of Deity is so plainly engraven on the face of nature, and so consentaneous to the dictates of reason, and to the unperverted feelings of the human mind, that it meets with a ready reception, even when accompanied by absurdities.

Is it alleged that some tribes of human beings have been found among whom no traces of belief in the existence of Deity were discoverable? The allegation is questionable. Of these tribes we know too little to speak with certainty of their creed: and even supposing the affirmation founded on fact, it must not be forgotten that those tribes are in a state of extreme degradation; and that they are not to be considered as denying the existence of God, but as being so brutal as to have no opinion or belief on the subject. Belief in the existence of Deity has all the authority which it can derive from opinion: it has the general suffrage of the human race. This is no slight presumption of the truth of the thing believed; for where mankind, in all the different circumstances in which they have been placed, have generally agreed on any great point relating to their common interest, their agreement may fairly be interpreted as the dictate of their nature, and consequently may be considered as having a rational claim to general reception.

For the general belief in the existence of God there must be an adequate cause. Where shall we find such a cause but in the appearances of the universe indicating a powerful, wise, and good Being, the Creator of all things? It is in vain to attribute this belief to tradition. Tradition cannot account for the fact; for the question immediately occurs, what was the origin of the tradition? Besides, no mere tradition could have been so widely and permanently diffused: it could not have been preserved among all tribes of men, and amidst all the vicissitudes of the human race. The flimsy allegation which ascribes the origin of this belief to the artifices of interested politicians is unworthy of notice, and may be dismissed with contempt. If general opinion and belief, then, could place any truth beyond the reach of controversy, the question concerning the being of God would long ere now have been finally determined; for on no other points have mankind so generally agreed as in believing the existence of God, and the immortality of the soul. But although belief in the existence of God has been general, yet it has not been universal; for the fool, says an ancient sage, has said in his heart there is no God.

The general belief of mankind is not of itself decisive evidence of the truth of the thing believed. But, even as evidence, it is not hastily to be dismissed from our minds, unless we can point out in a clear and satisfactory manner the causes of general error. Men have been led to the conclusion that there is a God by the appearances of the universe; and if those appearances, when calmly and rationally contemplated, justify the conclusion, then the opinion which it establishes is entitled to a cordial reception by the candid and serious inquirer after truth. It has, indeed, been attempted in different ways to evade the conclusion now mentioned. It has been alleged by some that the world is eternal; and others have been of opinion that the universe is a casual production. These speculations claim some notice, although they need not detain us long.

CHAPTER II.

ON THE ETERNITY OF THE WORLD.

The belief of the first men of whose opinions we have any record, the progressive population of the world, the recent origin of arts and sciences, ancient tradition and early history, all militate against the eternity of the world. We are not now speaking of inert matter only, but of the whole system of things as we see it. For if it be admitted that any part of the system is not eternal, then the whole hypothesis falls to the ground. Either all is eternal, or we have no reason to conclude that any part is so. But how can the human race be eternal? I exist; but I do not necessarily exist, for once I was not. I did not bring myself into existence. My parents were not their own creators: and although I go back as far as the wing of imagination can bear me, still I am as unable satisfactorily to account for the existence of those whom I then find alive, as I am to account for my own existence, or for the existence of those who have lived at any intermediate period. By going backward I remove the difficulty from one point to another; but still, at any given point, that difficulty is just the same as when it first met me. According, however, to the constitution of my nature, I cannot rest satisfied till I come either to a self-created or to a necessarily existing being. But a self-created being involves a contradiction. It involves existence and non-existence at the same time. I must, therefore, arrive at a necessarily existing, and consequently eternal being, as the first cause of my own existence.

Thus I think, that according to the constitution of my nature, I must either believe in an eternal and intelligent first cause; or, in something at least equally incomprehensible, and also altogether absurd. To talk of an infinite succession of beings such as man, is merely an unphilosophical attempt to push out of sight the difficulty of accounting for our first formation: but that difficulty it in no degree removes. For, according to this hypothesis, how high soever we ascend, we find no animated being but what has derived its existence from a being of the same kind with itself. Still we meet with plain marks of design; but the designing cause we have not found. Contrivance is obvious; but the contriving mind which must have existed before the contrivance, we have not discovered. It may be added, that the speculations of those who have attempted to trace the vestiges of the human race to a very remote antiquity have not been successful. There is no reason to believe that men have existed on the earth above six or seven thousand years.

Our globe has undergone some great revolutions. This the structure of its parts, and the organic remains found in it, clearly prove. But these revolutions were antecedent to the race of Adam. The organic remains indicate no traces of human beings. Neither reason nor revelation require us to believe, that the matter of this world was first called into existence at the time of the creation mentioned in the Jewish Scriptures. It may have existed before in different forms, and may have undergone many changes. But having been deranged and reduced to a chaotic mass by some mighty catastrophe, it was then fitted up for the reception of new inhabitants and the exhibition of new scenes, and was subjected to laws adapted to the new order of things.

Geological speculations can never be successfully employed in ascertaining the antiquity of the human race; for how shall we determine the state of matter when our globe was first subjected to the operation of those laws under which it now exists! To apply the result of observations on the present order of nature to a state of things anterior to, and perhaps altogether different from the present system, can lead to no correct conclusions. In an investigation of this kind, the very first point to be ascertained is, the state of matter when the present system of laws began to operate: a point which no human industry or ingenuity can ascertain; and without which, any speculations on this subject, with a view to determine the antiquity of the world, are mere illusions. Nay, from the phenomena of the existing system, rash and hasty conclusions may be drawn, which, although at first sight plausible, will not bear the test of examination. The argument of Recupero, founded on the lavas of Ætna, might have been considered decisive, had not the ruins of Herculaneum demonstrated its fallacy.

The astronomical arguments which have been adduced on this subject are as deceitful and unsatisfactory as those of a geological kind. Astronomy is incomparably the more advanced of the two sciences; but the history of astronomy is imperfect, and on some points very uncertain. Much has been said of the high antiquity of the Indian astronomical tables; but the eloquence of Bailly and the science of Playfair have not succeeded in proving them to be founded on observation. There is good reason to believe that they were formed by computation. This is the opinion of La Place, and it is strongly supported by the arguments of Bentley. The probability is that Indian science, instead of being of high antiquity, was derived from the Arabians, through the Greeks and Persians. According to Montucla, the distinguished historian of science, the most ancient Chinese observations are 2155 years before the Christian era; being, according to Usher's chronology, about 160 years before the birth of the patriarch Abraham. If the Fohi of the Chinese be the Noah of the Hebrew Scriptures, he may have transported into that country the faint lights of antediluvian science.*

An argument in favour of the high antiquity of the human race has been founded on the zodiacs in the temples of Latopolis and Tentyra, two ancient cities in the Upper Egypt. This argument rests on a great astronomical fact, the precession of the equinoxes. The equinoctial and solstitial points do not invariably occupy the same places in the ecliptic, but have a retrograde motion of about $50\frac{1}{3}''$ in a year; by which they will accomplish a revolution in about 25,750 years. Now, in the zodiac of Latopolis, the modern Esneh, Leo, we are told, is represented as the last of the ascending signs, and it has been stated that a sphinx there represents the sun at the summer solstice, just in the point where the last degree of Leo meets the first degree of Virgo. But at present the colure of the summer solstice is in the first degree of Gemini; and therefore it has been inferred, that as the space between the first degree of Gemini and the last degree of Leo, is to the whole of the ecliptic, so must the period elapsed since the construction of the zodiac of Latopolis be to 25,750 years. This inference would no doubt be consequentially drawn, if it were proved that the above was a true explanation of the zodiac of Latopolis, and that that zodiac was a correct picture of the heavens at the time of its formation. But on these points doubts and suspicions crowd in upon us. Plutarch and Macrobius would have been surprised and amused to hear the sphinx spoken of as an emblem of the sun. The Egyptians, it is true, worshipped that luminary under different names and symbols; but the sphinx was not one of them. To imagine then that this symbol represents the sun, is a gratuitous and unauthorized assumption.

Besides, there is no good reason to believe that the zodiac of Latopolis was a correct picture of the heavens at the time of its formation. Although we allow the highest praise to the genius and industry of ancient astronomers, yet it cannot be denied that their instruments were rude and clumsy, and many of their observations inaccurate. They erred more than half a degree in the latitude of Syené, a place at no great distance from Latopolis; and does this encourage the presumption that they were qualified to give a correct delineation of the zodiac? The Egyptians were moreover very vain, and boasted of a high antiquity. After the days of Hipparchus, might they not give false representations of the heavens with a view to countenance and encourage this vanity? It may be remarked, that the decorations of the Egyptian temples are not of the same antiquity with the temples themselves.

Farther, in the zodiac of Tentyra, the modern Dendera, Leo is not represented as the last of the ascending, but as the first of the descending signs. Does not this show that one, if not both of those zodiacs, is posterior to the time of Hipparchus? For if one of those zodiacs represents Leo as the last of the ascending, and the other as the first of the descending signs, was not this (supposing those zodiacs to be correct) a demonstration that the solstitial, and consequently the equinoctial points are moveable? But this, as is well known, was the grand discovery of Hipparchus; a discovery in no degree owing to the zodiacs of Latopolis and Tentyra, but made by comparing his own observations with those of Aristyllus and Timochares about 150 years before. Hipparchus diligently inquired into all the observations of Chaldean and Egyptian astronomers; but although it is probable that the former of those nations cultivated astronomy before the latter, yet he could find no observations that had been made at Babylon, previous to the reign of Nabonassar, 747 years before Christ. Berosus, a Chaldean, who lived about 300 years before the Christian era, knew of no monuments of Chaldean astronomy more ancient than 480 years before his own time: and neither Hipparchus nor Ptolemy ever heard of observations for 1903 years transmitted by Callisthenes to Aristotle, about the year 331 before Christ. Simplicius, a peripatetic philosopher, and commentator on Aristotle, who lived in the sixth century of the Christian era, makes mention of such observations; but his authority and that of Porphyry, from whom he borrowed the story, are too modern to be entitled to any regard. In short, these Egyptian zodiacs were unknown to Hipparchus; and if they had existed in his time, would they have escaped the notice of that careful observer and indefatigable inquirer? Would he not have appealed to them, as well as to the observations of Aristyllus and Timochares, in proof of the precession of the equinoxes? But it is needless to dwell longer on the subject, for there is no evidence that the Egyptians had zodiacs, with our signs and names, before the establishment of the Greeks in that country.*

It has been said that all things sprung from necessity. Necessity, however, is not an agent, but the state or condition of an agent; and if they who use the word, in the sense under consideration, attach any distinct conceptions to their language, they must by it understand an agent acting necessarily. But an agent acting necessarily is in reality no agent, but merely an instrument in the hand of another. Such, however, is the constitution of our nature that we cannot rest satisfied till we find a being operating not by necessity but by will and choice. We must find an efficient cause that had power to give or not to give existence to every creature. Necessity must result from something antecedent to itself.

Some persons talk of appetency. What do they mean by the word? Is it chemical affinity? If it be so, we understand the signification of the language, but cannot conceive with what propriety it is introduced on the present occasion. Has chemical affinity ever formed an organized being? If any person hazard the affirmative, let him produce an example: this he cannot do. But appetency, it may be said, is an endeavour perpetually and imperceptibly working its effects through a long succession of generations. We know that the perennial mountain stream operates insensibly, and in the course of ages hollows out a channel in the rock; but we know of no such operation producing either a plant or an animal.

To talk, as some have talked, of "Nature forming the first rudiments of organization, or spontaneous generations, which, gradually in a long series of ages and under the modifying influence of different circumstances, appear in all the organized forms which exist on the earth," is, to say the least of it, something that requires explanation, or that cannot be proved. What are we to understand by Nature? The word may be used figuratively for the Author of Nature: or it may mean that order and constitution of things which the Supreme Intelligence has established and maintains. In this last sense, it is of the same import with the Laws of Nature. Now, to talk of the laws of nature, to the exclusion of an Intelligent Agent, is absurd. The very term law implies such an agent. Law is not an agent. It is not endowed with active power, and therefore cannot be a cause in the proper sense of the word. Law is the expression of mind, and the rule according to which intelligence acts. Without the agent the law is nothing, Without his agency it never could have existed, for it merely expresses the manner of his procedure.

Where is the proof that Nature has formed all her productions after long periods of time? Show us an example of the first rudiments of organization, or a spontaneous generation. Show us any one of those rudiments in the first stage of its progress, or undergoing any of those metamorphoses, through which it passes in advancing to a more perfect form. At any assumed point, tell us what was its last form, and what will be its next. Men and other animals are still such as they have always been. But a hypothesis countenanced by no known fact in nature, has no legitimate claim to the character of philosophy, and may be fairly dismissed as a dream.

* The curious reader may consult a Dissertation on Hindoo Astronomy, by Professor Wallace, in the 8th volume of the Edinburgh Cabinet Library.

* Dr. Richardson, in his Travels, thinks it requires a good deal of imagination to make the drawings in these temples zodiacs; and some late interpreters of the hieroglyphics make them the work of Roman emperors.

CHAPTER III.

OF CHANCE.

Some persons have been of opinion that Chance was the author of all things. What is Chance? In common language, by this word we express our ignorance of a cause, or our want of intention. When we say a thing happened by chance, we do not mean to describe chance as the cause of the fact or event; but merely to say that we are ignorant of the cause, or that the event happened without intention on our part. The Atheist, however, uses the word to the exclusion of an intelligent and designing cause from the formation of the universe. But how did chance produce either matter or motion? We may indeed be told that we are equally ignorant how an intelligent cause operated in the production of those effects. It may be so. But by the introduction of Deity we assign an intelligent and sufficient cause for all the phenomena, although we may not comprehend the manner in which this cause operated in their production.

But although matter and motion be given, the difficulties of the chance philosopher are little diminished. How do chance, matter, and motion, produce an organized substance? How do they form a sentient being? How do they constitute and maintain a system of animated and rational existence? We confidently affirm that chance, matter, and motion, have never formed, and never will form, an organic structure. Let all the men of the world employ the best efforts of their reason and ingenuity in arranging and combining matter in thousands and millions of different ways, still they cannot produce a single plant or a single animal in any other than the common way. By a proper adjustment of the temperature, they may supply the incubation of the bird; but without the bird they cannot form the egg. Has chance, then, produced that rich and beautiful variety of vegetable, sentient, and rational nature, which adorns and felicitates our earth; and is Man, with all his reason and science, unable to succeed in a single instance? That unthinking and undesigning chance should produce intelligent and designing beings, is a notion utterly unfit for gaining admission into the human mind. The understanding of mankind revolts from it. Their observation and experience pronounce it untrue.

If the fortuitous concourse of atoms has formed all things; if the different orders of sentient beings have sprung from accidental combinations of matter; how happens it that alchymists and chemists, in all their mixtures for discovering the philosopher's stone, or even for making phosphorus, have not hit upon any new combination which produced a living creature; a fly or a frog, a monkey or a man? Franklin has taught us to rob the clouds of their lightning. Galvani and Volta have discovered combinations of matter by which, even after the vital spark is extinguished, the animal frame can be thrown into violent contortions. But no philosopher has discovered a new process for forming any one living creature. It is not unreasonable, however, to think that if the system of the chance philosophers had any foundation in truth, new processes for making living creatures would long ere now have been discovered; and that he would have been as well acquainted with receipts for forming animals of new kinds, and also with different ways of making those that formerly existed, as we are with prescriptions for procuring oxygen gas, or pulvis fulminans.

If chance produced all things at first, why do we not see chance operating still? If chance reared the world, why do we never see it building a palace or a cottage? If chance made man, why does it never draw a portrait? If all things be the offspring of chance, how happens it that we do not see new forms rising into life; animals unheard of before appearing in the world; and all the fictions of the poets realized? How happens it that the casual concurrence of atoms does not derange the system which it had formed, and alter it in a thousand different ways; that we never see a tree changing into a man, nor a man dwindling into a mushroom; nor a human head united to a horse's neck! Has chance stumbled blindly on till it reared the beautiful and magnificent fabric of the Universe; till in every instance, throughout the whole extent of nature, it hit upon the only possible combinations from which such noble results could proceed, and then for ever ceased from its blind and stumbling operations? The supposition is too extravagant to gain admission, for a moment, into a sober and rational mind. Indeed the whole hypothesis of the chance philosophers is rather to be considered as an instance of the strange vagaries of the human imagination, than as a system capable, in any degree, of bearing the test of reason, or satisfying the mind of the serious and candid inquirer after truth.*

CHAPTER IV.

OF DESIGN.

The opinion that the system of the world has been eternal cannot bear examination: and the hypothesis which ascribes the origin of the universe to a casual concurrence of atoms is utterly unsatisfactory. To arrange and organize matter, as we see it arranged and organized in the fabric of the world, is the work of mind; for in the fabric of the world, we every where see plain indications of design and contrivance. But where there are design and contrivance there must be intelligence. The intelligent being may act either mediately or immediately; but still he must exist and act. It may be assumed as the dictate of our nature that every effect must have an adequate cause. Such is the constitution of our minds, that this is equally the conviction of the savage and the sage. Wherever we see the fit combination of means in order to the attainment of an end, we thence, invariably and without hesitation, infer the existence of a designing cause.†

The possibility of discovering design by its effects has been denied; but there are some things which by the very constitution of our nature we are compelled to believe. The conviction is universal and irresistible, and can neither be weakened by metaphysical fallacies, nor strengthened by demonstration. The man who attempts to make me doubt my own existence, or that of matter around me, may puzzle my understanding by the subtlety of his reasoning, or dazzle my imagination by the splendour of his eloquence; but he makes no impression on my belief. The same is the case with him who tells me that I can have no conception of active power, or who labours to persuade me that I cannot discover design in its effects. In spite of his distinctions and his acuteness, my belief remains unchanged. He no more alters the convictions of my mind than the colour of my skin. For by attending to my own voluntary actions, I have a conception of active power. I am conscious of my own volitions, and experience teaches me that these volitions are followed by corresponding effects. Now, although I am unable to understand or explain the manner in which mind acts upon matter, yet I have all the evidence of which the case admits, or which my nature requires, that my volitions and exertions are the efficient cause of the effects produced. Wherever I observe mutual adaptation, reciprocal dependence, the relation of parts to one another and to a common end, there I believe there has been design. The belief is invariable and it is certain. I am led to it by all my notions resulting from consciousness, perception, testimony, and inference. Experience proves it invariably true.

Aristippus was shipwrecked on an island, where he and his companions were apprehensive of being destroyed by barbarians, or torn to pieces by wild beasts. He perceived some geometrical figures roughly sketched on the shore. "Let us take courage, my friends," exclaimed he, "for I see the vestiges of civilized men!" The judgment which he formed was instantaneous and certain. He never suspected that those figures had been scratched by the talon of the eagle, the paw of the lion, or even by the finger of a savage. If, however, upon landing on an unknown shore, instead of a few figures roughly sketched on the sand, we were to find a geometrical treatise, such, for instance, as the first six books of Euclid, with all the propositions, diagrams, and demonstrations, would any one hesitate, for a single moment, to pronounce that this was the work of some civilized and intelligent being? No man capable of exercising reason would pronounce it the work of chance. Would a voyager, landing on an uninhabited island, and finding a magnificent and splendid city, adorned with palaces, and temples, and towers, imagine, because he saw no inhabitants, that the city had risen up there without the operation of an intelligent agent? No: a native of oriental climes might pronounce it the work of the genii; but no person would imagine that it had come there without a designing cause, a contriving mind.

* The ancient chance and atomic philosophers were not agreed among themselves. Some of them, as Epicurus, supposed the atoms, which, by their fortuitous concourse, formed all things, were inanimated: others, as Democritus, believed them animated; teaching a doctrine, perhaps essentially the same with the living organic particles of more recent times. Whence did these atoms derive their animation?

† Without entering into any abstruse speculations about causation, we may, with Dr. Reid, remark, that in common language, cause is a very vague word, and is applied to any antecedent that is connected with the effect. In Natural Philosophy when we speak of a cause, we mean a law of nature from which the phenomenon results. This is a physical cause: it means the law or rule according to which the efficient cause acts. But by a metaphysical or efficient cause, we mean a being with understanding, will, and power, equal to the production of the effect. Nothing but an efficient cause can give existence to that which had no existence before: and in a series the efficient cause must begin it, and establish the law by which it is carried on.

It is by the inference of design from its effects, that, in many instances, we form our opinions and regulate our conduct. How do we distinguish a man of sagacity from a fool? A person of integrity from a villain? Why do we punish the incendiary and the murderer? It is because our opinions are formed and our conduct regulated by the inference of design from its effects. And before we cease to think in this manner, we must divest ourselves of our nature; we must cease to be men. This principle, which is forced upon us by the very constitution of our nature, and which is confirmed by daily experience, we must carry along with us when we survey the universe. We cannot divest ourselves of it. If, therefore, in our examination of Nature, we perceive combinations and relations which, according to all our notions, indicate design, then we are irresistibly led to infer the existence of a designing cause. This is no wanton hypothesis, no gratuitous assumption. It flows from a principle deeply rooted in our nature, and which influences many of our opinions, and much of our conduct.

It may, perhaps, be said that our knowledge of the design of the artist in any piece of mechanism, or of the architect in planning and building a palace or a city, arises from our having seen other things of the same kind, and having been informed of the design; but that the universe is something of its own kind; that it is one only; that there is no fair analogy between it and any work of man; and that, therefore, we cannot trace design in it. It is true, indeed, that the universe is but one. It consists, however, of many parts; and if, either in the whole, or in any of the parts, we perceive those kinds of combinations and relations which, according to the constitution of our nature, and all our observation and experience, we consider as indicative of design, then we are as irresistibly led to infer the existence of a designing cause in the one case as in the other. And in proportion as the universe, or any part of it, is superior to any effect of human contrivance and power, so the designing cause must, in the same proportion at least, be superior to man in wisdom and might. A watch is but one, yet it consists of many different parts, and plainly indicates design and contrivance. And though there were only one watch in the world, no man in the possession of his understanding would pronounce it a casual production.

The distance between the construction of any piece of mechanism, and that of the vast system of the universe is, indeed, immeasurably great. This, however, does not destroy the analogy; but it greatly weakens the impression of that analogy on our minds. In comparing a mite with an elephant, we, in some measure, lose sight of the comparison by the immense disparity between the things compared. This is much more the case in comparing the world with a piece of mechanism. In order to see and feel the full force of the comparison, there must be something like equality between the things compared; or, at least, we must be able to compute the inequality. For, it is only in proportion as we are able distinctly to see, and accurately to compute the difference between the things compared, that we feel the force of the comparison. But the disparity between the universe and the effects of human ingenuity and power are incalculable, and therefore the argument from analogy does not make a due impression on our mind.

We do not pretend fully to understand the designs of God in his works; but to argue that we can know no part of those designs, because we cannot comprehend them in all their variety and extent, is attempting to draw a general conclusion from partial premises. Because we do not fully understand the economy of the comets, can it be logically inferred that we know nothing of the solar system, or of the design of the sun? Will any man assert that we are ignorant of the design of the organs of sense, because we cannot explain how the nerves connected with different organs produce different sensations? Such conclusions, drawn from such premises, are not entitled to much consideration. To state them plainly is a sufficient refutation. The man who denies that it is any part of the design of the sun to enlighten, warm, and fertilize the earth; or of the eye to see, and of the ear to hear; or who seriously maintains that, from the effects, we cannot fairly infer such a design, is unquestionably under the influence of very powerful prejudices. In these instances the relations are obvious; and every unperverted mind must be fully satisfied that it is the design of the sun to communicate light and heat to the earth, of the eye to see, and of the ear to hear. These we may confidentially assume as designs of the Deity; and may reason concerning the fitness of the means to accomplish the ends, and from that fitness may form our estimate of the attributes of the Supreme Intelligence.

In inquiring into the designs of the Creator in his works, there is no presumption. Our inquiries ought to be conducted with profound reverence for the Being who formed and who upholds the universe; and, when so conducted, instead of being indications of impiety or audacity, they are expressions of admiration and homage. The essence of Deity is not the object of our senses; but he exhibits himself to us in his works, and in these he invites us to contemplate the proofs of his existence and the glory of his perfections. To trace the hand of the Almighty in the fabric of the universe, is a suitable exercise of the noble faculties with which he has endowed us: it is a tribute of homage to him who made us; and must be the means of much improvement and happiness to ourselves. "The works of the Lord are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein."*

* The a priori argument I have not introduced, because to my mind it has never appeared very satisfactory. Dr. Ried (Intell. Powers, p. 314, 4to ed.) says, "Sir Isaac Newton thought that the Deity, by existing everywhere, and at all times, constitutes time and space, immensity and eternity. This probably suggested to his great friend Dr. Clarke what he calls the argument a priori for the existence of an immense and eternal Being. Space and time, he thought, are only abstract or partial conceptions of an immensity and eternity which forces itself upon our belief. And as immensity and eternity are not substances, they must be the attributes of a Being who is necessarily immense and eternal. These are the speculations of men of superior genius. But whether they be as solid as they are sublime, or whether they be the wanderings of imagination in a region beyond the limits of human understanding, I am unable to determine."

Professor Dugald Stewart, in his dissertation on the progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Political Philosophy, in the Encyclopædia Britannica, Part II., p.65, says, "How far the peculiar cast of Newton's genius qualified him for prosecuting successfully the study of mind, he has not afforded us sufficient data for judging; but such was the admiration with which his transcendant powers as a mathematician and natural philosopher were universally regarded, that the slightest of his hints on other subjects have been eagerly seized upon as indisputable axioms, though sometimes with little other evidence in their favour but the supposed sanction of his authority. The part of his works, however, which chiefly led me to connect his name with that of Clarke, is a passage in the Scholium annexed to his Principia, which may be considered as the germ of the celebrated argument a priori for the existence of God, which is commonly, though, I apprehend, not justly, regarded as the most important of all Clarke's contributions to metaphysical philosophy. I shall quote the passage in Newton's own words, to the oracular conciseness of which no English version can do justice.

"'Æternus est et infinitus, omnipotens et omnisciens; id est, durat ab æterno in æternum, et adest ab infinito in infinitum. Non est æternitas et infinitas, sed æternus et infinitus; non est duratio et spatium, sed durat et adest. Durat semper et adest ubique, et existendo semper et ubique durationem et spatium constituit.' Proceeding on these principles, Dr. Clarke argued, that as immensity and eternity (which force themselves irresistibly on our belief as necessary existencies, or, in other words, as existencies of which the annihilation is impossible) are not substances, but attributes, the immense and eternal Being, whose attributes they are, must exist of necessity also. The existence of God, therefore, according to Clarke, is a truth that follows with demonstrative evidence from those conceptions of space and time which are inseparable from the human mind."

After quoting the passage from Dr. Ried, cited at the beginning of this note, Mr. Stewart proceeds and says, "After this candid acknowledgment from Dr. Ried, I need not be ashamed to confess my own doubts and difficulties on the same question."

Dr. Thomas Brown in his 92d lecture says, "If the world had been without any of its present adaptation of parts to parts, only a mass of matter, irregular in form, and quiescent,—and if we

BOOK II.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

We shall now proceed to consider some of the evidences of design in the fabric of nature; and, instead of selecting a few insulated examples from particular departments of the world, shall take a rapid but wide survey of the universe, and endeavour to show that evidences of design occur everywhere throughout, the vast system. Such evidences appear not merely in a few thinly-scattered phenomena of a dubious aspect, pressed into the service, and constrained to give a reluctant and suspicious testimony; but they abound in every province of nature, and upon many occasions force themselves upon the notice even of the careless observer. Such a general survey is not necessary to prove the being of God; but it will serve to familiarize this great truth to our imagination, and accustom us to associate the existence and perfections of Deity with the contemplations of his works. Moreover, we may often have occasion to remark the indications of wisdom and goodness which appear in every department of nature, and the frequent recurrence of these indications cannot fail to make a deep impression on the mind, and to fortify it against objections to those attributes of the Creator. Before entering, however, upon this extensive survey, it is proper to premise,

1. That although we may not understand every phenomenon, or be able to point out design in every appearance of nature, yet this can form no objection against what we are able to explain. Our ability to prove the existence and illustrate the perfections of Deity from the fabric of the universe, will be commensurate with our knowledge of creation. We may be able to show design in many phenomena; but beings of greater knowledge may show wisdom and goodness in many more, perhaps even in those very instances which to us appear most perplexing and unaccountable. Hence we may see the folly of condemning what we do not understand. Perceiving so many indications of wise and benevolent contrivance everywhere around us, we ought rather to distrust our own knowledge than to deny the existence of wisdom and goodness in any particular instance. The celebrated Alphonsus X., king of Leon and Castile, was well acquainted with the astronomical doctrines of Ptolemy, but had he no conception of the true principles of the solar system. Proud, however, of his attainments, and misled by his imaginary science, he is said to have exclaimed, that if he had been of God's council he would have instructed him better in the construction of the universe. What the royal astronomer ridiculed was not the work of Deity, but the phantom created by his own ignorance. His example should operate as a caution to us.

2. Although I err in my account of one phenomenon, and although my argument, in so far as it depends on that erroneous account, must fall to the ground; yet this, in no degree, invalidates arguments founded on facts and appearances correctly stated. It is not here as in the demonstration of a geometrical theorem, where if one link be broken the demonstration fails. In the present case, the reasoning upon every fact, or combination of facts, is separate and independent; and, therefore, although in any one instance, the statement of fact may be incorrect, and the argument, in so far as it depends on that incorrect statement, unsound, yet other facts, and arguments founded on them, stand in full force. Every fact, or every combination of facts, may be considered independently in the great mass of evidence; and in proportion as we bring forward appearances indicative of design, we accumulate arguments in proof of the existence of a designing cause. If we can show a harmonious combination of all the phenomena in order to the construction of one whole, then the conclusion which results from the contemplation of particular parts will appear with the most attractive lustre and commanding majesty.

CHAPTER II.

THE HUMAN EYE.

In glancing at the evidence of design in nature, I shall first select a particular instance and explain it at considerable length, in order that the force of the evidence may be more fully felt. The instance which I select for this purpose is the Human Eye; and in reviewing this organ I shall give a description of it, which, though not minute enough for the anatomist, may suffice for an exhibition of its construction and excellence as an optical instrument.

The Eye, which communicates so much beauty and vivacity to the human countenance, is a small but admirable instrument of vision formed in the bulb of the optic nerve. Its position, construction, and the provision made for its adjustment and preservation, plainly indicate a designing cause. It is placed in the upper part of the face, occupying a commanding station; and, like a sentinel posted on a hill, perceiving, at a single glance, everything around. It is lodged in a strong-hold, or bony cavity, called its orbit; and is surrounded by several parts, which serve either to protect it from injury, to assist and facilitate its motions, or to supply it with moisture. The optic nerves proceed separately from the brain: they afterwards unite; then separate again, and each of them enters the orbit, on the nasal side, and forms the integuments of the eye, so that the coats or tunics of the eye are expansions of the optic nerve, or at least membranes intimately adhering to it. The optic nerve has two coats, one above the other, enclosing its medullary substance. The exterior coat is named the dura mater, the interior the pia mater. The outer coat of the eye, called the sclerotica, is a continuation and expansion of the dura mater, and is white and opaque, excepting the anterior part, called the cornea, which, unlike the part behind, is transparent, and is fixed in the sclerotica, like the glass of a watch in its case.

The Choroides, which lines the sclerotica, may be considered as a production of the pia mater. Its anterior part, behind the cornea, but not close to it, is of a very different structure from its posterior part; and, on account of the variety of its colours, has been named the Iris. The Iris, or anterior part of the choroides, is an assemblage of muscular fibres; some of them tending like the radii of a circle towards its centre, and others forming a number of concentric circles round the same centre. In the middle of the iris is a per-could conceive ourselves, with all our faculties as vigorous as now, contemplating such an irregular and quiescent mass, without any thought of the order displayed in our own mental frame, I am far from contending that, in such circumstances, with nothing before us that could be considered as indicative of a particular design, we should have been led to the conception of a Creator. On the contrary, I conceive the abstract arguments which have been adduced to show that it is impossible for matter to have existed from eternity,—by reasonings on what has been termed necessary existence, and the incompatibility of this necessary existence with the qualities of matter,—to be relics of the mere verbal logic of the schools, as little capable of producing conviction, as any of the wildest and most absurd of the technical scholastic reasonings, on the properties, or supposed properties, of entity and nonentity. Eternal existence, the existence of that which never had a beginning, must always be beyond our distinct comprehension, whatever the eternal object may be, material or mental,—and as much beyond our comprehension in the one case, as in the other, though it is not impossible for us to doubt, that some being, material or mental, must have been eternal, if anything exists."

Sir James Mackintosh, in his dissertation on the progress of ethical philosophy, in the seventh edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, speaking of Dr. Clarke, says, "Roused by the prevalence of the doctrines of Spinoza and Hobbes, he endeavoured to demonstrate the being and attributes of God, from a few axioms and definitions, in the manner of geometry; an attempt in which, with all his powers of argument, it must be owned that he is compelled sometimes tacitly to assume what the laws of reasoning required him to prove; and that, on the whole, his failure may be regarded as a proof that such a mode of argument is beyond the faculties of man."

In a note, Sir James adds, "This admirable person had so much candour as in effect to own his failure, and to recur to those other arguments in support of this great truth, which have in all ages satisfied the most elevated minds. In Proposition VIII. (Being and Attributes of God, p. 47), which affirms that the first cause must be 'intelligent,' (where, as he truly states, 'lies the main question between us and the atheists,') he owns, that the proposition cannot be demonstrated strictly and properly a priori."

foration known by the name of the pupil, which is diminished by the contraction of the circular fibres of the iris, when a very luminous object is presented to the eye; and dilated by the contraction of the radial fibres, for the admission of a greater number of rays in a faint light. Even they who do not admit the fibrous structure and muscularity of the iris cannot deny its contractibility, which they ascribe to its sympathy with the retina. But, as the contractibility is unquestionable, a dispute about the manner in which it is produced does not affect the argument resulting from it.

At the anterior border of the choroides, there is a ring of sensible thickness, named the ciliary ligament, from which proceed numerous productions called ciliary processes. The posterior surface of the iris, the ciliary processes, and part of the choroides, are spread over with a black mucus, which absorbs the lateral rays, and contributes to distinct vision. The medullary portion of the optic nerve, in dilating, forms a white and very thin membrane, or congeries of nervous terminations, applied upon the choroides and named the retina; upon which, according to the general opinion, the object is painted. In these coats or tunics are set three transparent humours or lenses, of different refractive powers; and the whole forms the organ of vision in the human body.

The foremost of the humours is the aqueous. It is placed immediately behind the cornea, and occupies the whole space between it and the crystalline humour, both before and behind the iris. The aqueous humour has the transparency of the purest water, but it is not altogether so liquid. Its specific gravity is rather greater than that of water. It has been remarked that notwithstanding the great fluidity of the aqueous humour, and its exposure to the cold, it does not freeze. Behind the aqueous humour is placed a double convex lens, having its axis corresponding with the centre of the pupil. It is somewhat more convex towards the bottom of the eye than in front. It is called the crystalline humour; and appears to be composed of a great number of very thin laminæ, and of extremely minute fibres, very transparent and closely united together. It is tolerably solid, and both its specific gravity and refractive power are greater than those of either of the other two humours of the eye. It is attached to the ciliary ligament, by means of the fibres of which it can, probably, be altered in a small degree in position, and perhaps in figure also. The crystalline is placed behind the aqueous, and in front of the vitreous humour; in which last it is set like a jewel in a ring. The vitreous humour, situate at the back part of the socket, occupies about three-fourths of the globe of the eye. It is of the form of a jelly, colourless, and of great transparency. Its specific gravity is little more than that of the aqueous humour; therefore, as, generally speaking, the refractive powers of different mediums are as their densities, the refractive powers of these two humours are not very different. Each of the humours is contained within its own membrane, which is very delicate and equally transparent with the humour itself. At the back of the whole is the retina.

The eye, thus formed, is provided with muscles which move in all directions, and accommodate its focal distance to different objects, in a degree of perfection incomparably superior to the mechanism of the most ingeniously mounted telescope. By the action of six muscles, it has not only the horizontal and vertical motions, but it can be turned to any oblique angle with the rapidity of lightning. The eyeball is much less than the cavity in which it is lodged; but the interval is filled up with cellular substance, furnishing a soft and warm bed to the eye, and facilitating its motions. Besides, by means of the lachrymal gland, situate between the ball of the eye and the upper vault of the orbit, on the temporal side, the eye is supplied with a perpetual fountain for moistening and keeping it clean: the superfluous moisture passes through a perforation into the nostrils, and is drained off. The eyelids, in connexion with the bony cavity in which the ball is lodged, form a soft and strong covering to the eye, and can be instantaneously put on or withdrawn. The eyelashes serve as a protection against insects and minute bodies floating in the air: they also give warning of approaching danger, and help to guard against it; and they moderate the rays of light in their passage to the eye.

Observe, then, what a variety of circumstances, and what an exact combination and nice adjustment of these circumstances there must be in order to distinct vision; and after attentively considering the whole, nothing, I think, but blind stupidity or obstinate perversity, can deny design and skilful contrivance in the structure of the eye. How happens it that the cornea is transparent, and not opaque like the sclerotica, of which it is the continuation? If it were opaque there would be no vision; and I see no way of accounting for its transparency, but by acknowledging a wise designing cause. How shall we account for the transparent part being placed in front, and not towards the bottom of the socket? Light does not give transparency to the cornea, nor does the cornea give existence to light; they exist independently of each other: yet between the two there is an unquestionable relation, as much so as between the window and the room, the fire-place and the chimney, the lock and the key.

How happens it that the iris is of a different structure from the rest of the choroides, of which it is apparently the continuation: that the iris has the perforation called the pupil, and that it is not a continuous envelope like the cornea: that the centre of the pupil corresponds with the axes of the crystalline lens: and that the iris has a power of contraction and dilatation, either lessening or enlarging the pupil according to circumstances? A change in any of those conditions would be fatal or highly injurious to vision. The light does not create the pupil, yet the pupil is formed for the admission of light. Light does not confer on the iris the power of contraction or dilatation, yet the pupil has the power of adjusting itself to the quantity of light. If it be alleged that the light irritates the eye, and by that means occasions the contraction, still we may inquire who so organized the pupil that it should be affected in such a manner by the action of light; who contrived the machanism by which the changes in the sizes of the pupil are effected? How shall we account for the ciliary ligament and its processes, but by resorting to a wise designing cause, which has in this way provided for the adjustment of the crystalline lens? Who provided the retina, like a fine white canvas, to receive the picture? How shall we account for lenses of different refractive powers to correct the chromatic aberration? Light did not create these several lenses, for they were created ere light shown upon them; nor did these lenses establish the law by which rays of light are refracted from the straight line in passing obliquely through mediums of different densities, and by which some of the rays of the solar beam are more refrangible than others; yet the lenses of the eye are accurately adapted to the optical fact or law. How happens it that the lenses are so exactly adjusted that the rays form a distinct picture on the retina? If the configuration or refractive powers of the lenses had been such as to bring the rays to a focus sooner, or if the retina had been placed more forward, or at the smallest distance farther back in the socket; in any of these cases vision would have been indistinct. But the place of the retina is exactly adjusted to the focal distance of the lenses.

By fixing a lens in a hole of the window-shutter of a darkened room, we see an inverted picture of external objects, formed on a white sheet of paper, behind the lens. But, in order to have the picture distinct, we must move the paper backwards and forwards till we find the exact focal distance. The retina, which corresponds to the sheet of paper, is placed exactly at the due distance.

The eye is convex and not a plane. If it had been a plane, the field of vision must have been extremely limited. But the most advantageous of all forms is adopted; and I know of no rational way of accounting for this, but by having recourse to a designing cause. In order, however, to have a fuller view of the subject, we shall compare the eye, in some particulars, with a telescope; and give a more copious illustration of some things already mentioned.

1. Let us consider the eye as an achromatic instrument. Light moves in straight lines; but in passing obliquely out of one medium into another of different density, it is refracted towards the perpendicular in passing into a denser medium, and from it in passing into a medium more rare. Besides, the white light issuing from the sun is not a homogeneous fluid, but consists of several differently-coloured rays; and these rays are not equally refrangible, the red being the least refrangible, and the violet the most so. Unless, however, these refractions be corrected, there cannot be distinct and colourless vision. Such is the fact in nature. How, then, is the matter managed in the eye? The refractions are corrected by lenses of different refractive powers, so that all the rays meet in a focus on the retina, and there delineate a distinct and achromatic image of the object from which the rays proceed. How is the difficulty managed in the telescope? This was long a desideratum in natural science, and exercised the genius and industry of the most distinguished philosophers.

The telescope, by the prismatic action of the lenses of which it was composed gave the object a coloured appearance about the edges, and consequently presented an indistinct image. This was a great defect, and it was of much importance to remedy it. The celebrated Mr. James Gregory perceived that the eye had the same difficulty to encounter. How, he asked, is it surmounted there? He perceived that this was accomplished by a combination of lenses of different refractive powers. Hence that ingenious philosopher was led to throw out a hint concerning the construction of what has since been called the achromatic telescope. The subject employed the great powers of Newton and the vigorous mind of Euler, and the execution of the plan has conferred a lasting celebrity on the name of Dollond. Here, then, we find Gregory, Newton, Euler, Dollond, names of high distinction (and many more might be mentioned), turning their minds to the formation of the achromatic telescope, acknowledging the structure of the eye to be their guide, and yet employing much ingenuity, and performing many experiments, ere the last of them happily succeeded in accomplishing the object in view. Now the cases under consideration are precisely parallel; the difficulty to be surmounted is the same. Shall we, then, admit design and contrivance in the one case, and deny them in the other? Shall we admit that Gregory, Newton, Euler, and Dollond, were designing and contriving beings, in their schemes and efforts to construct an achromatic telescope; and yet contend that the eye, which was their model, was formed without design and contrivance? Shall we admit design and contrivance in the imitation, and yet deny them in the pattern? This were absurd in the extreme. In the structure of the eye design and contrivance are obvious, and that organ could not have been formed but by a designing and contriving Being.

2. In using a telescope, for instance a three feet refractor, if we wish to try the powers of the instrument in reading a book, we may have a distinct vision at the distance of twenty or twenty-five yards. But, if we turn the telescope, in the same state in which we have been reading the book, upon an object a mile or two distant, we see nothing. In order to have distinct vision, we must, either by managing the tube with our hand, or by the action of a screw, adjust the instrument to the new distance. In what way soever we perform the operation, it requires time and observation to find the focus. But the eye adjusts itself in a moment, whether the object which we look at be six inches from it, or six thousand times that distance. Now, is there design and contrivance in forming the adjusting screws of the telescope to fit it to the focal distance? No man in his senses denies it. How, then, can any man in his senses deny design and contrivance in the mechanism of the eye, by which the same end is accomplished; and not only accomplished, but accomplished in a far more easy and expeditious manner than in the telescope? For no degree of practice or dexterity in the use of the instrument, will enable us to adjust its focus to different distances, with the same ease and quickness as we do in the eye. If design and contrivance be admitted in the one case, they cannot be denied in the other, but by obstinate and irrational perversity.

3. The form of the eye indicates a wise designing cause. It is of a spherical figure, and by this figure several important ends are answered far better than they could have been by any other. It affords the most convenient lodgment for the humours of the eye, and gives the largest field of vision. If the front of the eye had been a flat surface, there could have been no distinct vision, because all the parts of it could not have been at the due focal distance from the lenses; some parts must have been too near, or some too far off. Besides, it is obvious that the spherical figure of the eye is best adapted for motion in all directions. We may farther remark, that the optic nerve enters the eye, not at the bottom of the socket, but on the nasal side of it. This contributes to distinct vision, and may fairly be considered as an evidence of design.

4. The eye occupies a most commanding position, and surveys with ease everything around. It could have been stationed in no other part of the body with equal advantage. If it had been placed in the occiput, the form and articulation of the arms and legs would not have harmonized with it; but, at present, they are fitted for acting in the direction in which the eye sees. The eyes were formed before the light shone upon them, and the limbs before they had room for action; yet they are admirably adapted to each other. They exhibit a striking instance of relation and prospective contrivance. Indeed, relation and prospective contrivance meet us in almost every department of nature, whether we attend to the structure of animals, or to the combinations and adjustments of the different parts of the universe. Thus the eye occupies its due place in the body, as part of one harmonious whole, and all the members are fitted for co-operating with it. It is stationed near the brain, and communicates with that great source of sensation and motion by means of the optic nerve.

5. We have an evidence, not of design only, but of goodness also, in the number of the eyes. They are two. In this way we can take in a larger angle than if we had one eye only; and although one be injured, we are not entirely deprived of the use of this cheering organ. And we may observe the consummate skill of Him who formed the eye, in this circumstance, that although an object be seen with both eyes yet it appears single, perhaps because painted on the corresponding part of each retina, or perhaps because the nerves unite; but in what manner soever we account for it, the fact is certain; and the argument resulting from it is not affected by any doubts respecting the manner in which it is accomplished. Although the picture of the object is inverted on the retina, yet we see objects erect; and this, I apprehend, happens by a law of our nature antecedent to experience. The rays of light pass to the retina on optical principles; but we know not in what way impressions are made on the mind. It may be added, that the eyeball is of a commodious size, serving the purposes of distinct vision, and yet not exposing a large surface to the injuries to which such a delicate organ is liable. All the objects in the large field which the eye takes in are accurately represented on the retina. The whole scenery of some miles is painted on a canvas of an inch diameter; and yet how distinct and correct is the picture! This circumstance bears a strong testimony, not only to the existence, but also to the wisdom and goodness of the Creator.

6. The motions of the eye cannot fail to attract the notice of every attentive observer and inquirer. These motions are performed by the action of six muscles, four of which are straight, and two oblique. The straight muscles elevate or depress the eye, turn it in towards the nose, or out towards the temple; the oblique muscles perform the more complex motions. The origin and insertion of those muscles, and their comparative strength, are fitted with the most consummate mechanical skill for turning the eye in all directions, with the utmost ease and rapidity; and if the nice adaptation of means to the accomplishment of an end be a proof of design, the muscles of the eye demonstrate the existence of a designing cause.

From this cursory view of the eye, it obviously appears to be an organ of most exquisite workmanship. Its numerous parts are adapted to each other with the most skilful contrivance and minute precision, and the whole serves the noblest and most beneficial purposes. Take the eye altogether, its position, its ingenious and accurate construction as an instrument of vision, its instantaneous adjustment of itself to different distances, its capacity of accommodating itself to different degrees of light: the ease, rapidity, and variety of its motions, and the provision made for keeping it clean and safe; and it plainly demonstrates the existence of an intelligent first cause. I hesitate not to affirm that, although there were not another mark of design in the universe, yet the appearance of even a single eye would be an irrefragable evidence of a designing cause; for nothing that we either see or know, nothing in our own experience or in the authenticated testimony of others, nothing resulting from consciousness, perception, or reasoning, gives us the least ground for believing that even a single eye could be formed in millions of ages, by any casual combinations of matter. Every eye, then, bears a strong testimony to the existence of a wise designing cause.

But supposing that one eye might have been produced by casual combinations, how shall we account for the appearance of a second? There is just as much difficulty in accounting for the second as for the first, and as much difficulty in accounting for the third as for the second, and so on for every eye that is in the universe; for the existence of one eye is neither a necessary nor a physical cause of the existence of another, and it is not in the nature of chance to establish a series. There are, then, as many distinct witnesses of the existence of an intelligent first cause as there are eyes in the world. And let me add, that it is a most unphilosophical, yea an absurd subterfuge, to allege that one being with eyes has produced another being with eyes, and that the series has gone on from eternity. This can be considered only as an acknowledgment on the part of the atheist that he knows nothing of the matter, and as a silly attempt to plunge into darkness, and conceal himself from pursuit. But, go where he will, he cannot escape from the difficulty. Every step that he retires it still presses upon him. It pursues him through eternity, and every moment treads on his heels, with the same force as in the first instance. Still a a voice sounds in his ear, " Here is design, where is the designing cause? Here is contrivance, where is the contriver? Point out the planning mind; show the hand that with such dexterity has adapted means to the attainment of an end." Go where he will, he has not accounted for the first eye; he has not accounted either for the origin or continuation of the series; and in no way can they be accounted for, but by the admission of a powerful, wise, and good first cause.

We give much credit to the artist who makes a few good instruments. The fame of Dolland as an optician is high, and not undeservedly so; although causes over which he had no control contributed to aid his genius and exalt his fame; for we are told that the glass employed by him in the construction of his best telescopes was a fortunate treasure, all of one melting. But what should we have thought of his genius and art, if he had made telescopes which produced other telescopes, of undiminished excellence, through an unlimited series! We should have pronounced them above all encomium. What then shall we say of Him who formed the eye, and established the law by which a vast succession of eyes is generated? Must not he be a designing Being? Yea, must he not be unspeakably powerful, wise, and good? If I were brought into a court, before an enlightened jury, where I should lose my cause unless I could adduce some plain mark of intelligence and design in the works of nature, I should boldly contend, after bringing forward the human eye, with all its apparatus, that I had made good my cause, and should confidently expect a verdict in my favour; and such a verdict, any jury, competent to decide upon the subject, would assuredly return.

How the eye conveys sensation to the mind I cannot tell. If in this there be machanism, it is such a mechanism as eludes our notice and defies our investigation. All sensation is conveyed to the mind by an unknown influence of the nerves. If the optic, or any other nerve distributed over an organ of sensation, be cut or rendered paralytic, the animal instantly loses that particular sense. The fact is fully established by observation and experiment. But how the nerves, which are perfectly similar in every part of the body, should convey to the mind feelings so different, when distributed over the eye, the ear, the tongue, and the nose, is what we can neither understand nor explain. Here reason and philosophy are set at defiance. Indeed, in everything around us, we may proceed a certain length with success in our inquiries; but we soon reach a limit which neither our industry nor ingenuity can pass. We perceive an end accomplished; but how, we are often unable fully to explain. Some parts of the process elude our utmost penetration, and on those parts we can pass no judgment. But a good effect is produced. The means, so far as we can trace them, are admirably adapted to the end. In such circumstances, it is truly characteristic of a fool to condemn the whole, because he can understand and explain a part only; or to deny design, because he cannot fully trace the mechanism throughout the whole process.

CHAPTER III.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE HUMAN BODY.

We might now proceed to the organs of the other senses, and show that in them there is a wise adaptation of means to the attainment of beneficial ends; that the ear is an excellent instrument of hearing, and that design plainly appears in the senses of smelling, tasting, and feeling. We might also consider the different members of the body; as the hand, which Aristotle pronounced the "organ of organs." Its excellence depends in no small degree on the position, strength, and action of the thumb, which can be brought into a state of opposition to the fingers, and hence is of great use in laying hold of bodies. We might also show that the foot is well fitted for the support and progression of the body, and exhibits a noble display of benign intention and skilful contrivance. But instead of entering on such an extensive field, we shall merely take a general view of the human body.

The bones, amounting, in a full grown person, to about two hundred and forty, constitute the frame of the machine; and, in order to retain them in their places, and enable them to perform their several functions, they are strongly and ingeniously bound together by elastic ligaments, membranes, or muscles, according to the several situations and uses of the parts. Some of the joints have a free, easy, and obvious motion; while that of others is less evident. In the joints, the articulating surfaces, being exposed to friction, are lined with a smooth elastic substance, named cartilage, which is lubricated with synovia, as the wheels of machinery are with oil. Now, if the oiling of the axles of machinery be the effect of design, we think it unreasonable to deny design in the lubrication of the joints.

The articulations of the several joints are very different; and, in every instance, are happily suited to their places and purposes. Let us, for a moment, glance at the spine. How different is its formation from that of the thigh bone, and its articulations from that of the hip or knee joint! And is not design, yea, are not wisdom and goodness obvious in the structure of each, and in the difference between them? Had the spine been formed of a single bone, like the thigh, it would have been much more easily fractured than at present, and utterly incapable of incurvation. Had it consisted of only two or three bones, articulated like the hip or like the knee joint, the spinal marrow would have been bruised at every joint, and the motion could not have been so free, nor the pillar so strong as it is. The spine consists of twenty-four pieces, called vertebræ, with cavities and protuberances for locking into each other, so as to prevent luxation and yet provide for the flexion of the body. The spinal marrow, which is of essential importance to life, is lodged in the cavity secure from injury; and corresponding notches in the vertebræ leave a passage for the entrance of the blood-vessels, and for the departure of the nerves, which proceed from the spinal marrow to the different parts of the body.

This bony column, which thus affords a canal through the spinal marrow, the production of the brain, proceeds in security towards the extremities, also supports the head; where the brain, the throne of sensation, motion, and intellect, is lodged in the cranium, as in a fortress skilfully and artificially constructed, and the organs of seeing, hearing, smelling, and tasting, are placed like so many watchmen on the walls, while the sense of feeling is diffused over the whole body. The spine also serves to connect the framework of the body. In short, let any person attend to the way in which the different bones are united, and consider how both their forms and articulations are varied and adapted to different situations and offices, all advantageous to the strength and motion of the frame, and he will feel himself constrained to admit the existence of a wise designing cause.

If the bones evince intelligence, gracious design, and skilful contrivance, the muscles and tendons also bear testimony to the being of God. The muscles act by contractions and relaxations; and the insertion, the action, and strength of each is nicely proportioned to its place and office in the body. The action of most of the muscles is subject to the will; and, at pleasure, we can put them in motion, or allow them to remain in a state of rest. This indeed is not the case with them all; but design, and wisdom, and goodness, are equally obvious whether their action be voluntary or involuntary. Several motions and processes go on within us, without any volition on our part. The action of the heart and of the lungs, the circulation of the blood, the digestion of the food, the peristaltic motion of the viscera, and the various secretions, go on when we are asleep as well as when we are awake, and do not depend on the will. This is a wise and gracious provision, for these motions and processes are necessary to life and health; but, if these nice and complicated movements had been dependent on the will they must have occupied much of our attention; in many instances they must have been but partially performed; and in sleep they must have been neglected and suspended. Therefore, by a wise appointment, these vital motions are involuntarily performed. But other motions depend on the will, and in them wisdom and goodness are as conspicuous as in those that are involuntary. At pleasure we can open our eyes, to see the light, or shut them on the approach of danger: we close them involuntarily in sleep. By an act of my will I can speak or be silent; rise up or sit down; walk or stand still.

The body is nourished by the circulation of the blood, which, flowing from the heart as the fountain, like a genial and fertilizing stream, conveys life and nutriment to the whole system. The heart is a hollow muscle, of a conical shape, which involuntarily contracts and relaxes more than sixty times in a minute. It consists of four distinct cavities: the two largest are called ventricles; the two less auricles. The right ventricle, by its contractions, propels the blood, by the pulmonary artery and its numerous ramifications, through the lungs, where it throws out carbonic acid and takes in caloric; a process essential to life. The blood on leaving the lungs passes into the left ventricle, which sends it out, by proper arteries, to carry the vital aliment through the system.

The blood is undergoing, every moment, a great change in the lungs; and the heart acts as a forcing-pump in propelling it into the arteries. But the circulation does not depend on the propulsive action of the heart alone: it is aided by a peristaltic motion in the arteries, which are of a muscular structure, and much stronger than the veins, by which it is conducted back to the heart. Both the arteries and veins are furnished with valves. The arterial valves are so constructed as to allow a free passage of the blood from the heart towards the extremities, but to prevent its return by the same channel. In the veins, the valves are so formed as to permit the blood to flow freely from the extremities towards the heart, but to hinder it from moving in the opposite direction. These valves are most numerous in the small branches, where the impetus of the blood is least. In the structure of the valves of the blood-vessels, design and contrivance are obvious. It was by attending to this circumstance that Harvey was led to the discovery of the interesting fact of the circulation of the blood, by which he has acquired a lasting celebrity. Can it then be imagined for a moment, that the peculiar structure of the arterial and venous valves, by observing and reasoning on which that distinguished physician was led to the discovery of a great fact in nature, happened without design and skilful contrivance? This imagination cannot be entertained but by the stupid credulity of atheism.

The blood, sent from the left ventricle of the heart, and conveyed through the system by the branches and capillary ramifications of the arteries, returns by the veins. The arteries, in proceeding from the heart, branch out and become smaller and smaller; and the veins, in advancing towards it, gradually unite and are enlarged, till the whole of those returning channels, by reiterated unions, are formed into one large trunk, through which they pour their contents into the right ventricle of the heart. The blood, having thus completed the circulation, instantly sets out again on its tour, to imbibe, in passing through the lungs, a fresh portion of vital aliment, and in its progress to diffuse it through the body. The blood-vessels are so wonderfully ramified that scarcely a spot can be punctured but the blood will appear.

The whole of the blood, however, does not perform this circulation. The ultimate ramifications of the arteries, in many instances, are so minute as not to afford a passage to the red parts of the blood, but transmit the thin and pellucid part of it only; and those ramifications, instead of communicating with the veins, lodge their contents in bones, muscles, ligaments, and other parts of the body, where, by an inscrutable process named assimilation, this fluid is converted into a substance of the same specific character and properties with the parts to which it is conveyed. On seeing corn, fruit, herbs, and roots, in the various stages of their growth, who would imagine that they could be changed into blood, and flesh, and bones? The process carried on in this secret laboratory eludes our investigation; but it indicates the hand of a wise and mighty Chemist, who constituted the wonderful apparatus by which the surprising change is accomplished, and endued all its parts with a suitable activity. Besides, these minute vessels pour their contents into all the cavities, and into the glands, where they are afterwards changed into fluids of different qualities, and which answer different purposes. Some of the glands prepare a fluid for lubricating the joints, and the parts in motion; some furnish fluids to promote digestion, and to assist in the preparation of aliment; some yield a fluid to protect the skin, and to preserve it in a proper state for performing its several offices; some give a fluid which is the means of continuing the species; and some prepare a fluid for nourishing the infant after its birth.

But the whole contents of these capillary arteries which wander from the circulation, cannot be allowed continually to accumulate in the bones, muscles, and other parts to which they are conveyed: accordingly we meet with a set of vessels, which, on account of the transparency of the fluid which they contain, are called lymphatics. They begin from surfaces and cavities in all parts of the body as absorbents; and, like the veins, they form, by the union of many smaller vessels, large tubes, and terminate in two trunks, which empty their contents into the veins a little before the veins enter the heart. Thus the lymphatics throw back into the circulation part of the blood which has not been taken up in the process of assimilation. What is unfit for being returned into the circulation is carried off by vessels which open externally upon the surface of the skin, or on the internal surface of the lungs, or in the kidneys and intestinal canal. By these outlets, by perspiration, by exhalation from the lungs, by the urinary and fæcal passages, everything unfit for remaining in the system is drained off.

The lungs, which are so essential to life, consist of different lobes, and are composed of a great number of membranous cells, and of numerous ramifications of blood-vessels, nerves, and lymph tics, all connected by cellular substance. The cells, which constitute the greatest part of the bulk of the lungs, are irregular in their shape; they are very small, and have been estimated at a fiftieth part of an inch in diameter. The number of them is very great; but neither their number nor dimensions can be accurately determined. It is evident, however, that in extent they greatly exceed the surface of the body.

The cells are closely connected and freely communicate with each other, but have no communication with the cellular substance which unites and strengthens them. From the cells there arise small hollow tubes, called bronchiæ, which are enlarged by gradual junctions, till, at the upper part of the thorax, all the tubes on each side unite in one; and the two branches joining together from the windpipe. The numberless ramifications of the pulmonary artery and vein are spread over every part of the cellular substance of the lungs, and carry the circulating fluid throughout the whole of those spongy bodies, so that the blood in the vessels and the air in the cells are brought into such a state of contiguity that they can act on each other. Each of the ribs is moveable between the bodies of the vertebræ with which it is connected; and the breast bone, by its connexion with the ribs, partakes of their motion; consequently the cavity of the chest, in which the lungs are lodged, is susceptible of considerable dilatation and contraction; and these changes in its dimensions are much assisted by the contractions of the diaphragm, or by the action of the abdominal muscles pressing the bowels upwards. Anatomical minuteness is not the object of the present treatise, and therefore what has now been said may suffice for a general account of the organ of respiration; and the structure and functions of this organ exhibit decisive evidence, not only of design, but of admirable contrivance also.

An animal which has once respired cannot exist without the continuance of the process. Some animals need more atmospheric air, some less; but none can live long without it. The assertions that can be opposed to this fact are few and doubtful. We have been told of serpents and worms that have been found alive in the heart of stones, and of toads enclosed in trees and rocks. But, admitting this, it is obvious there must have been some communication between the external air and the bed of the animal. Air insinuates itself into the cell constructed by the mason-bee for the lodgment of its eggs, although that cell seems hermetically sealed; and there is every reason to believe that it likewise penetrates to the animal embedded in a rock or tree. Experiment shows that this is not mere supposition, for the toad expires under the exhausted receiver of an air-pump; and, if put into a vessel large enough to contain it with ease, but which is hermetically sealed, it does not long survive. The frog leaps away wanting its head or its heart, and it survives the loss of the greater part of its spinal marrow. Eels and serpents can move for some time even after evisceration. Snails and chameleons can live long on air alone. But the life of all animals is soon extinguished on the exclusion of air.

Such is the fact in nature; and accordingly, every animated being, in one way or another, can imbibe or absorb atmospheric air. What is the provision made in man for the accomplishment of this essential purpose? He has lungs, consisting as we have already seen of a vast multitude of communicating cells, for the reception of the air, and by means of them that invisible fluid is brought into such a state of contiguity with the blood that they can act upon each other; and by a process, which the present state of our knowledge does not enable us fully to explain, the blood extracts a vital nutriment from the air, or the air carries off a deleterious substance from the blood, or both. The lungs instantly expel the portion of air that has thus discharged its office, and take in a fresh portion to pass through a similar process. This inspiration and expiration are essential to human life. It may be added that while air thus taken into the lungs supports life, if it be thrown into the vascular system it quickly brings on agitation, convulsions, and death.

It is now a well known fact that atmospheric air is not a homogeneous fluid, but consists of three different gases, called oxygen, nitrogen, and carbonic acid, which though of different specific gravities are always found together; and an atmosphere thus constituted is the best fitted for supporting animal and vegetable life. The lungs did not form the atmosphere, nor did the atmosphere create the lungs, yet the organ of the body and the external element are admirably adapted to each other; the lungs to bring the air into a state of contiguity with the blood, and the blood and air to exercise a reciprocal action. There is always a large proportion of blood in the lungs, and consequently in a state of contiguity with the air in the cells. The blood performs a complete circulation in a short time, and during that space the whole of it passes through the lungs.

It is not long since respiration was in any degree understood, and still there remains much room for investigation and discovery. But we know that the air undergoes a great change in the lungs, and produces a remarkable effect on the blood. Air does not issue from the lungs in the same state in which it entered them. Its quantity is somewhat diminished; it has lost a portion of its oxygen, in the room of which it has gained about eight per cent. in bulk of carbonic acid, thrown out probably from the exhalent vessels of the lungs; and it is loaded with aqueous vapour. Besides, it is a well known fact that arterial and venous blood are not of the same colour. The blood has more of a vermilion redness on leaving the heart to proceed in the circulation than on its return to the right ventricle. This change of colour is produced in the lungs, and is occasioned perhaps by the ejection of carbon, and the absorption of the disengaged caloric of the oxygen that has disappeared in that organ. Whatever theory we adopt with respect to respiration, whether we consider it as acting by absorption or exhalation; as the means of imparting a vital nutriment, or of carrying off something which, if allowed to remain in the system, would almost instantaneously extinguish life; or whether we combine these notions, in any case we see a grand purpose accomplished. We clearly see the end, although the physiological process be not fully understood.

Respiration is likely the chief cause of animal heat, for the temperature of arterial blood is higher than that of venous; the temperature of the left side of the heart than that of the right; and the temperature diminishes as the distance from the heart increases. That atmospheric air contains a considerable portion of caloric is no hypothetical assumption. It can be demonstrated; for air, when rapidly compressed, gives out both light and caloric; and an instrument has been constructed for procuring fire by this process. It is probable that the portion of oxygen gas which disappears in respiration is converted into the carbonic acid which is thrown out of the lungs. But the specific caloric of this last is greatly inferior to that of the former; consequently a large quantity of heat is set free in the lungs when the conversion of gases takes place. This liberated heat passes into the blood, and is given out by it in the circulation. Thus a quantity of caloric is disengaged in the lungs in every respiration, and by means of the blood is diffused throughout the body, warming and enlivening it. What wonderful adaptations are here presented! What a gracious provision for supporting human life!

There seems to be a correspondence between the respiration and comparative heat of different animals. The temperature of fish which oxidate the blood by gills, is not much above that of the surrounding medium. In man, the ordinary temperature near the surface of the body is about 96° Fahrenheit; and in most of the mammalia it is somewhat higher. In birds, the lungs of which are differently constituted, and much larger in proportion to the size of the animal, the temperature is still higher than in the mammalia. We may add that birds are exceedingly delicate as to air, and die in air where a mouse lives without any perceptible inconveniency.

The fœtus in utero is nourished by the respiratory organs of the parent. Any interruption between those organs and the fœtus would soon prove fatal to the latter, on the same principle as the stoppage of respiration, after the animal has once breathed, soon extinguishes life. The respiratory organs are provided before they are needed, and are ready to act as soon as there is occasion for them. In respiration we have both the planning and the execution of an extensive and complicated process. We see wonderful combinations and adaptations in order to the accomplishment of a beneficial end; and, by the constitution of our minds, we are constrained to acknowledge design and skilful contrivance in the combinations and adaptations.

In connexion with respiration, we may take notice of the voice and the faculty of speech. The principal organ of the voice is the larynx: if it be injured, the air passes through the windpipe without emitting any sound. Besides the larynx, the organs of speech are the tongue, palate, and teeth. With what promptitude does the tongue obey the understanding and will, and communicate a vast variety of impulses to the air! Alphabetical writing, in which we paint sounds, and express all our thoughts by the varied combination of a few arbitrary signs, is justly accounted an astonishing invention. It is a brilliant display of design and skilful contrivance. But is not that combination of organs by which we readily utter such a variety of articulate sounds far more wonderful? How great is that wisdom which formed the organs of speech!

The continual drain by perspiration, and by the urinary and fæcal passages, requires a constant supply. This supply is bountifully furnished by nature around us; appetite tells us when it is needed, and what quantity is sufficient, and we are provided with a wonderful apparatus for its reception and elaboration. Let us then take a cursory view of the intestinal and alimentary canal. The food is received into the mouth, and masticated by the teeth. Now, the food does not make the teeth, but the teeth are evidently formed for the mastication of the food. They are also of importance in aiding the articulation of the voice. Infants, for whom a liquid aliment is provided, and who have not acquired the use of speech, have them not; but they make their appearance when they are wanted.

The organs of taste are stationed in the mouth, with those of smelling in their vicinity, to warn us against the admission of anything noxious into the stomach; and these senses, when they are not vitiated by unnatural habits, are not only faithful monitors, but sources of much enjoyment. Are there no marks of intelligence, design and contrivance, in fixing the teeth just where they are needed, and in the only place where they can be useful? Is there no wisdom and no benignity in guarding the avenue to the stomach, not only by the eye, which inspects every substance presented to the mouth, but also by the organs of smell and taste, posted at the very entrance of the alimentary canal, to detect everything unwholesome in the food which may have escaped the vigilance of the eye? No man in the right use of reason can affirm it.

In tracing the food in its progress, the marks of gracious design and skilful contrivance still accompany us, and multiply as we proceed. The trachea or windpipe, the upper part of which is called the larynx, communicates with the œsophagus, or passage to the stomach. If the minutest part of our food pass into the trachea, it never fails to produce a violent cough, and sometimes very alarming symptoms. This accident, however, seldom happens. How is it prevented? By a very simple but skilful contrivance. A neat, elastic, cartilaginous lid, called epiglottis, is so attached to the mouth of the windpipe as to be pressed down by the food, which it prevents from passing towards the lungs, while the passage to the stomach remains unimpeded. At the same time the velum palati, drawn backwards by its muscles, closes the openings of the nose and of the Eustachian tubes, and so prevents the food from returning through the nose, which sometimes happens partially in drinking. Moreover, in the act of deglutition, the larynx, which being composed of cartilaginous rings, in its ordinary state compresses the œsophagus, is carried forwards and upwards by muscles destined for the purpose, and consequently dilates the opening of the gullet. On reaching the gullet, the food is carried down by the principle of gravity: and a mechanical contrivance also lends its aid. The muscular fibres of the œsophagus contract from above, and press the aliment forward to the stomach. This is obvious in drinking with the head downwards, when deglutition can be performed by the muscular action of the œsophagus only.

The food soon reaches the stomach, a membranous bag, or dilatation of the alimentary canal, where it is accumulated and undergoes new processes. In its process towards the stomach the food is broken and divided by the teeth, and attenuated by the saliva, a powerful solvent. On reaching the stomach it is subjected to the operation of a new chemical agent, the gastric juice, a liquid secreted chiefly by that organ. The nature of this liquid is not yet fully known. Its taste, colour, and solvent powers are different in different classes of animals. Some living creatures cannot digest that which is the food of others. Some animals, such as sheep, live wholly upon vegetables; their stomachs do not digest animal substances. Others, as the eagle, feed entirely on animal substances: their stomachs do not digest vegetables. Hemlock is poisonous to man; but goats eat it without injury.

The gastric juice does not continue always of the same nature, even in the same animal. It is in some measure modified according to the age, the health, the habits, and the different aliments on which the animal subsists. Sick persons and children are incapable of digesting the food which is nutritious to a healthy man. Some graminivorous animals may be brought to live on animal food, and to reject grass; and some carnivorous animals may be accustomed to vegetables. But still the gastric juice, although it in some measure accommodates itself to the substances subjected to its operation, evidently appears to have peculiar qualities in certain classes of animals. In the dog it dissolves hard bones, but, in equal times, makes no great impression on potatoes, parsnips, and other vegetable substances. On the other hand, in the sheep and ox it speedily dissolves vegetables, but makes little impression on animal bodies. Different tribes of animals are distinguished by their gastric juice as well as by their external form, and both are well suited, in every instance, to the habits of the creature; for in many cases there is an astonishing correspondence between the teeth and that liquid. The teeth of graminivorous animals are differently formed from those of the carnivorous tribes; and in both they are wonderfully suited to the food and to the gastric juice of the animal. He who can believe that all these adaptations are the result of chance is no enemy to credulity.

The gastric juice, while it dissolves food, even although enclosed in perforated metallic tubes, spares the living stomach. But, when life ceases, this liquid often acts on the very organ from which it has been secreted. It differs from a chemical solvent, in having an assimilating power, by which it reduces all substances whether animal or vegetable, into a soft pulpy mass named chyme, and prepares them for passing from the stomach into the intestines. If the food has been properly digested in the stomach, on reaching the lower orifice of that organ, named pylorus, it is freely allowed to pass. But if it is not fully reduced to chyme, then, by a sort of instinctive sensibility of the pylorus, it is thrown back into the stomach to undergo more thoroughly the action of the gastric juice. In the intestines, the chyme is mingled with the bile and pancreatic juice. In short, from one extremity of the alimentary canal to the other, fluids are perpetually flowing into it from the glands and other sources. By the action of these fluids, and of the intestines, the chyme is formed partly into chyle, which is absorbed by the lacteals, and thrown into the circulation, and partly into excrementitious matter, which is ejected from the body.

Here then we see an astonishing process carried on by the instrumentality of many different parts, all nicely adapted to each other, all co-operating in the same work, and tending to the accomplishment of the same end; the support and nourishment of the body. The mastication and deglutition of the food, and the moistening of it with the saliva before it enters the stomach; the great change which it undergoes in that organ, chiefly by means of the dissolving and assimilating action of the gastric juice; the changes induced upon the aliment after it passes from the stomach; the separation of chyle from the excrementitious part; the absorption of the chyle by the lacteals, which throw it into the blood; the mysterious process of assimilation; the peristaltic motion of the viscera; the mucus which is continually secreted for their protection against the acrimony of their contents; and the ejection of the excrementitious matter from the body; these, when all taken together, exhibit an astonishing process. They furnish an undeniable proof not only of design and admirable contrivance, but of great benignity also. What an amazing structure is the body of Man! How wonderful the absorbent, the circulatory, secretory, and excrementory apparatus of the human system! We are wonderfully made, and the marks of wisdom and goodness are deeply impressed on every part of our frame.

To sum up all, on this part of the subject, in a few words; let any person contemplate the human body; let him attentively examine the skeleton, the figure and structure of the bones of which it is composed, with their articulations; the muscles, their origin, insertion, strength, and action; the organs of sense, the eye, the ear, the nostrils, the tongue and palate, and the sense of feeling diffused over the whole body; the structure of the jaws, the stomach, and other viscera; the structure and action of the lungs, and organs of speech; and if he can retire from the examination without a deep impression of intelligence and design, yea of wisdom and goodness, in the human frame, there can be but little doubt that his understanding is singularly obtuse, or his heart singularly depraved. Every mind, open to the force of evidence and to the impressions of truth, must join in the exclamation of an ancient sage, "I am fearfully and wonderfully made."

It may here be remarked, that as food nourishes the body, so sleep refreshes both body and mind. This mysterious phenomenon we are unable to explain; but its periodical return is necessary to life, and by it a beneficial end is accomplished. There is an obvious relation between sleep and the rotation of the earth on its axis. They are harmonious parts of one whole.

CHAPTER IV.

THE INFERIOR ANIMALS.

Man is evidently the noblest inhabitant of the earth. He is not, indeed, so strong as the elephant, nor so swift as the antelope; his eye is not so piercing as that of the eagle, nor his sense of smell so exquisite as that of the dog: but the high faculties of his mind give him superiority and dominion over the whole animal creation. Around us we see a vast variety of objects, possessing very different qualities. These objects do not stand at a great distance from each other: they are wonderfully linked together, rising above each other by almost imperceptible degrees. The system of nature is a system of insensible gradations. The two extremes of organic and inorganic matter, perhaps, meet at a common point. Corals and corallines seem to unite the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms. The boundaries of animal and vegetable life are obscurely defined, and the interval between the polypus and man is filled up with an amazing gradation of animated beings. The progress from unorganized to organized matter, from vegetable to animal, and from animal to rational existence, presents an astonishing and gradually-ascending series. In the whole progression we see a striking uniformity of plan, with a rich variety in the execution: beautiful analogies and nice distinctions everywhere occur.

It is animal existence which, at present, claims our attention. The earth, the air, and the water, are all abundantly replenished with sentient beings, differing in their external appearance, their habits, and their dispositions; and all enjoying happiness according to their several constitutions. Man unquestionably stands at the head of this system of animated being; and there seems to be a much larger interval between him and the most sagacious of the inferior animals, than what occurs in any other part of the gradation. It is true, indeed, that in a number of instances, we find man in a state little superior to that of the brutes: but, in the view under consideration, we must take his capacity of improvement into our estimate. My full conviction is, that if we were to examine animals in every gradation from the polypus to man, we should meet with incontrovertible evidences of design, and wise and benevolent contrivance, in every stage of our progress. But a field of this kind is greatly too extensive for our present purpose. It would be, no doubt, both pleasant and instructive leisurely to pass through the whole animal kingdom, and to examine with minute attention everything that fell in our way. This, however, would lead into voluminous details, instead of a concise treatise. My limits confine me to a few remarks; and as neither comparative anatomy nor natural history is my object, I shall pay no attention to systematic arrangement, but shall endeavour to show,

I. That the form of the inferior animals is admirably adapted to their manner of life.

II. That they are provided with suitable clothing.

III. That they possess means of defence suited to their condition.

IV. That they are qualified for procuring their food.

V. That we meet with surprising adaptations of animals to peculiar circumstances.

VI. That each kind is capable of continuing its species.

Under each of these heads, I shall mention a number of particulars respecting the inferior animals: these particulars will be of a very miscellaneous nature; but, I presume, will all tend to show wise design and benevolent contrivance in nature.

I. The form of the inferior animals is admirably adapted to their manner of life.

1. In the form of the different kinds of quadrupeds there is great variety; but amidst all the variety we perceive the same general plan; the same great outline appears in the skeleton, in the articulations of the bones, in the disposition, form, and insertion of the muscles; and in several other circumstances, all accommodated to the peculiar nature and habits of the animal. The organs of sense, of digestion, of circulation, and of generation, occur in all the species, but are varied according to the destination of each.

In order to support the head of quadrupeds, they are furnished with a very strong ligament firmly bracing the head to the vertebræ of the back. This ligament arises from the spines of the dorsal and cervical vertebræ, which are lengthened out for that purpose, and is fixed to the middle and posterior part of the occipital bone. It is of great strength and size in all quadrupeds; but is remarkably so in the elephant, where the great weight of the head requires a strong support. This ligament is wanting in man, because he did not need it; but it is of great use to quadrupeds, and they are provided with it. Here, as in every other department of nature, the provision is suited to the exigency of the case.

In graminivorous animals we see a remarkable correspondence between the length of the legs and the length of the neck. According to the ancient fable, Tantalus was set up to the chin in water. and apples were at his lips; but he had no power to stoop to the one to quench his thirst, or to reach up to the other to satisfy his hunger. There is nothing like this in nature. All animals are capable of gathering their food. Herbage is abundantly provided for the graminivorous tribes, and there is such acorrespondence between their necks and their legs that they can easily reach it.

2. The external figure of birds is excellently adapted to the mode of life which they are destined to pursue. They can either walk on the ground, or by the action of their wings rise buoyant on the air, and pass through it with great rapidity, somewhat like fish in water. Their wings are moved by remarkably strong muscles, and their tail serves as a rudder to direct their course. In most cases their heads are small. The proper bones of the cranium, at least in adult animals, are not joined by sutures, but are consolidated into a single piece. This small and compact head generally termitates in a sharp-pointed beak; and the breast-bone is formed somewhat like the prow of a ship, so that the bird can pass easily through the air. The wings are placed more forward than the middle part of the body; and, at first sight, we should be ready to imagine that, in flying, the posterior parts would hang down, and that the bird would be unable to preserve the body in a horizontal position. But by stretching out its head, which acts upon the lever of a long neck, by filling its abdominal sacs with air, and by expanding the tail, it alters the centre of gravity, and keeps its body nearly in the plane of the horizon. The legs of birds are placed far back in their bodies; but, by erecting the head and neck, they throw the centre of gravity on the feet. As birds are destined to pass rapidly through the atmosphere, so their internal configuration. as well as their external form, is happily fitted for volitation. They harmoniously conspire for the purpose, and so run into each other that I shall consider them together.

Receptacles of air pervade the whole bodies of birds, and their respiratory organs constitute one of the most singular structures in the animal economy. Their respiration is performed by means of lungs which are fixed to the back bone, and which have a communication with air cells spread over the whole abdomen, and also with hollow bones, which, instead of marrow, are filled with air. And not the hollow bones only are filled with air, but the pinions also: in some cases, the communication even extends to analogous cavities in the muscles. In those birds which soar highest, such as the eagle, the hawk, and the lark, the cavities in the bones and below the muscles are very large. This great diffusion of air throughout the bodies of birds makes them specifically lighter than otherwise they would have been, and so fits them for supporting themselves in that medium through which they are destined to pass. If we consider the rarefaction of the included air by the heat of the animal, we will easily perceive that these air cells enable the bird to fly with much more ease than it could have done if it had been formed like quadrupeds.

The air cells seem likewise to supply the place of a diaphragm. and of strong abdominal muscles. Without adding anything to the weight of the body, they produce the same effect on the viscera as those muscles would have done. Probably they are also of much importance to the respiration of the bird. The ostrich, indeed, which does not fly, is provided with them; but from the use which it makes of its wings in running, they no doubt contribute to the rapidity of its motion. The bat has them not; but its structure is peculiar, and its flight is never long. Birds have no bladder of urine; but an ureter proceeds from each kidney, and terminates in the rectum, consequently the urine is discharged along with the fæces. This seems to be a contrivance for making the animal lighter. Here we see a conformation of parts evidently fitted to the bird's manner of life. The wings did not form the pointed beak and sharp breast bone, nor did they create the air vesicles: and, on the other hand, the pointed beak and the air vesicles did not give existence to the wings. They exist independently on each other; yet they all harmonize and contribute to the same end. The inference is obvious and irresistible.

3. Of the inhabitants of the water there is a prodigious variety: but one general figure, subject to different modifications, prevails among fish. Their form is well fitted for traversing the fluid in which they reside; and, by means of their fins and tails, many of them can pass through the water with great rapidity. Men, in some measure, imitate the shape of fish in the construction of fast-sailing vessels. But many fishes, with the greatest ease. overtake a ship under sail, play around it as if it were motionless, and dart off before it at pleasure. The tail is the great instrument of progressive motion; the fins serving chiefly to keep the body upright.

Fish are furnished with organs of respiration suited to the element which they inhabit. Instead of lungs they have gills, or bronchiæ, which are placed behind the head on each side; and, in most instances, have a movable gill cover. By means of these organs, which are connected with the throat, the animal draws its oxygen from the air contained in the water, as animals with lungs derive it immediately from the atmosphere. Fish discharge the water through the bronchial openings, and thus their expiration and inspiration are performed through different passages. The heart of fish is very small in proportion to the body. Its structure is simple, consisting of a single auricle and ventricle, which correspond with the right side of the heart in warm-blooded animals. The ventricle gives rise to a single arterial trunk, going straight forward to the bronchiæ, whence the blood passes into a large artery, analogous to the aorta, which goes along the spine and supplies the body of the animal. It is returned by the venæ cavæ into the auricle.

The temperature of the inhabitants of the water is nearly the same with that of the element in which they reside; and fish need less air than hot-blooded animals. Still they need a certain portion of air, and soon expire under the exhausted receiver of an air-pump. Berzelius, indeed, has stated that a fish may continue alive for several days in water which is void of air, and that it cannot be observed that the least decomposition of the water has taken place by its respiration. But he has not told us whether he means to assert that this takes place under the exhausted receiver of an air-pump, or only when there is a free communication between the water and the atmosphere. A fish lives in a narrow-mouthed vessel filled with water, so long as the communication with the external air remains open; but soon dies if that communication be completely shut up. If a hole be broken in a frozen lake, the fish quickly repair to the place. Hence, in winter, the North American Indians, when their provisions fail, break a hole in the ice, and commonly succeed in obtaining a fresh supply by fishing.*

As fish have no lungs, so we have already seen their heart has only one auricle and one ventricle. Now the heart did not create the respiratory organs, nor did the respiratory organs form the heart; yet they are evidently adapted to each other. Many fishes are provided with a swimming bladder, which lies close to the back-bone, and has a strong muscular coat. The fish can either contract or dilate this bladder; and, rendering itself specifically lighter or heavier, can descend or ascend at pleasure. Flounders, and some other fishes, which want this bladder, are always found grovelling at the bottom of the water. This, however, is not universally the case; for fishes of the cartilaginous kind want air bladders, and yet they easily rise to the top or sink to the bottom; and although most of the eel kind have air bladders, yet they cannot raise themselves in the water without difficulty. It is probable, therefore, that this bladder serves other purposes in the economy of the fish besides enabling it to rise and sink in the water.

The natatory bladder is largest in such fishes as swim with considerable velocity. It is wanting in flat fishes, where the large lateral fins supply its place, and in the shark, where its absence is compensated by the size and strength of the tail. It does not exist in the lamprey, which possesses none of these compensations; and therefore it creeps slowly at the bottom of the water. In fresh water fishes, the air bladder, according to Erman's experiments, contains nitrogen gas mixed with varying proportions of oxygen gas; but this last is never found in it in the same proportion as in atmospheric air. Biot found that in salt-water fishes, it contained oxygen gas increasing in proportion as the fish was in the habit of living at a great depth.† This bladder communicates generally with the œsophagus, and sometimes with the stomach. The whale tribe and the web-footed mammalia, which breathe by lungs, must often rise to the surface for the purpose of respiration.

* River water has rather less than $\frac{1}{16}$ of its bulk of air. This air contains about $\frac{11}{100}$ of oxygen; from $\frac{6}{100}$ to $\frac{11}{100}$ carbonic acid; the remainder is nitrogen.—See Ellis, Inq. No. 551, &c.

Some of the inhabitants of the water present a singular appearance. Their bones, instead of being placed internally, form their exterior covering. They stand low in the scale of animal existence; but even in them we see a wise and gracious provision for the preservation of the creature. The muscle. for instance, has a locomotive power: on looking at it we should be apt to imagine that it would be the sport of the waves, and be dashed to pieces against the rocks in a storm. It, however, has the power of securing itself against this danger, and of providing for its safety, by forming certain viscous threads, about two inches long, by means of which it firmly attaches itself to the rock, as by a cable and anchor. Upwards of a hundred and fifty of these cables are sometimes employed in mooring a single muscle. Here we see means of preservation well adapted to the state and circumstances of the animal.

4. In the different classes of animals there is a wonderful adaptation of the organs of sense to the structure of the rest of the body, and to the animal's peculiar manner of life. Of this I shall take the eye as an example.

All animals have two eyes: some insects have more. In man the eyes are directed forwards, harmonizing with the form and articulations of the upper and lower extremities, and with the configuration of the whole body. In most of the inferior animals, the eye has an oblique direction. The simiæ and the owl look straight forward. The motions of the human eye are performed by six muscles: quadrupeds have a seventh, named, from its office, the suspensory muscle. It sustains the weight of the globe of the eye, and prevents the optic nerve from being too much stretched, when the animal is obliged to hold its eyes in a hanging posture, and to look downwards in choosing and gathering its food. In man, on account of his erect posture, this muscle is not needed, and in the human subject it is not found; but to quadrupeds, by reason of their prone posture, it is of great utility, and they are provided with it. Now the suspensory muscle does not occasion the prone posture of the animal, and the prone posture does not create the suspensory muscle, for it comes into the world with the quadruped; yet the one is adapted to the other. Is there not design, yea benevolent design, and skilful contrivance, in this adaptation?

Many animals, but especially birds, whose eyes are much exposed to injury in passing through woods and thickets, are provided with a somewhat transparent covering for the eye, called the nictating membrane. It admits as many rays as render objects visible, and protects the organ of vision in circumstances of danger. It screens the eye when the bird is flying directly against the rays of the sun; and by means of it, according to Cuvier, the eagle is enabled to look at that luminary. It also serves to clense the cornea, an operation which man can perform with his hand. It is drawn over the globe of the eye by the combined action of two very singular muscles, which are fitted for the purpose with much mechanical skill.

The eyes of fish, being much exposed to danger in the inconstant element in which they reside, always have a cuticle or firm pellucid membrane over them. Indeed their eyes differ, in several respects, from those of other animals, and are wonderfully accommodated to the medium in which fish exist. The vitreous humour is very small, and the aqueous sometimes scarcely perceptible. The water, in a great measure, supplies the place of those two humours; but, that refraction may be duly carried on and vision accomplished, the crystalline is very large, almost spherical, and more dense than in terrestrial animals. In birds these circumstances are reversed; they are often in a somewhat elevated region of the atmosphere, and the rays which pass through that rare medium are refracted by the aqueous humour, which in birds is of a large size. Man, and the mammalia, living on the surface of the earth, hold a middle place between these two extremes. The tapetum, or mucous which lines the posterior surface of the iris, the ciliary processes, and part of the tunica choroides, is of different colours in different kinds of animals; and in each it is admirably fitted to the creature's manner of life. White reflects the rays of light; black absorbs them. Accordingly the tapetum is either white, or of some vivid colour which reflects the light strongly, in those animals which seek their prey by night. The cat and the owl have the tapetum whitish, and the pupil capable of much contraction and dilatation. On the other hand the tapetum of birds in general, but especially of eagles, hawks, and other birds of prey, is black; by which means they are enabled to see with the greatest distinctness, but only in clear daylight. Man is designed to labour chiefly by day, and his tapetum is neither so black as that of birds, nor so white as that of those animals which make the greatest use of their eyes in the dark. Animals which are much under ground, as the mole and the shrew, have the eyes very small. In the former of these its existence has been altogether denied; and it is not, in fact, larger than a pin's head. In some reptiles, the common integuments form, instead of eyelids, a kind of firm window, behind which the eyeball has a free motion.

5. Quadrupeds are divided into the carnivorous and the herbivorous. As their food is different, so a difference in the teeth indicates the class to which the animal belongs. As the teeth of the graminivorous, particularly of the ruminating kinds, are more constantly employed than those of the carnivorous kinds, so they are more thoroughly provided with enamel. There is also a considerable difference in the articulations of the jaws of quadrupeds. In the feræ the articulation admits only of the hinge movement: but in the herbivorous quadrupeds, particularly in the ruminating kinds, the articulation admits of a very free lateral motion. Here there is an obvious correspondence between the form and the habits of the animal.

There is a striking relation between the teeth, and the other instruments of mastication, and the stomach. The sheep, deer, and ox tribes, are destitute of foreteeth in the upper jaw: but the trituration of their food is completed by rumination. The horse and ass do not chew the cud, but they are provided with suitable teeth in the upper jaw for masticating the food and preparing it for the action of the gastric juice. The gastric juice of ruminating animals does not perform its specific operation upon the food till the cud has been chewed; and the animal seems to have as much gratification in chewing the cud as in pasturing. It then appears to be in a state of the most tranquil enjoyment.

Birds have no teeth; but the herbivorous and graminivorous kinds are furnished with the gizzard, a powerful instrument for grinding the food, and preparing it for the action of the gastric juice. This juice does not act on the unbroken grain, but the animal is provided with the means of grinding it. Now the gizzard did not form the bill of the bird, nor did the bill give existence to the gizzard; yet they are exactly fitted to each other. Teeth and a gizzard are not found together.

Instead of extending these remarks, I shall close this section by inserting some of the conclusions of Cuvier, so distinguished by his knowledge in comparative anatomy. "Every organized individual," says he, "forms an entire system of its own, all the parts of which must mutually correspond, and concur to produce a certain definite purpose, by reciprocal reaction, or by combining towards the same end. Hence none of these separate parts can change their forms without a corresponding change in the other parts of the same animal, and consequently each of their parts taken separately indicates all the other parts to which it has belonged. Thus, if the viscera of an animal are so organized as to be fitted for the digestion of recent flesh only, it is also requisite that the jaws should be so constructed as to fit them for devouring prey; the claws must be constructed for seizing and tearing it to pieces; the teeth for cutting and dividing its flesh; the entire system of the limbs, or organs of motion, for pursuing and overtaking it; and the organs of sense for discovering it at a distance.—The shape and structure of the teeth regulate the forms of the condyle, of the shoulder-blade, and of the claws; so that a claw, a shoulder-blade, a condyle, a leg or arm bone, or any other bone separately considered, enables us to discover the description of teeth to which they have belonged; and so also reciprocally we may determine the forms of the other bones from the teeth. Thus commencing our investigations by a careful survey of any one bone by itself, a person who is sufficiently master of the laws of organic structure may, as it were, reconstruct the whole animal to which that bone had belonged.—The smallest fragment of bone, even the most apparently insignificant apophysis, possesses a fixed and determinate character, relative to the class, order, genus, and species of the animal to which it belonged; insomuch that, when we find merely the extremity of a well preserved bone, we are able, by careful examination, assisted by analogy and exact comparison, to determine the species to which it once belonged as certainly as if we had the entire animal before us."*

* Cuvier's Theory, p. 90, &c.

II. The clothing of the inferior animals is completely adapted to the climate which they inhabit, and to the different seasons of the year. In Kamtschatka, Lapland, and the higher latitudes of North America, they are clothed with thick and warm furs; but in tropical climates they are almost naked.

The musk-ox, a native of high latitudes, is provided in winter with a thick and fine wool, or fur, which grows at the root of the long hair, and shelters him from the intense cold to which he is exposed in that season. But as the summer advances this fur loosens from the skin, and by the animal's frequent rolling himself on the ground, it works out to the end of the hair, and in due time drops off, leaving little for summer clothing except the long hair. As the warm weather is of short duration in those high latitudes, the new fleece begins to appear almost as soon as the old one drops off, so that he is again provided with a winter dress before the cold becomes intense. The clothing is suited to the season. Where are the animals found which furnish materials for the fur trade? Not within the tropics; but in countries bordering on the Arctic circle. The elephant is a native of hot climates, and he goes naked. Rein-deer abound in Lapland and in the vicinity of Hudson's Bay, and they have a coat of strong dense hair. The white bear is found on the coast of Greenland, and his shaggy covering is suited to that high latitude. In a word, if we pass from the equator to Spitzbergen and Nova Zembla, we shall find in all the intermediate degrees, that the clothing of quadrupeds is suited to their climate, and accommodates itself to the season of the year.

Man is the only naked animal in all countries; and he is the only creature qualified to provide clothing for himself, and to accommodate that clothing to every climate, and to all the variety of the seasons. In this, as in every other respect, his condition is suited to his nature, as a being whose improvement and happiness are promoted by labour of body and exercise of mind.

If we pass to the clothing of birds, we still find benevolent contrivance, suited to the circumstances and providing for the welfare of the animal. This clothing consists of feathers, which are very bad conductors of heat, and which consequently permit the heat of the animal to pass off very slowly into the circumambient medium. The feathers are so inserted into the skin as naturally to lie backwards from the head, and to lap over each other, like tiles on a roof, allowing the rain to run off. When the head of the bird is turned towards the wind, the feathers are not discomposed by the most violent storm. The rump of birds terminates in a large gland, which secretes an oily substance; and when the feathers are too dry, or any way disordered, the bird squeezes the oil out of this gland, and dresses them with it. Thus the admission of water is prevented; and the bird, by means of its feathers, is sheltered both from cold and rain. Water-fowls have their breast covered with warm and soft clothing, suited to their circumstances. The eider-duck abounds on the coasts of Iceland; and the warmth of eider-down is well known. While the feathers of birds thus preserve them from cold, they are also a sort of defensive armour, and excellent instruments of motion.

The temperature of fish is not much above that of the medium in which they reside; and they have not, in general, any great occasion for warm clothing. Nevertheless they are provided with a scaly coat of mail, and are covered with a slimy and glutinous matter, which not only defends their bodies from the immediate contact of the surrounding fluid, but probably facilitates their motion through the water also. Under the scales, and before we come to the muscular part of the body, we meet with an oily substance, which contributes to the preservation of the requisite warmth. The whale is a hot-blooded animal, and resides chiefly in polar regions; but he is wrapped up in a thick coat of blubber, which defends him from the cold. Other inhabitants of the water in high latitudes, as the walrus, enjoy a similar security against the rigour of the element to which they are exposed. Can we seriously attend to the clothing of animals, without recognizing in it the hand of a wise and beneficent First Cause?

III. Every animated being is endued with the love of life, and the desire of self-preservation; and is also furnished with the means of acting in conformity to this instinctive principle of its nature. Every animal can search for its food, and choose what is proper for its subsistence. But, at present, I shall shortly attend to the means which different animals possess of securing themselves against danger, and of defending themselves from their enemies. Every animal possesses, in a certain degree, the means of self-preservation, either by resistance or flight. Some animals have formidable instruments of offence in their horns, teeth, claws, hoofs, or sting: others trust for safety to the swiftness of their course, or velocity of their flight; and some defend themselves by emitting a repulsive odour.

In gregarious animals, although the individual, in some instances, is weak and timid, yet the herd or flock can assume an imposing attitude, and make a vigorous defence. No creatures are more timid and defenceless than sheep, when under the protection of man. In the natural state, however, the rams, constituting the half of the flock, place themselves in battle array against the enemy, and dogs can make no impression upon them. Even the lion or tiger is unable to resist their united impetuosity and force! A single goat can choose his position on the rock, and set the dog at defiance. Horses join heads together, and fight with their heels; oxen join tails and fight with their horns; all place their young in the centre, that they may be safe during the battle. In perilous cases elephants march in troops; the oldest in front, the young and feeble in the centre, those of middle age and mature vigour in the rear. When at a distance from danger they travel with less precaution, never however separating so far but that they can hear one another's cries, and afford timely assistance.

The mole is well-formed for digging, and escapes from its pursuers by penetrating into the earth: the hedge-hog rolls itself up in a prickly envelope: the hare is well-fitted for running, and trusts to its swiftness for safety. The innocuous lama, which uses neither feet nor teeth against its enemies, is not destitute of means of defence. It is provided, we are told, with an acrimonious saliva, which, when offended, it can eject to the distance of several yards. This saliva occasions troublesome cutaneous eruptions where it touches.* Some animals are furnished with peculiar glands and bags at the end of the rectum, which secrete and contain a remarkably fetid substance; and this substance the animal can at pleasure throw out against its pursuers. The zurilla, a species of weazel about the size of a rabbit, found in several parts of South America, emits, when angry, such a pestilential vapour as beats off the most formidable adversary. Another inconveniency, says De Pages, which awaits the traveller in this country (between St. Antonio and Mexico), is the abominable smell of an animal, without the agility, but nearly of the size of a rabbit. This creature, when hardly pressed and in jeopardy of being taken, emits a most intolerable stench, which threatens suffocation to his pursuers, and which is eluded only by a precipitate flight. The squash, or Armenian polecat, when pursued or irritated, squirts upon its pursuers an excrementitious liquor of so horrible a smell that neither man nor dog can endure it.

Birds by their different way of flying often escape from their enemies. If the pigeon had the same way of flying as the hawk, it could scarcely ever escape his claws.

If, from the earth and the air, we pass to the ocean, we shall find its inhabitants possessing, in like manner, means of defence and safety. The cuttle-fish, when closely pursued, ejects a fluid black as ink, and conceals itself and escapes by discolouring the water. The excretory duct of the bag which contains this singular secretion opens near the anus. The fluid itself is thick, but so miscible with water that a small quantity of it discolours a considerable body of water. According to Cuvier, the Indian ink is made of this fluid. Some fishes have fins so large and flexible, that, when pursued, they can spring out of their native element, and dart through the air to a considerable distance.

Some of the inhabitants of the water possess peculiar means of defence, by giving electrical shocks. The electrical fluid is widely diffused in nature; and seems to be lodged, in greater or less quantities, in all animals. That there is a considerable portion of it in the human body is evident. Some persons are naturally so much electrified as to give obvious signs of the presence of this fluid, when a delicate electrometer is applied to them; and if their hair is combed, when they are placed on an insulating stool, they emit sparks. But only a very few animals have the power of giving shocks. So far as is at present known, they are all of the aquatic kind: the torpedo, gymnotus electricus, and silurus electricus.

This property of the torpedo has been known since the days of Theophrastus. It has the power of giving a smart shock to the person who touches it. According to Humboldt and Guy Lussac, the contact must be immediate. The shock depends on the will of the animal, which must be irritated before it exerts its peculiar power. The electrical apparatus of the torpedo has some resemblance to a galvanic trough, and seems to act in a similar manner.

* Ulloa, Voyage au Perou, liv. vi. ch. 8. Wilcock's History of Buenos Ayres, p. 458.

The gymnotus electricus is a species of eel peculiar to Surinam river, and is said to be a fresh-water fish only. When of the largest size it is about four feet long, and from ten to fourteen inches in circumference in the thickest part of the body. Its electrical power is greater than that of the torpedo. It gives even the most violent shocks without any movement of the head, eyes, or fins. But when the torpedo gives a shock, a convulsive motion of the pectoral fins may be observed.

The silurus electricus, a fish about twenty inches long, found in some of the rivers of Africa, gives a shock like the torpedo and gymnotus. By means of this singular power, these animals can stun their adversaries and escape by flight.

Insects appear a feeble race; but some of them possess formidable means of defence and annoyance. Their sting is a spear, which they can wield with dexterity in repelling aggression. The fine polish of this little piece of armour has often been remarked, and adduced as an instance of the difference between the workmanship of the Creator and the productions of art. When viewed through a microscope, the point of the finest needle seems rough and blunt; but the sting of a bee, when examined by the glass, is seen to be smooth and beautifully polished. The first displays all its beauties to the naked eye; the instrument reveals its deformities: but the beauty of the last appears the more conspicuous the more narrowly it is inspected. In short, every animal is endued, in a greater or less degree, with the means of self-preservation. If any species be singularly exposed to danger it has the advantage of some great compensating principle, by which it is preserved from extinction. Many of the weaker or more timid animals can elude pursuit by the rapidity of their motions: some are very prolific and can bear a great waste. Here, as in every other department, we see a uniformity of plan, which can only be the fruit of design; and such an adaptation of means to ends as can result from nothing but benevolent intention.

IV. There is a great variety in the tastes and appetites of different kinds of animals; and there is a corresponding variety in the productions of the earth. There seems to be nothing in the wide extent of the vegetable kingdom, but what will yield sustenance to animals of one kind or other. Each species finds food agreeable to its taste and proper to its nature, and animals of one class cannot deprive those of another of their means of subsistence. According to Linnæus, the hog eats 72 kinds of vegetables; the horse 262; the cow 276; the sheep 287; and the goat 449. This diversity of tastes, with the corresponding diversity of productions, is one great means of stocking every part of the earth and of the ocean with inhabitants. Some animals, both by sea and land, are formed only in certain latitudes. Some dwell in polar regions; others chiefly within the tropics; and each finds its peculiar aliment in the place where it resides.

Animals are wonderfully fitted for discovering their means of subsistence. In selecting their food, they rely chiefly on smelling, and this sense does not deceive them. They easily distinguish between the noxious and the salutary, avoiding the one and feeding on the other. Some animals, such as wolves and ravens, discover their food at a distance, which, if we were to judge from our own sense of smelling, would appear altogether incredible. Others, as the eagle, the hawk, and the gull, have an amazingly acute eye; and, from a great height, perceive mice, birds, and other objects of prey.

As the different kinds of animals are admirably qualified for discovering their food, so they are well formed for gathering or seizing it. In graminivorous quadrupeds, there is a remarkable correspondence between the length of the legs and that of the neck. We do not find a very short neck in connection with long legs. The ox, the horse, and the sheep, are examples of the proportions of those different parts of the body. In some of the deer kind, indeed, the neck does not bear the same proportion to the legs, as in the animals now mentioned; but they obtain their food chiefly by browsing on the branches of trees, in which case there is no need for a length of neck corresponding to the legs. They can easily pasture on an ascent; and Vaillant assures us that even the giraffe, the most remarkable of this tribe, is able to drink from a stream, the surface of which is lower than the ground on which he stands.

Monkeys are destined to live on trees; and their four prehensile members enable them to climb with the greatest facility. The tail of several kinds is a farther assistance in this way of life. The natural food of swine is chiefly the roots of plants: and they have a snout fitted for digging up the earth. The goat is formed for ascending rocky precipices, to crop the leaves of those herbs and plants on which he delights. The squirrel feeds on the leaves and fruit of trees; and he is provided with feet which fit him for climbing. Woodpeckers have strong, wedge-like bills, for piercing the bark of trees; and they are provided with a long slender tongue, armed with a sharp bony point, barbed on each side, which, by means of a curious apparatus of muscles, they can dart out to a great length into the chinks of the bark, or into the holes which they have formed with their bills, in order to transfix and draw out the insects lurking there. Their legs and feet are admirably formed for climbing, and even the tail is made to co-operate for the same purpose.

The tongue of the chameleon displays a very curious mechanism. It is contained in a sheath at the lower part of the mouth, and has its extremity covered with a glutinous secretion. It admits of being projected to the length of six inches from the mouth, with wonderful celerity and precision; and the viscous secretion on its extremity entangles the flies, and other similar insects, which constitute the food of the chameleon. Water fowls feed upon fish, insects, and eggs of fish; and their bills, legs, wings, and whole structure, are fitted to their manner of life. The size and strength of the wings correspond with the circumstances of the different kinds of fowls. Birds of prey, which must often seek their food at a distance, have large and strong wings; but in domestic birds, which can find nourishment almost everywhere, the wings are short and small.

Were we to run over the organs of all animals for procuring their food and seizing their prey, from the trunk of the elephant to the blood-sucking apparatus of the gadfly, we should everywhere meet with the most astonishing adaptations, and displays of the most consummate mechanical skill. We see a vast variety of food provided; a corresponding variety of tastes for enjoying it; and all animals furnished in one way or other with organs for taking possession of it. And is this vast, various, and complicated system the work of chance? Is not design, yea are not wisdom and goodness obvious in the provision made for the sustenance of the different kinds of animals, in correspondence to their different tastes and appetites? The food does not form the taste; but the taste directs to the use of the food. Some animals could not live on that which is grateful to the palate of others; and although the animal, in a number of instances, might support a lingering existence on the food which it does not choose, yet, in these cases, it would neither attain the vigour of its nature, nor the usual term of its life. According to all our conceptions, nothing but a designing Being could have furnished provisions suitable to the nature of every animal, and formed each animal with fit organs for gathering that provision.

V. In many instances we find surprising adaptations of animals to peculiar circumstances. Under this head, I shall confine my observations to the camel and the rein-deer: the one a native of the arid plains in the warm and temperate regions of Asia and Africa; the other an inhabitant of high latitudes. The camel is found in warm climates, and on parched and sandy plains; and the structure of his body, and his habits, are accommodated to the circumstances in which he is placed. In the regions which he inhabits, the earth is seldom refreshed with showers; and, in many cases, only a few stunted shrubs or herbs appear in the midst of the sandy wilderness, or around the wells which are thinly scattered in the desert. In this situation, his place could not be supplied to man by any other animal. "The sand," says Denon, "is truly his element; for as soon as he quits it and touches the mud, he can hardly keep upon his feet, and his constant trips alarm the rider for his own safety and that of his baggage." His rough and spongy soles are excellently fitted for traversing the ocean of sand: they do not crack with the heat.

Besides the four stomachs common to ruminating animals, the camel is furnished with a fifth, which serves as a reservoir for containing water. It is peculiar to this animal, and is so capacious that, according to Bruce, it can contain water sufficient to serve him for thirty days. Russell, in his Natural History of Aleppo, mentions a Bassora caravan, in which the camels remained fifteen days without water; but he adds, that the Aleppo and Bassora caravans are seldom more than three or four days without finding wells; although, at times, when obliged to leave the common track, the camels suffer an abstinence of six or seven days. The fifth stomach preserves the water in a state of perfect purity and limpidity, without permitting any part of the aliment, or of the fluids of the body, to mix with it. In traversing the vast burning deserts, which without his aid no human power could pass, when the camel is pressed with thirst, or has occasion for water to macerate his dry food in ruminating, he makes part of the water mount into his paunch, or even as high as the œsophagus, by the contraction of certain muscles. His stomachs are possessed of a peculiar sensibility, by which each opens to receive the food proper to it. He scents a pool of water half a league off.

As the camel is fitted for marching through the arid wilderness, so he can pass over the most barren region. He can subsist and toil on a very small quantity of food, and that of the coarsest kind, such as wormwood, thistles, broom, thorny shrubs, and other similar fare. When even this rough aliment cannot be obtained, he can subsist on a few pounded dates, or some small paste-balls of bean or barley meal. With a single pound of such food in a day, he can travel for weeks together, upwards of 30 miles a-day, under a load of 750 or 800 pounds. As he is so surprisingly fitted for passing parched and burning deserts, in which without his aid man must inevitably perish, he is by the Arabs emphatically styled the ship of the desert. He is the great medium of commerce in the regions which he inhabits; and without him the wilderness would be altogether impassable.

The Arabs subsist on the milk of the female, in the different forms of curds, cheese, and butter; and they often feed on its flesh. They use the camel's dung as fuel; they make slippers or harness of its skin, and tents and clothing of its hair. When alive, this animal is the treasure and support of its master; and, even when dead, contributes to his accommodation and comfort. Here then we have an unsightly, but inoffensive and docile animal, of peculiar conformation and habits; and that conformation and those habits admirably adapted to the physical state of those countries where he is found. And will the atheist allege that the sands and heat of the wilderness formed the spongy hoof and the fifth stomach of the camel, and endued him with the singular patience of hunger and thirst; or that the spongy hoof and water-bag of the camel created the vast sandy plain, and planted the stunted thorn in the desert? No sober man will attach the least credit to such allegations; for here we see an adaptation plainly indicative of mind, and which could only originate from a wise and benevolent First Cause.

But leaving the parched deserts between the Euphrates and the Gambia, let us turn our eye to the arctic regions of America, to the mountains of Lapland, or to the wilds of Siberia: there we meet with an animal almost as useful as the camel, and perceive a striking adaptation in the rein-deer This animal is a treasure to the Laplander. In winter, it draws his sledge with great rapidity over the frozen lakes, rivers, and snow-clad mountains of his country. Two of them yoked in a carriage can travel a hundred miles a-day. Besides serving the purposes of rapid transportation, they are far more extensively useful. Their milk yields cheese; their flesh, a wholesome and nutritious diet. Their skin furnishes clothing; the tendons, bowstrings and thread; and the bones and horns, glue and spoons.

Let the camel and the rein-deer change places. Carry the latter to the burning sands of Asia or Africa, and transport the former to the confines of the arctic circle. What happens? Both become miserable and useless creatures. There is no adaptation in the broad spongy sole of the camel, and no occasion for his fifth stomach. Neither his constitution nor his clothing is suited to the climate. He becomes an unprofitable and unhappy creature: he lingers, pines, and dies. Does the rein-deer fare better by the change? No. He is unable to bear the heat of the sun, and the drought of the desert. His dense coat of hair is an intolerable burden, and he soon falls a victim to an unsuitable climate. Now, how shall we account for the suitableness of the creature to the circumstances in which he is placed, but by the admission of a wise First Cause? Insensible must be the heart which is not filled with admiration at such adaptations; and callous those affections which do not glow with gratitude to the bountiful Author of Nature.

VI. Every species of animals is endued with the capacity of continuing its kind. The difference of sexes, and the mutual correspondence of parts in the different kinds of animals, demonstrate design and skilful contrivance. Now, design and contrivance are acts of mind, and cannot be predicated of anything but mind. Supposing that a living creature were somehow found, without any designing cause, yet what probability is there that it would be of any sex, or capable in any way of propagating its kind? This capacity implies a peculiarity of structure, and a variety of combinations that cannot appear without design. But supposing the atheist to find, in any way he pleases, an animal of one sex, of any given kind, how shall he find a mate for it? How, otherwise than by design and skilful contrivance, shall he procure another of the same kind, and of a different sex? We observe nothing throughout the wide extent of nature that gives us even a shadow of reason for believing, that amidst millions of millions of casual combinations such a kindred animal could be produced. It must, however, not only be produced, but within a very short time; for the duration of an animal's life is bounded by narrow limits. And not only must it be produced within a very short time, but also at or near the same place with the other; for we cannot suppose them to travel to any great distance in quest of each other.

Here we meet with such difficulties, that unless the atheist can show us something in the existing phenomena of nature in support of his suppositions and assertions, he has no right to blame us although we treat his hypothesis with contempt and derision. Thus, although there existed only one species of animals on the face of the earth, yet the argument in proof of the existence of a wise designing cause, drawn from the sexual relation, would be altogether unanswerable. We see, however, a vast system of such relations established and going on. We meet with perhaps twenty thousand different kinds of living creatures, all propagating their different kinds by sexual intercourse, carried on in one way or another. And we may take notice of a circumstance which seems to indicate not only a designing cause, but also a superintending providence. The circumstance is this, that throughout the whole range of animal existence there is always a due proportion between the sexes. The species never perishes by becoming all males, or all females. It cannot be alleged that all this diversity of animals has arisen from one original pair, by means of casual and gradual variations, during a long course of ages; for an impassable barrier is placed between the different kinds of animals. Some of them, indeed, as the horse and the ass, can propagate by intermixture. But here the process ends. The mule is unproductive. The exceptions which have happened, or are alleged to have happened, only serve to confirm the generality of the rule. Each of the different kinds of animals must have sprung from an original pair.

The difference of sexes, and the great system of corporeal adaptations connected with it, form a decisive argument in proof of the existence of a designing cause; a mind capable of planning a vast variety of combinations, and of employing skilful and amazingly diversified contrivances in order to the accomplishment of an important end. "The sexes," says Dr. Paley, "are evidently made for each other. They form the grand relation of animated nature; universal, organic, mechanical; subsisting, like the clearest relations of art, in different individuals; unequivocal, inexplicable without design. So much so, that were every other proof of contrivance in nature dubious or obscure, this alone would be sufficient. The example is complete. Nothing is wanting to the argument. I see no way whatever of getting over it."

INSECTS.

The structure of insects might furnish materials for a large dissertation; but it is intended to make only a few general remarks on the subject. We admire and applaud the consummate skill of the artist who forms any piece of machinery on a minute scale; as a watch that can be set in a ring for the finger. How delicate and exact must be the adaptation of the parts, and how accurate the workmanship of the whole! Ought not a similar admiration to accompany us when we pass through that province of nature, where animal organization is set before us in miniature? Insects are commonly overlooked, or regarded with an eye of careless indifference. But the mechanism of their bodies, and their instinctive propensities, plainly indicate a designing cause.

There is a prodigious variety of insects, differing in figure, colour, and disposition of parts. But here, as in every other department of sentient nature, there is a close connexion between the external form and the habits of the animal. All the tribes of insects proceed from parents like themselves. The doctrine of spontaneous or equivocal generation was famous among ancient philosophers; who, although they did not think of applying it to the larger animals, where its falsehood was obvious, thought it accounted for the appearance of insects. Some observers of nature perceiving that swarms of insects appeared on different substances, such as putrid flesh and the leaves of plants, rashly concluded that these diminutive animals were produced by the action of the sun on those substances. Men long rested satisfied with this vague notion, which at once flattered them with the belief that they knew the truth, and relieved them from the trouble of careful inquiry and observation. But the experiments of Redi, Malphigi, and others, dissipated the illusion, and established the important truth that every animal proceeds from a parent of its own kind.

The exquisite organization of insects has excited the admiration of the most distinguished anatomists. "After an attentive examination," says Swammerdam, "of the nature and anatomy of the smallest as well as of the largest animals, I cannot help allowing the least, an equal or perhaps a superior degree of dignity. If, while we dissect with care the largest animals, we are filled with admiration at the elegant disposition of their parts, to what a height is our astonishment raised when we discover all these parts arranged in the least, in the same regular manner!" In every department of animated nature, design is so obvious that it is not easy to determine where it is most conspicuously displayed.

Insects have organs of sense as well as the larger animals. We can form no conception of any animal with more senses than we ourselves enjoy; and we cannot assert that all insects possess as many senses as are found in man. But we may confidently affirm that the Creator has bestowed upon them as many as are necessary for their preservation, in their respective conditions. All insects enjoy the sense of feeling in common with other animals. In some of them we can discover no organs of vision; but many of them have two eyes, and some of them have more. It may not be easy to point out the ears of these minute animals; but it is certain that many of them possess the sense of hearing, or something analogous to it. Many of them seem capable of discovering their food by smelling; and they appear to exercise taste in the selection of it. Our inability to discover the organs of any particular sense in insects, is no evidence that they are destitute of that sense. The organs may be so minute as altogether to elude our discernment. Besides, insects may enjoy something analagous to our senses, though not through the medium of organs constructed as ours are.

In insects (I use the word in a vague sense) respiration is carried on by means of tracheæ, or air tubes, running below the skin, and communicating with the surface by numerous openings. In some of them, the air passes through the cuticle in every part of the body. Their organs for the reception of their aliment are very differently formed. Such of them as eat, have claws for seizing their food, and teeth for gnawing and comminuting it. Those which subsist by sucking fluids are provided with a pump, longer or shorter, according to their necessities. Many kinds, which at first sight appear to have no opening for the reception of nourishment, are furnished with two large pincers on their head for the conveyance of their aliment. Their is much variety in the internal organization of insects; but in all of them the great process of nutrition is successfully carried on.

Insects can provide for their safety in different ways. Some escape by flight. Some, for the purpose of concealment, make their abode in places of the same colour with themselves. The skin of some is so hard as to form a kind of coat of mail; and some are provided with a formidable sting. No species perishes, either through its own helplessness, or the violence of its enemies. Insects propagate their kinds, and this is accomplished, as in other animals, by the co-operation of different sexes. It may be remarked that such females as deposit their eggs in the bark of trees, in the earth, in the substance of leaves, or in other insects, are furnished with a suitable tube for the accomplishment of their purpose. The male has no occasion for the tube, and he has it not. The provision exists where it is needed, but extends no farther.

CHAPTER V.

INSTINCT.

On glancing at animated nature, a grand characteristic of man presents itself to our view; his capacity of reasoning, deliberating, planning, and varying the means which he employs for the accomplishment of his ends according to the exigencies of the case. The inferior animals almost always use the same means for the attainment of the same ends. They are either altogether incapable of reasoning, or possess the faculty in a very low degree: and, accordingly, if we meet with any improvement among them, it is that of a few individuals only, under the special instruction of man; not of the species, or of a society. But we see men in one age, or in one country, without knowledge and without curiosity, roaming singly or in little bands in the desert; without foresight or steady industry; rudely feeding on the spontaneous fruits of the earth, or on the precarious supplies of fishing and hunting; and lodging in a cave, under the projection of a rock, in the shelter of a thicket, or under a tent of stakes covered with bushes, bark, or skins; the erection of which is scarcely the labor of an hour. Their clothing is as rude and scanty as their other accommodations.

At another period, or in a different country, we find them comfortably clad; surrounded with flocks and herds, and removing from place to place for the conveniency of pasture; occasionally soliciting the earth by means of agriculture to contribute more liberally to their subsistence and comfort; living in movable habitations, and enjoying unpolished plenty. If we still follow the stream of human improvement, after passing different stages and through various scenes, we come to a busy multitude, pursuing with ambitious industry their several employments, under the protection of equal laws; building houses; clearing the forest; planting trees; applying all the powers of their labour and ingenuity to the cultivation of the soil; plunging into the bowels of the earth in quest of minerals; draining marshes and lakes, and straightening the water-course; making roads and bridges; digging canals and deepening rivers; engaged in manufactures and commerce; exchanging the production of one quarter of the globe for the superfluities of another; building and embellishing magnificent cities; forming literary and scientific establishments; impressing air, fire, and water, into their service; constructing machines for the abridgment of labour; exploring the different corners of the earth, and making themselves acquainted with the inhabitants and the productions of every country; investigating the physical laws of the universe; ascertaining the motions and magnitudes of the heavenly bodies; calculating the distances of the sun and planets, measuring the velocity of light, and observing the aberration of the fixed stars.

Such is a sketch of the career of society from rudeness to civilization, agreeably to the different states in which mankind have been found.* The individual exhibits something of a similar progress in improvement. His first efforts are awkward; his productions rude and clumsy. He improves by observation and practice, and gradually advances from one stage of excellence to another. The observation applies not to his mechanical skill only, but to his moral and intellectual attainments also.

If we turn our eye to the inferior animals, a very different picture is presented to our view. Every species is stationary. With some minute modifications, depending on local circumstances, it is the same in every age, and in every country. In cases, indeed, where the inferior animals are trained to the service of man, their natural disposition and habits are, by subjugation and discipline, occasionally, in some respects, altered and improved. Any progressive attainment, however, is merely that of the individual. Societies never advance. In most instances, the individual also is altogether stationary. The bird builds its nest, and the bee constructs its cell, as perfectly on the first attempt, and without either instruction or experience, as at any future period. This, I apprehend, is instinct in the strictest sense of the word. I do not pretend to draw a distinct line between reason and instinct, or in every instance to determine where the one ends and the other begins. But the general notion of instinct is, a propensity prior to experience, and independent on education. Some instincts, however, are capable of accommodation, or even of improvement. The creature is susceptible of some degree of education. But other instincts, particularly those of insects, are invariably the same.

In this chapter, I purpose to take notice of some of the instincts of the inferior animals relating to the preservation of the individual, and to the continuation of the species. In the last chapter, I made some observations on corporeal organization, and shall now attend to the corresponding instincts. These, at times, are so closely connected, and so run into each other, that it is not easy to treat of them altogether separately. As in the last chapter our attention was chiefly turned to organization, so in the present, instinct will be our main subject.

* Nothing that has been here said is intended to apply to the original state of man; but merely to mark his progress from the lowest state of degradation in which he has been found to the highest degree of civilization.

I. The different kinds of animals instinctively make use of the means of defence and safety with which they are provided. The calf pushes with its head, even before its horns appear; a proof that the instinct exists prior to the expansion of the parts for the employment of which it is implanted. The horse uses both his teeth and his heels, or treads down his adversary with his fore feet; although in a wild state his heels are the main instrument of defence; and it may be added, that, in that state, when horses sleep, one remains awake to give warning of approaching danger. The dog, in combating the enemy, employs his teeth, and the feline tribe uses both teeth and claws: The insect has recourse to its sting. The ox never attempts to bite, nor the dog to butt with his head: each of them instinctively feels that he possess more effectual means of defence. The hare has recourse to flight, and commonly betakes itself to high ground, as the length and mulcularity of its posterior extremities give it an advantage in ascending the hill. By its doublings, it often perplexes and eludes the enemy. The cunning of the fox, in providing his food and in making his escape from his pursuers, is proverbial.

The inferior animals instinctively know their enemies, and apprize each other of their common danger. The fox devours birds; and birds no sooner see him approach than they utter cries, which are understood by the whole flock, and put them instantly upon their guard. Every dam has a call for her young, and in every flock and herd there are expressions which bring numbers together; expressions of enjoyment or suffering, of desire or aversion. By a particular sound the hen invites her chicks to partake of food, and they instantly comply with the invitation. By a different cry she apprizes them of danger on the approach of the hawk, and, although they have never heard the cry before, they hasten to her for concealment and shelter.

When marmots are gambling among the grass, they station one of their number as sentinel upon a rock. If the sentinel perceive a man, an eagle, a dog, or any other enemy, by a whistle he gives his companions notice of their danger, and he is the last to enter the hole leading to their habitation. Monkeys, and several other animals, employ similar precautions. In many instances, animals of the same kind combine their efforts in order to repel a common enemy. A single rook is no match for a kite; but whenever the kite appears the rooks that are within sight join in attacking him. The migration of birds discovers a wonderful instinct, and may be considered as a means of security. Several kinds of them, at stated seasons, quit their summer abodes, and, in great flocks, repair to the places where the temperature is most suited to their constitutions, or where their food is most abundant.

Many animals instinctively employ proper means for healing their wounds and curing their diseases. The Kamtschadales confess that they owe to the bears all their skill both in physic and surgery; that by observing the herbs with which those animals rub their wounds, and to which they have recourse when sick or languid, they have become acquainted with most of the simples in use among them, either in the way of internal medicine, or of external application. In short, as all animals possess some means of defence and safety, so they have corresponding instincts which prompt them to the due application of those means.

II. As the inferior animals are provided with instruments for procuring their food, so they are endued with an instinctive skill in the use of those instruments. Every animal instinctively knows the food that will nourish it. The chick, almost as soon as it escapes from the shell, runs to its food, and pecks with its bill. The lamb, when it drops from the ewe, uses its legs in walking, and hastens to the teat from which it is to draw nourishment. The principal food of the rein-deer, in winter, is a kind of white moss; and the animal digs with its feet under the snow in order to obtain it. Sheep act in a similar manner. The beaver lays up a stock of winter provision: the squirrel does the same. Numbers of the crow kind hide food in holes, when they have it in plenty, and apply to their concealed stores in times of scarcity. When ravens find themselves unable to break the shells of muscles, and other testacea, they carry them to a great height in the air, and accomplish their purpose by letting them fall upon a rock. In some parts of the country, furze is occasionally, in seasons of scarcity, thrashed as food for horses: but the horse can perform the operation for himself. He tramples upon the branches and paws them with his fore feet, till the prickles are mashed together or rubbed off; and so completely does he perform the work, that the food thus prepared might be squeezed by the hand with impunity. Gass informs us, that in the country towards the source of the Missouri, wolves, in packs, hunt the antelope, which is too swift to be run down by a single wolf. The wolves take their station; part of the pack begins the chase, and running in a circle, they at intervals relieve each other. From Le Page de Pratz, in his History of Louisiana, we learn that wolves discover a similar sagacity in hunting the buffalo. In insects that undergo several transformations, the instinctive propensity changes with the appearance of the animal. Some that in one stage feed on putrid bodies, in another extract a delicious aliment from herbs and flowers. This instinctive sagacity appears throughout all animated nature.

III. Many animals live without any fixed habitation, and the dwelling which others frequent is of the simplest kind; as the form of the hare's. Some animals have no particular place of residence during winter, as many kinds of birds, but prepare a place in spring for bringing forth and rearing their young. Others, as the beaver, have no fixed residence in summer, but provide a comfortable habitation against the severity of winter. In the construction of their houses many animals display much sagacity; and as an example of this we may select the beaver. He is a native, chiefly of high latitudes, and, though not possessed of all that surprising sagacity and ingenuity which some distinguished naturalists have ascribed to him, is endued with wonderful instincts.

The beavers, when numerous, construct their houses on the margin of ponds, lakes, and rivers. They always choose a place where the water is so deep as not to freeze to the bottom. When they build on small rivers, where the water is liable to be drained off, by a failure in the sources which supply the stream, they provide against the evil by making a dam quite across the river at a convenient distance from their houses. This shows the foresight and sagacity of an engineer in erecting a fort, or marking out the ground for the site of a city. The shape of the dam varies according to circumstances. If the current of the river be slow, the dam runs almost straight across; but if the current be rapid, the dam is formed with a considerable curve towards the stream, so that the different parts of it support each other, like an arch. The materials employed are drift wood, green willows, birch and poplars, if they can be gotten; also mud and stones, intermixed in such a manner as contributes much to the strength of the dam, which, when the beavers are allowed long to frequent a place undisturbed, by frequent repairs becomes very firm.

The beavers always cut their wood higher up the river than their houses, so that they enjoy the advantage of the stream in conveying it to the place of its destination. On the margin of lakes, where they have always a sufficient depth of water, they construct no dams. Their houses, however, are built of the same materials as the dams; and their dimensions are suited to the number of inhabitants, which seldom exceeds four old, and six or eight young ones. The great aim of the beaver is to have a dry bed; and their houses, which are but rude structures, have only one door, always opening to the water. The otter, likewise, discovers much sagacity in forming his habitation. He burrows under ground, on the banks of rivers and lakes. He always makes the entrance to his house under water, working upwards towards the surface of the earth, and forming different chambers in his ascent, that in case of high floods he may still have a dry retreat. He forms a small air hole reaching to the surface, and, for the purpose of concealment, this air hole commonly opens in a bush.

The marmot also displays a surprising instinct in preparing his habitation. In the declivity of a hill he digs two small subterraneous passages, opening at some distance from each other. They gradually ascend, and approach each other, till they meet in a common trunk. In this common trunk, the marmots form a level dwelling, and carpet it carefully with moss and hay. One of the passages forms an entrance to the house; in the other the excrements are deposited. A number of marmots lodge in the same house, which is formed by their united labour. On feeling the approach of winter, they closely shut up the passages to their house, and sleep till the return of spring. In the marmot, Spallanzani found living action to cease in a temperature about 29° or 30° Fahrenheit.

IV. In this section we shall take notice of instincts relating to the continuation of the species.

Throughout the wide extent of animated nature, so far as it falls under our observation, individuals die, but the species continues. The author of that constitution of things, which carries into execution the first of these, has made an adequate provision for the last. The reproductive powers of the different kinds of animals are admirably adjusted to their natural term of life, and to the dangers to which they are exposed; so that no species ever perishes. Even where the life of the individual does not extend beyond the short space of a day, there is as sure a provision made for the continuation of the species, as where the life of the individual extends to a hundred years. The kinds which are liable to great peril and waste are very prolific, and the fecundity of those which are less exposed to danger is confined within narrower limits. Hares and rabbits bring forth far more young than lions and tigers; wrens are much more prolific than eagles; and the fecundity of cod-fish and salmon greatly exceeds that of the whale.

The earth exhibits some wonderful organic remains. The bones of those animals to which the names mammoth, megatherion, &c. have been assigned, indicate skeletons unlike to those of any living creature presently known; and we pretend not fully to account for the remains described by Cuvier and others. Some of them, at least, seemed to have belonged to the globe, under a constitution anterior to the present. But although we cannot satisfactorily explain these phenomena, yet we are acquainted with no clear evidence of the destruction of any species of animals that ever belonged to the earth under its present forms.

For the production and rearing of their young, there is, in every kind of animals, a most astonishing combination of organization and instinct. Neither of these is sufficient by itself. The organization without the instinct would be unproductive, and the instinct without the organization would be of no avail; but united, they fully accomplish the end. We are satisfied that nothing like legitimate evidence can be adduced to prove that the organization is the cause of the instinct. They are wonderfully conjoined; but we believe they are independent on each other, as much as the candle and the candlestick, the ink and the inkhorn. Is not, then, the combination of two such independent circumstances, for an important purpose, a decisive evidence of intelligence and design? If it be urged that the organization is the cause of the instinct, we wish to know who formed this constitution of things. Who formed the organization which is accompanied with such instincts? It was not chance surely, but an intelligent and wise cause.

All creatures are desirous of propagating their kinds. So strong is the desire, and so efficient the means, that no species fails in accomplishing the end. In some the season of love is periodical, and on its return what a striking scene is exhibited! In describing it we may employ the language of Lucretius, the poet of chance philosophy.

Et reserata viget genitalis aura Favoni;
Aëriae primum volucres te, Diva, tuumque
Significant initum percussæ corda tua vi:
Inde feræ pecudes persultant pabula læta,
Et rapidos tranant amneis; ita capta lepore,
Illecebrisque tuis omnis natura animantum
Te sequitur cupide, quo quamque inducere pergis:
Denique per maria, ac montes, fluviosque rapaceis,
Frundiferasque domos avium, camposque virenteis,
Omnibus incutiens blandum per pectora amorem,
Efficis, et cupide generatim saecla propagent.*

We shall make a few more remarks on the instincts relating to the continuation of the species, under the heads of pairing, the nidification, and incubation of birds, providing food for the young, and defending them.

1. When the offspring require, for some time, the attention and industry of both parents to support them, animals are found to pair; but, in cases where the female alone is able to raise her progeny, the sexual intercourse is promiscuous. The affectionate attention of the parents is always adapted to the condition of their young, and is continued towards them till they are capable to provide for themselves. Man is a pairing animal. Some quadrupeds pair, and pairing is common among the feathered tribes. In winter, indeed, birds in general are without any fixed habitation; and many kinds of them appear in great flocks, without any particular attention of one individual to another. On the return of spring, however, the scene changes. The general society is dissolved, and many partnerships, consisting each of a male and female, are formed. The pair fix on a suitable spot, and by their joint labour construct a habitation.

2. Most birds prepare their nests with much care; and many of them discover ingenuity in the design, and neatness in the execution. But the ingenuity and the neatness belong to the species, and in no degree characterize individuals. They have no need of an apprenticeship. The nest of those birds which have paired for the first time is not more rude or inconvenient than that of those which have repeated the labour of nidification for a number of years. There is no deficiency in the first from want of instruction and practice, and the last have gained nothing by observation and experience.

The dove that perch'd upon the Tree of Life,
And made her bed among its thickest leaves;
All the wing'd habitants of Paradise,
Whose songs once mingled with the songs of Angels,
Wove their first nests as curiously and well
As the wood-minstrels in our evil day.

The crow and the magpie, the lark and the linnet, and every other kind, has each a peculiar manner of building its nest; and every individual of the same species, in similar circumstances, follows the same model, and uses similar materials. The instinctive propensity seems, in various instances, to accommodate itself to peculiar circumstances, both in building the nest, and in the process of incubation. In countries infested by monkeys, some birds, which in other climates build in bushes or in the clefts of trees, suspend their nests upon a slender twig, and so elude the mischievous propensities of the monkey. With us, ravens build on trees; but in the cold climates of Iceland and Greenland, they construct their nests in the holes of rocks.

The nest is always suited to the size of the bird, and to the number of its eggs and young. Many small birds display much sagacity in concealing their nests by tufts of grass, or by twigs and leaves. In the nest we see a receptacle provided for eggs before they come to maturity, yea before the bird knows that it is to lay them. Each species lays a determinate number: and it appears that, in this process, some birds, at least, do not act under the influence of physical necessity, but have, to a certain extent, an instinctive voliton. The solon goose, if undisturbed, lays only one egg; but if that be taken away, she lays a second; if the second be removed, she lays a third; but no more for the season. In a number of instances, if one egg be daily abstracted from the nest, the bird continues laying till she obtain her complement. In this way a swallow has been made to lay nineteen eggs in one season.

In general, the smallest kinds of birds are most prolific; but from this general rule there are some exceptions. The eagle lays one, sometimes two eggs; the crow four or five; the titmouse seven or eight; the small European wren fifteen: the humming bird, however, a very little creature, lays only two; and yet the humming birds are more numerous in America than the wrens in Europe, being protected by the smallness of their size, the rapidity of their flight, and their daring courage. After the complement of eggs is provided, a new and interesting scene is exhibited. All the former habits of the birds seem at once to forsake it. The animal that before was almost in perpetual motion, hopping from twig to twig, flitting from tree to tree, rising into the air, flying to considerable distances, chirping and singing, becomes at once motionless and mute. She takes possession of her nest, and with assiduity broods on her eggs. In some instances, as in rooks and in crows, the male supplies her with food; and in others, as in pigeons, relieves her by filling her place. In this way, the small eggs, which otherwise would soon lose their heat, are always kept at the due temperature. We may add that the albumen, or white of the egg, is a feeble conductor of caloric, and consequently tends to preserve, during the occasional absence of the parent bird, that equable temperature which is so necessary to the evolution of the ovular embryo.

The eggs of the larger birds, on account of their greater size, retain heat longer than those of the smaller birds; accordingly the larger birds occasionally leave their nests for some time, without injury to the process of incubation. Some of them, however, when they go to feed, cover their eggs; the eider duck does it with down taken from her own breast. But small birds sit most assiduously, otherwise their eggs could not be hatched. Here we find an amazing adaptation of instinct to the circumstances of the animal, for which we see no rational way of accounting, without ultimately resorting to a wise first cause. The bird does not understand the process which it is carrying on: it does not know the end to be accomplished; yet it carries on the process with the most minute precision, in opposition to all its habits during the other seasons of the year, and in the absence of disastrous accidents, arising from foreign causes, it accomplishes the end with infallible certainty.

Fish, with a few exceptions, are oviparous; and generally, after depositing their eggs, pay no farther attention to their progeny. There are, however, some striking exceptions. The female cayman repairs to the banks of a river; forms a large hole in the sand, and there deposits her eggs. She covers them carefully, and rolls herself on the place to smooth it, that it may not be discovered. She leaves her eggs to be hatched in the sand; but her instinctive propensity prompts her to return, at the exact time, to uncover them and break the shells, when the young caymans come forth.

3. The instinctive propensities of animals do not terminate with the appearance of their progeny in the world, but continue as long as the aid of the parent is needful for rearing the offspring. Most animals have a strong affection for their young, which manifests itself in providing food for them. And in order to the supply of this food, there is, in many instances, a wonderful physical constitution in the parent, as well as surprising instincts in the progeny. Thus in the human race, such is the constitution of the mother, that she secretes a nutritious fluid for the support of her child, and the secretion of this fluid accompanies the need for it. It does not depend on volition. It does not exist at any other time. And in the child what a wonderful instinct displays itself in the complicated muscular action by which this fluid is obtained. Sucking is an operation in which the infant soon becomes expert; but few grown persons can perform it. The instinctive skill is lost, when the need for it ceases.

In many quadrupeds, as well as in the human race, the mother secretes a nutritious fluid for the support of her offspring, and she can yield nourishment to her young while she herself is feeding. There is a remarkable correspondence between the instinct of the young animal, and the provision made for its support. Almost as soon as it comes into the world, it seeks for the teat from which it is to draw nourishment. Now, how happens it that this fluid is secreted just at the time when it is needed? Who established that constitution of the animal by which the secretion takes place? How shall we account for the young animal, almost at the moment of its birth, groping for the organ from which it is to receive food, and employing the means necessary for obtaining that food?

Human infancy is long, and we find a corresponding affection and solicitude on the part of the parents. If a child be delicate and sickly, the parents feel for it a more tender affection, and exercise towards it a more assiduous attention than towards the infant of a more robust constitution. The watchful care accommodates itself to the exigency of the case, and generates a degree of affection, without which the anxiety and toil would be altogether insupportable. We may trace this process in the human mind for a little way, but it ultimately terminates in the instinctive principles of our nature. Young persons are capable of receiving instruction as well as food from their parents, and accordingly in the human race parental affection is permanent. After it has ceased to display itself in nourishing and defending, it appears in instructing and directing.

Birds do not secrete a fluid for the nourishment of their young; but they are diligent in providing food for them, which is earnestly solicited and greedily received. We may here remark, that it is the albumen chiefly which is expended in the formation of the chick; the yolk of the egg, without undergoing any considerable change, being wrapt up in its intestines to nourish it, till it receives or is capable of gathering other food. In most instances young birds would inevitably perish, without the nursing care of the parents. In some cases, however, the young can provide for themselves almost as soon as they escape from the shell, and in these instances the fostering instinct of the parent soon disappears. Some insects display an astonishing instinct in providing food for their young before they are hatched.* Others, which make no such provision, lay their eggs in places where the young, when they appear, can easily find subsistence. These instincts, must proceed either from the animals themselves, or from some Being possessed of reason and intelligence; but they cannot originate with the inferior animal itself, for it is obviously destitute of reason, and incapable of that foresight and wisdom which its cares and precautions indicate. In order to account for these instincts, we must ascend to a wise and benevolent Intelligence.

4. All animals defend their young; and, in obeying this instinctive impulse, the mother seems, in many instances, to lose her natural habits, and to assume a new character. The domestic hen, a stupid and timorous bird, becomes fierce and violent in defending her chickens. Even the harmless and inoffensive ewe assumes a menacing air, stamps with her foot, and seems to bid defiance to those who approach her lamb. But as the lamb acquires strength, and is able to run with its mother, her assumed character forsakes her, and she has recourse to flight. Hinds anxiously conceal their fawns, and, in order to draw the dogs away from them, present themselves to be chased. It is at once amusing and affecting to observe the artifices employed by the lapwing to decoy the intruder to a distance from her young.

The Kamtschadales never venture to fire upon a young bear when the mother is near; for if the cub falls, she becomes enraged to a degree little short of madness, and if she gets sight of the enemy, will only quit her revenge with her life. The same instinct is remarkably apparent in some inhabitants of the waters. The morse and the polar white bear have a great affection for their cubs, and are courageous and active in defending them.* The sea otter pines to death at the loss of its young, and breathes its last on the spot where they have been taken from it. Throughout every province of animated nature we meet with wonderful instincts, all directed to the preservation of the individual, and to the continuation of the species. Every instinct appears exactly in its proper place. Were the instincts to be altered, or those belonging to one species transferred to another, the harmony of the system would be deranged, and disorder ensue. For instance, were the sheep, its time of gestation continuing the same as at present, to come in season at the same time with the mare, it would bring forth at a period when the inclemency of the weather would destroy both the mother and her young.

If instincts result, as some have imagined, from conformation of parts, who organized the animal? If they flow from mechanical impulse, who constructed the machine? Where is the moving power? To talk of attraction, gravitation, nature, appetency, &c. in order to account for the existence or characteristic propensities of living creatures, is merely darkening counsel by a multitude of words. It is a vain attempt to substitute sound for sense; for where is there any rational way of accounting for the various instincts of animals, but by referring them to a powerful, wise, and good Intelligence? In the instincts of the creature we see the perfections of the Creator; and may apply to instincts in general what Dr. Reid says of bees in the construction of their cells. "They work most geometrically, without any knowledge of geometry; somewhat like a child, who by turning the hand of an organ makes good music, without any knowledge of music. The art is not in the child, but in him who makes the organ. In like manner, when a bee makes its combs so geometrically, the geometry is not in the bee, but in that great Geometrician who made the bee, and made all things in number, weight, and measure." If we do not see other animals displaying the geometry of the bee, we observe them, in a similar manner, employing suitable and effectual means for the accomplishment of their ends.

Thus, in our cursory glance at animated nature, we have seen great uniformity accompanied by surprising variety. The same general outline, with various modifications, prevails widely in the formation of living creatures. If we examine any one animal, we find its parts admirably adapted to each other. They form a harmonious whole. In every species we see an astonishing relation of the organs of one sex to those of another. By means of bodily conformation and instinctive propensity, an adequate provision is made for the preservation of the individual, and the continuation of the species. Everything goes on in a regular and uniform course. We never see any new species of animals appearing, nor any old kinds ceasing to exist. We meet with no metamorphoses of animals into a species different from that of their parents. By adventitious circumstances, the size, strength, and, in some measure, the instincts of animals, may be altered; but still the character of the species remains essentially the same.

* See Smellie's Philosophy of Natural History, v. i. p. 148.

* Speaking of the morse, Captain King says, "On the approach of the boats towards the ice, they took their young ones under their fins, and attempted to escape with them into the sea. Some whose cubs were killed, and left floating on the surface of the water, rose again and carried them down, sometimes just as our men were on the point of taking them into the boats, and could be traced bearing them to a considerable distance through the water, which was stained with their blood. They were afterwards observed bringing them at intervals above the surface, as if for air, and again plunging under it with a horrid bellowing. The female, in particular, whose young one had been killed and taken into the boat, became so furious, that she struck her two tusks through the bottom of the cutter."

The affection between the polar bear and her cub is so great, that they will die rather than desert each other. "We saw two white bears in the water, to which we immediately gave chase in the jolly boat, and killed them both. The larger, which probably was the dam of the younger, being shot first, the other would not quit, but remained swimming about, till after being fired upon several times it was shot dead."—See Cook's Third Voyage, v. iii. p. 248, &c.

There is an amazing gradation of animated beings, but even the classes that seem most nearly allied are distinct. Each kind continues what it originally was. We never see one species either suddenly, or gradually in a long succession of ages, transformed into another. No species either rises or falls in the scale. Men, and all other animals, continue such as they have been from the earliest records of time. The different species approach each other; but still they are separated by an impassable barrier. Animated nature thus exhibits undeniable marks of design, and consequently leads us, with irresistible force, to a powerful, wise, and good Being, who created, and continues to superintend the system.

We now proceed to inanimated nature; and I apprehend we will find it wisely constituted, and bearing a gracious relation to living creatures. As nothing within the sphere of our knowledge gives us any reason whatever to believe that the one of these formed the other, we must attribute both to the power, wisdom, and goodness of a Supreme Intelligence.

CHAPTER VI.

THE OCEAN.

The terraqueous globe is an oblate spheroid, having its equatorial diameter somewhat longer than the polar. The globular figure is the fittest for the steady motion of the earth in its orbit, and for its diurnal rotation on its axis: it is also the most capacious. The earth is so firmly compacted, that although it moves in its orbit with the prodigious velocity of a thousand miles in a minute, yet no part of it is dissipated or shattered. It is a globe of great solidity. Some, indeed, have supposed that there are vast caverns in its bowels: but the experiments of Dr. Maskelyne and Professor Playfair, on the mountain Schehallan, seem to disprove the supposition; as they show the earth to be more dense than that mountain, and nearly five times more dense than water.

On a general survey of the earth, the first thing that strikes us is its division into sea and dry land, the ocean occupying more than two-thirds of the surface of the terraqueous globe. For the ocean there is no physical necessity. The globe might have existed without it, and probably some of the orbs of the solar system are not provided with a proportion of water equal to that which obtains on the earth which we inhabit. We may suppose earth and water to exist together without design. But if it shall appear that the ocean is a great component part of one whole, that it is not only admirably constituted in itself, but that it is essential to an established system, then we are entitled to adduce it as an evidence of design. If it be well fitted for accomplishing the purposes which it serves in the system, it is a proof of wisdom: if these purposes be beneficial, if they contribute to the existence and happiness of sentient beings, we contend that it is a display of goodness.

Let us glance,

I. At the ocean considered in itself.

II. At the purposes which it serves in the system of our world.

Under the first of these heads, we shall take notice of its saline qualities, its tides, and its inhabitants.

I.—1. In attending to the ocean, we are struck with the saltness of its waters. This is one grand means of resisting putrefaction, and of preserving the great fluid mass in a wholesome state; for if the sea were not impregnated with saline bodies, the putrefaction of the great mass of animal and of vegetable matter which it contains would soon prove fatal to the inhabitants of the earth.

Fresh and stagnant waters soon putrefy. But in the waters of the ocean, stagnation and putrefaction are equally unknown. According to some, the ocean is salter in tropical climates than in higher latitudes. But the observations and experiments of De Pages present a different result. The fact, however, is certain, that the water of the ocean is as free from putrefaction at the equator as toward the pole. And we may observe, that if within the tropics, where the temperature is highest and the tendency to putrefaction greatest, the water is not more salt, it therefore feels most sensibly the current of rotation, or the general motion of the water from east to west, particularly observable within the torrid zone. The saltness of the ocean is everywhere proportioned to the need for it, in order to the preservation of the water in a salubrious state.*

To me it seems evident that the saline qualities of the ocean are a proof not of design only, but of wisdom and goodness also; for here we see means adapted to an end: these means answer the end; and the end itself is beneficial. I see no physical necessity for the saltness of the ocean. The water, at first fresh and stagnant, might have become one great putrid mass, destroying sentient beings in the deep, and diffusing pestilential and deadly vapours over the dry land. In order, then, to account for the saline impregnation of the ocean, we must have recourse to a designing cause.

Some have endeavoured to account for the saltness of the sea, by supposing that saline particles are washed down from the earth by the rivers, and that the ocean has derived its saltness from the accumulation of these particles. This hypothesis does not militate, in any degree, against the existence of a wise designing cause; for still we see adequate means employed for the accomplishment of a beneficial end, and whatever these means are, the argument in proof of design is the same. But to me the hypothesis seems pressed with insuperable difficulties. Were it true, we must either suppose the saltness of the sea to be increasing, or the saline particles of the earth to be exhausted. There is no proof, however, that either of these is the case. The last, indeed, is altogether out of the question: and as to the saltness of the sea, I believe it was the same five thousand years ago as at this day.

According to Davy, almost all solids and fluids, even the purest distilled water, contain saline matter. But I know of no proof that the accumulation of this matter in the ocean is derived from the rivers. If it were so, would not the sea be more salt towards the mouths of great rivers than at a distance from them? This is not the case. Lakes, which have an outlet, are found to contain fresh water: those that have no outlet are generally salt. But if the sea derived its saltness from the rivers, then those lakes that are fed by rivers should discover the saline quality in their waters, even though they have an outlet; for I know of no principle by the operation of which the saline matter can be entirely carried off through the outlet. The water of Lake Ontario is as sweet as that of Lakes Superior or Michigan; and the intervening lakes, Huron and Erie, discover no more saltness than those from which they draw their supplies. We may add that the De la Plata, Mississippi, and Nile, are as sweet when they meet with the waters of the ocean as at their source. Lakes without an outlet, or inland seas where the surface of water is too small to feel, in any considerable degree, the attraction of the sun and moon, are very salt; and, from the conformation of the adjacent lands, they are commonly much agitated by winds.

The Dead Sea, or Lake Asphaltites, has been long famous on account of its saline impregnation; and although many fables have been related concerning it by Josephus and others, it is true that its waters are of uncommon density. It contains upwards of forty per cent. of saline matter, chiefly muriate of magnesia and of lime. The Caspian Sea is, at least, as salt as the ocean, except where it is sweetened by the waters of the Volga, which is about the distance of ten leagues from the influx of that river. It is also much agitated by winds. The Black Sea is less salt than the ocean; but several great rivers pour their waters into it, and a constant current sets through the Straits of Constantinople towards the Propontis. The Lake Aral is very salt. Thus,

* If the mean saltness of the sea were much greater under the equator than in the temperate zone, a current at the bottom, from the equator towards the pole, would be the result. The mean density of the water of the sea, on an average, is

From 0° to 14° lat.	1.0272.
From 30° to 44°	1.0278.
From 54° to 60°	1.0271.

Humboldt, Pers. Nar. i. 64.

in small seas, there is a compensation, in one way or another, for the want of tides. Now, if the quantity of saline impregnation is, in every instance, proportioned to the circumstances of the case, is not this an evidence of design!

2. The tides keep the water of the ocean in perpetual motion, and contribute to the preservation of its salubrity. They also afford a hint to man when investigating the laws of nature: they are an instance of the great law or fact of gravitation, which so widely pervades the universe. They depend chiefly on the ratio in which gravity acts, and form one instance of the wisdom and goodness manifested in that ratio. Tides are owing principally to the action of the moon. If that planet were quiescent, we would have high water twice every 24 hours. But the moon is continually in motion round the earth, and advances so far every 12 hours, as to make it about 25 minutes ere any meridian of the earth, after it has performed half a revolution, come under her centre; and consequently about 12 hours and 25 minutes intervene between the high water of two successive tides.

Into the theory and phenomena of the tides, it is not the object of the present treatise to enter. Suffice it, therefore, to say, that the tides contribute to the accomplishment of a beneficial purpose; for, by the saltness of the water, and the action of the tides, the ocean is preserved from stagnation and putrefaction. Here we see one purpose of a secondary planet attending a globe constituted as ours is. There are no tides, it may be alleged, in the Mediterranean and Baltic; and yet these seas, although not uncommonly salt, are as free from putrefaction as any of the waters of the ocean. In the Mediterranean, however, there is a tide, though small and irregular. But there is generally a current passing through the Straits of Gibraltar into the Mediterranean; it sometimes sets out when the ebb tide in the Atlantic is great. In the Baltic the water is not so salt as in the ocean. Its saltness is increased by a westerly gale, and the waters raised somewhat like a tide. But a current generally sets out through the Sound, occasioned, no doubt, by the rivers which empty themselves into the Baltic. These currents prevent stagnation in the Mediterranean and Baltic. Where tides do not act a substitute is provided.

In connection with tides, we may mention the currents which abound in the ocean, and the causes of these phenomena are more numerous than at first sight might be imagined. They may be occasioned by the conformation of the coast or of the channel of the ocean, by a difference in heat or saltness, by the melting of the polar ices, or by the inequality of evaporation in different latitudes. Several of these causes may at times concur. The Gulf-stream is a remarkable current, which leaves the coast of Africa about the latitude of the Cape de Verd islands, traverses the ocean to the American shore, sweeps the gulf of Mexico, stretches north as far as the bank of Newfoundland in 41°, and turns eastward towards Madeira. It forms a great sea-river in some places, near eighty leagues broad. Its waters take about two years and ten months to perform their circuit; and, in some places of their course, are at a much higher temperature than the waters of the surrounding ocean.

3. The ocean is a great scene of animal existence and enjoyment: and it is preserved in a fit state for being so by its saltness and its tides. It is replenished with innumerable inhabitants, all fitted for the element in which they reside; and all, so far as we are capable of judging, enjoying a happiness suitable to their natures. Thus, I think, the ocean proves the existence of a powerful, wise, and good Intelligence, by the provision made for maintaining the salubrity of its waters, and by its innumerable inhabitants.

II. Let us glance at the purposes which the ocean serves in the system of our world.

Here we find it of essential importance. Without it the globe would be a barren and lifeless desert, presenting one uniform prospect of dismal sterility, and melancholy silence; adorned by no verdure, and cheered by no busy scenes of life and enjoyment. To the ocean we are indebted for the beauty and fertility of the dry land. It is the great fountain of moisture; refreshing and fertilizing the earth, and furnishing an abundant and wholesome beverage to man and beast. Water is exhaled from the ocean; floats in the atmosphere in the form of vapour; and is precipitated in dew, hail, rain, or snow, supplying the aliment of vegetation to plants and herbs, and yielding a salubrious drink to living creatures. By the channel of the rivers it again returns to the bosom of the ocean, and in this circle it perpetually moves, supporting a great system of animal and vegetable existence. It deserves to be remarked, that water, although it proceeds from the sea, yet is fresh when it descends in rain; an effect not easily produced by artificial means. If much ingenuity be required to render sea-water sweet, shall we deny the wisdom of Him who constructed the great laboratory, in which the process is carried on with unfailing precision and success, on the vast scale of nature? And if wisdom be displayed in the accomplishment of the end, that end is unquestionably a proof of goodness. It is the means of supplying a necessary aliment suited to our constitution, and to which, by admixture, we can communicate any taste or flavour that we please. The earth is so formed as to receive the water into reservoirs, to filtrate it, and to give it out in perennial streams, for the constant supply of our wants.

At first sight the ocean seems an insurmountable barrier between different portions of the globe, separating them as effectually from each other as if they were parts of different planets. But we soon perceive that, even in this point of view, it harmonizes with the rest of the system, giving scope to human ingenuity, and inviting to the exercise of vigorous exertion. Men soon learn to commit themselves to the sea, and to combat winds and waves. Even before civilization is far advanced, intrepid skill or casual misfortune carries them to great distances, and spreads them widely over the face of the earth. The inhabitants of the far-scattered islands of the Pacific Ocean speak nearly the same language; and must all, at no very distant period, have sprung from a common origin, and diverged from a central point.

The ocean becomes the medium of a vast and boundless intercourse between nations. It facilitates the communication between the most distant parts of the earth, and the exchange of the commodities of different climates. No country is supplied with such a rich variety of the necessaries and accommodations of life, but that it may admit the introduction of foreign superfluities, and even the poorest furnishes materials for exportation. The ocean is the great medium of commercial intercourse. It also modifies the temperature of the atmosphere on the land, rendering it warmer than it would otherwise be in high latitudes, and cooling it in tropical climates. It is, also, an inexhaustible storehouse of human food.

How far, and in what particular manner, the ocean and the exhalations from it, contribute to the purification of the air that has been contaminated by the vegetation of plants, and the respiration of animals, I do not at present inquire; although I am satisfied that their operation, in this respect, is of essential importance. Thus, wisdom and goodness appear in covering such a portion of the globe with water, and in preserving it from stagnation and putrefaction. In this way an inexhaustible fountain of moisture and fertilization is established; a fit place of residence for innumerable sentient beings is provided; the means of facilitating the intercourse of distant nations are devised; and a great storehouse is opened for supplying the wants, and diversifying the enjoyments of man.

CHAPTER VII.

THE GENERAL APPEARANCE OF THE EARTH, AND VEGETATION.

Had man and the inferior animals been cast upon a globe where naked sterility had established a perpetual empire, where no torrent rushed from the mountain, no shower dropt on the field, and no crops waved on the plain, they must have perished. Deep and mournful silence must have reigned on the dreary landscape, without anything to enliven the solitude or diversify the sad uniformity of the scene. But the earth is liberally provided with means of subsistence to its numerous and various inhabitants. It exhibits a variety fitted to charm the imagination, to exercise the industry and ingenuity, to supply the wants and multiply the enjoyments of man. It is a rich storehouse abundantly furnished with necessaries and comforts for every living being which it contains. It is indented by arms of the sea, which bring the treasures of the deep into the bosom of the dry land: it is watered by rivers, which at once drain off superfluous moisture and spread the aliment of vegetation over their banks, and which facilitate the communication between inland countries and the sea, and between the different places contiguous to their stream. Its surface abounds with gentle undulations; sometimes sinks into deep valleys, or rises into lofty mountains: but, generally speaking, the farther it recedes from the ocean, the higher it rises above the level of the waters; so that rivers run towards the sea, and, in most cases, marshes may be drained. The high lands serve as a reservoir for supplying springs and rivers, and shelter the lower grounds. The mountain and the valley furnish each a proper soil for plants of different kinds.

Even the bowels of the earth are replenished with materials which can be turned to the comfort and accommodation of mankind. Thence is digged the ore of iron, the most useful, and the most abundant also, of all the metals. There are found gold and silver which serve as the medium of exchange. Several minerals are possessed of much medicinal virtue; and some fossil substances serve for fuel and other valuable purposes. The face of the earth is adorned and enriched with a great variety of vegetables, each propagating its kind; for every plant, as well as every animal, proceeds in one way or another from a parent of the same kind with itself. The doctrine of equivocal generation exists only in the visions of an unenlightened imagination: it has no place in the provinces of nature.

The anatomy and physiology of vegetables might furnish us, even in the present imperfect state of our knowledge of these subjects, with many curious and interesting observations; but I purpose merely to make a few remarks, in order to show that the hand of the wise and good Being who manifests himself in the creation of animals, is equally apparent in the vegetable kingdom.

Every vegetable is capable of bearing seed; and seed, when properly deposited, becomes the germ of future plants. In many instances plants may be multiplied in different ways; but we must look to seeds as the great means by which vegetables are propagated. And what a wonderful thing is a seed! Why does it germinate more than a grain of sand on the shore, or a pebble in the channel of the brook? Must we not account for its configuration and vegetable power, by resorting to a wise and good First Cause? Without the admission of such a cause, vegetable as well as animal life sets us completely at defiance. For the first seeds, then, we must have recourse to the great Intelligence who stands at the head of the universe; and in his power, wisdom, and goodness only, can we discover an adequate cause for that constitution of things by which seeds vegetate and continue their kinds.

In order to vegetation many independent conditions must meet together. We must have seed, and, generally speaking, a vegetable mould. If the surface of the dry land had been one continuous plate of granite, it could not have afforded nourishment to seed, it could not have imbibed moisture, no verdure could have adorned the hill, and no crop could have gladdened the plain; but a vegetable soil is provided. Water also must be present; for if seeds be dried, and moisture completely excluded, they will not germinate. As moisture then is requisite, this connects every seed with the ocean, the great fountain of waters. But seed, soil, and moisture, will not of themselves produce a single plant. There must be a certain degree of heat also; for no seed will germinate and grow below the freezing point. This connects every seed with the sun, the source of heat in our system. Yet after we have found seed, soil, moisture, and heat, something farther is still requisite in order to vegetation. We must have air, yea atmospheric air, or something nearly resembling it; for seeds will not germinate, and plants will not grow, under the exhausted receiver of an air pump, nor without the presence of oxygen gas: the proportion of oxygen gas in atmospheric air is more favourable to germination than any other. Besides, the presence of light is requisite to give plants their peculiar colour and flavour.[*] Thus, to light and to the atmosphere which surrounds the earth, are we indebted for the beauty that adorns it.

It is evident then that before we can procure a single stalk of grass many conditions are requisite, and the existence of any one of those conditions does not necessarily involve the existence of any other. They are independent upon each other. We can conceive a globe to have existed without a vegetable soil; a vegetable soil, without a seed; seed, without the sun; the sun, without the ocean; the ocean, without the atmosphere. But all these are requisite in order to germination and vegetation. What but a designing cause could assemble and combine all these independent conditions, so as to exert a harmonious action in the accomplishment of an important end? If the means be adeqatue to the end, the designing cause must be wise; for in what does wisdom consist but in choosing right ends, and in employing proper means for the accomplishment of those ends? And if the end promote the comfort and happiness of sentient beings, then the designing cause must be good; for the diffusion of happiness is the characteristic feature in the attribute of goodness.

Seeds consist essentially of three parts; a cotyledon or cotyledons, a radicle, and a plumula. The cotydelons constitute the most bulky part of the seed; and as the yolk of the egg nourishes the embryo chick, so they contain a quantity of food for nursing the embryo plant, till by means of its radicle and plumula, which become the root and the stem, it is able to absorb nourishment from the earth and the air.

The food laid up in the cotyledons nourishes the radicle, which increases in size, and is converted into a root. The cotyledons now assume the appearance of leaves, and show themselves above the ground, forming what are called the seminal leaves of the plant. The roots absorb food from the earth; but this food, before it can be applied to the purposes of vegetation, requires to be digested. This process it undergoes, at first, in the seminal leaves. It is then carried to the plumula, which increases in size, rises out of the earth, becomes the stem of the plant, and puts forth branches and leaves. The seminal leaves now become useless, and decay and drop off; but the plant cannot be deprived of them sooner without destruction.

When thus perfect in all its parts, the young plant continues to absorb food from the earth. This food, under the name of sap, is conveyed in appropriate vessels to the leaves, where it is digested, and converted into the peculiar juice of the plant. The sap, after undergoing digestion in the leaves, is returned to nourish and increase the plant, which it does by depositing a layer of new matter round the old wood. The new layer, or unhardened wood of the present year, is named alburnum. It is probable that the food, extracted from the earth, is imbibed by the extremities of the roots only. How this food is made to enter into the roots and ascend through the sap-vessels, I do not pretend to explain. The fact is certain; and whether we attempt to account for it by capilary attraction, or any other way, we see adequate means employed for the accomplishment of an important end.

The sap of most plants, when collected in the spring, appears to the sight and taste little else than water; but it soon undergoes fermentation and putrefaction. The perspiration from the leaves is, for the most part, a clear watery liquor, like the sap, and subject to similar chemical changes. The sap increases in density in ascending the tree towards the leaves. Mr. Knight thinks this is owing to its being mixed with a quantity of matter previously deposited in the alburnum for that purpose, and ready to be assimilated to the different vegetable organs. According to him, plants are employed in the latter part of the summer in preparing food for the expanding of the buds and blossoms in the succeeding spring. This food when prepared is deposited in the alburnum. There it is lodged during the winter, and next spring, mixing with the ascending sap it affords nourishment to the buds and leaves.

In plants, the leaves perform the office both of the stomach and lungs in animals. While they receive the sap from the roots and sap-vessels they imbibe nourishment from the circumambient air. While absorption is carried on by the extremities of the roots, the leaves seem to concur in the same process, chiefly by their under surfaces; and they transpire by their upper surfaces. Some plants imbibe moisture with the greatest facility, and transpire very sparingly: thus they are fitted for inhabiting sunny rocks and sandy deserts. The sap, in its passage through the leaves and bark, becomes quite a new fluid, possessing the peculiar flavour and qualities of the plant; and not only yielding woody matter for the increase of the vegetable body, but furnishing various secreted substances, more or less numerous, and different among themselves.

The late Professor Robison of Edinburgh brought up from a coal pit some whitish looking plants; but nobody knew what they were. On being allowed to grow in the light, the white leaves dropped off, and were succeeded by green buds. It then appeared that the plants were tansy. On farther inquiry, he learned that the sods on which the plants grew had been taken down into the pit from a garden in the neighbourhood. Although the plant continued to grow in its new situation, yet neither in colour, odour, nor combustibility, did it at all resemble plants of the same species which had vegetated under exposure to light. He made the experiment, with great care, on lovage, mint, and other plants. They all throve in darkness, but with a blanched foliage, no way resembling the ordinary foliage, of the respective plants. Even after the green colour in plants is formed, it disappears on the exclusion of light.

Captain Parry, in his First Voyage, tells us, that at Melville Island, he raised mustard and cress in his cabin by the heat of the stove; they were colourless from want of light, but had much of the same pungent achromatic taste as if they had grown in ordinary circumstances.

We have already observed the great principle of assimilation in the human body; that mysterious process by which the aliment is converted into blood, and flesh, and cartilage, and bones. We meet with the same mystery in the vegetable kingdom. Plants secrete sugar, gums, and various resinous substances, from the uniform juices of the earth, or perhaps from mere water and air. We observe, however, this difference in these two great departments of organized nature; sentient beings feed only, or chiefly, on what is, or has been organized matter, either of a vegetable or animal kind; but plants have a power of drawing nourishment from inorganic matter, mere earths, salts, or airs (substances incapable of serving as food for animals,) though not from these exclusively. Thus, vegetables are the great link between inorganic matter and animal bodies, preparing the former for becoming a constituent part of the latter: and, as vegetables take in their food in the shape of sap, it appears that the transition from inorganic to organized matter is through the medium of fluidity.

From the same soil different plants secrete each their peculiar fluids; but how sweet and nutritious herbage should grow among the acrid crowfoot and aconite; how the leaf of the vine and sorrel should digest a wholesome acid, and that of a spurge or manchineel a most virulent poison, is something which we can neither understand nor explain. For this, chemical principles will not account. In the living laboratories of nature wonders are performed, immeasurably surpassing all the processes of art, and plainly indicating the existence and operation of an Intelligent Cause, powerful, wise, and good.

Of the peculiar secretions of plants we can form no certain opinion from the mere configuration of their parts. If these secretions depend on internal organization, the secrets of that organization have hitherto eluded investigation. At times, under the same external appearance, or at least such as even men of science cannot easily distinguish, they conceal very different qualities. The sweet and bitter orange-trees have the same appearance. Between the sweet and bitter jatropha there is a great resemblance; although the root of the one may be eaten with safety, while that of the other is an active poison. Here, as in every other department of nature, we meet with an order of things calculated to awaken the attention, exercise the vigilance, and solicit the intellectual energies of man. The brutes judge by their senses, and their senses do not deceive them. Man is endued with higher powers, and these must be brought into action; although his senses, if unperverted, will not mislead him.

As every vegetable is capable of bearing seed, so for the dispersion of seeds there is a wonderful provision. Some are widely sown by birds and other animals; others, as those of the thistle, are fitted with a wing or a sail, and wafted on the wind; and some are shot from their places by the elastic spring of a pod, in which they have been ripened. Many seeds, when kept dry or deeply buried in the earth, retain the power of germination for an unlimited period. If the ground in old botanic gardens be digged deeper than ordinary, it not unfrequently happens that species which have been long lost are recovered, by the seeds which have been buried in the earth being brought into a proper situation for germination.

Seeds and plants possess something analagous to the instincts of animals, for the preservation of the individual and the continuation of the kind. In what position soever a seed be deposited in the earth, the radicle always pushes downwards in quest of nourishment and to fix the plant into the ground; and the plumula, with unvarying steadiness, rises upwards. We may attempt to account for this, by saying that the radicle is stimulated by moisture, and the plumula by air, and that each elongates itself where it is most excited. Be this as it may, we see a constitution of things adequate to the accomplishment of important ends. A constitution of this kind is wise, and must have proceeded from a wise author; and if it produce beneficial effects its author must be good.

The roots of trees, it is well known, alter their direction in quest of nourishment; and the leaves, which perform such an essential part in vegetation, if disturbed, soon adjust themselves, and turn their upper surfaces to the light. If a leaf be smeared over, so that its communication with the atmosphere is cut off, it dies, like an animal when respiration is stopped. Some animals are adapted to particular climates and circumstances. The same is the case with vegetables; in some of which, as the tillandsia, a very curious provision is made to fit them to peculiar circumstances.* Some have tubular leaves which receive the rain like a funnel, and some are so formed as to prevent evaporation from their cisterns.

Wisdom is strikingly displayed in the wonderful structure of plants, and in the provision made for the preservation of the individual and the continuation of the kind. Wisdom and goodness likewise appear in the admirable relation between the animal and vegetable kingdoms. Vegetables might exist without animals, but many animals could not exist without vegetables; and of vegetables there is a variety to suit the peculiar taste of every creature, and an abundance to supply the wants of them all. Those that are the most generally relished, and consequently the most useful are the most common; and there is reason to conclude that there is no vegetable on the earth but what contributes, or may contribute to the subsistance, or comfort, and accommodation of man, or of the inferior animals. The earth produces nothing that is useless. Vegetables that are unpalatable to one class of animals are grateful to the taste of another; and the more that the leaves of perennial grasses are eaten, the more do they creep by the roots and send forth offsets. Trees furnish a lodging to various tribes of animals; and, besides yielding food, are made subservient to many useful purposes by the human race.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE ATMOSPHERE.

Having glanced at this earth and its inhabitants, let us now for a little turn our attention to the thin, elastic, and transparent fluid which constitutes the envelope of our globe.†

Had the earth been formed by a casual concurrence of atoms, or by any undesigning cause, the probability is that it would have remained for ever a naked mass, like the lonely blighted oak on the barren desert. But we see it a beautiful globe, adorned by verdure, enriched with plenty, and exhilarated by life and enjoyment, and all these depending on the atmosphere with which it is surrounded, as an essential condition. Atmospheric air consists in bulk of twenty-one parts in the hundred of what is at present called oxygen gas; about seventy-nine of azotic or nitrogen gas; and a small, but somewhat variable, portion of carbonic acid gas. The two last of these, namely, the azotic and carbonic acid gases, can support neither life nor flame. If an animal be immersed into either of them, it almost instantly dies. Oxygen gas alone will support the vital functions for some time; but animals confined in it expire long before the whole of it is consumed. The proportions of these gases in atmospheric air is the best fitted for supporting both animal and vegetable life. An excess of any of them is injurious or fatal.

But while the proportion of the gases in atmospheric air are best adapted to the economy of the animal system, that system is so constituted, as to be capable of bearing considerable variations in the composition of the air, without immediate injury to the powers of life. Are not design and skilful contrivance manifested in the constitution of atmospheric air? The proportion of its constituent parts are nearly the same in all places, and at all heights. The azotic is lighter than the oxygen gas, and this last has less specific gravity than carbonic acid gas; yet these two last are found in about the same proportions at the greatest heights to which the genius and intrepidity of man have ascended, as at the level of the sea. What astonishing contrivance raises the oxygen and carbonic acid gases to every height in the atmosphere; to the summit of Chimboraço, and to the loftiest region visited by the balloon? Is there no design, no skilful contrivance in the wonderful adjustment of the affinities and specific gravities of these different aeriform fluids? Did Priestley, Scheele, and Lavoisier, act without design, contrivance, and skill, in the processes by which they decomposed atmospheric air, and discovered its component parts? No one thinks so. And shall any person be so absurd as to deny design, wisdom, and goodness, in the adjustment of those proportions, and in fitting them for the benevolent purpose of supporting life.

* The tillandsia is a parasitical plant (a kind of mistletoe) which grows on the tops of trees in the deserts of America. It has its leaves turned at the base into the shape of a pitcher, with the extremity expanded: in these, rain is collected.—See Ency. Brit. voc. Nat. Hist. p. 657.

† The most distinguished philosophers of ancient times taught that nature in the formation of her various productions, employed only four elementary substances, fire, air, water, and earth. But the doctrine of the four elements, so famous in former times, is completely exploded by the discoveries of modern science. If, therefore, we speak of atmospheric air, or any of the other substances now mentioned, as an element, it is only in a loose and popular sense.

There is no physical necessity for the atmosphere. The earth might have existed without any such invisible robe flowing around it. The moon is not provided with an atmosphere; at least not with one so dense as ours. Might not the earth have been constituted in the same manner? But, if it had been so, it could not have been a place of residence for its present inhabitants. Without the atmosphere neither animals nor vegetables could have existed: withdraw even its oxygenous part, constituting only about a fifth of the bulk of the whole, and every organized being dies. If any person, then, deny design and wisdom in the formation and constitution of the atmosphere, we are entitled to call upon him to show the physical necessity of an atmosphere, yea of an atmosphere constituted as ours is. It is undeniably adapted to the other parts of the system, and is an essential part of one beautiful whole. What a mighty difference is there between the earth and the atmosphere! The one is a dense, opaque, and incompressible body; the other a thin, transparent, invisible and highly elastic substance. Yet between the two there is an obvious relation. Dissimilar as they are in themselves, they harmoniously combine for the accomplishment of the most beneficial purposes. Respiration, the propagation of sounds, the conveyance of odours, combustion, the support of vapors, the refraction and reflection of the rays of light, all depend on the atmosphere.

The atmosphere cannot form a single living creature; no being on earth formed it; yet without it no animal could exist. Without the lungs man could not live; but without the atmosphere the lungs were a useless organ. The lungs did not apportion the constituent parts of the atmosphere; yet no other proportions are so well suited for supporting animal life. The ear did not form the atmosphere, nor did the atmosphere create the ear: they exist independently on each other; yet there is an admirable relation between them. Without the atmosphere, the ear had been bestowed in vain. Decisive experiments prove that air is the medium by which sound is propagated. To it we are indebted for the pleasures of speech, and the charms of music. Without it, the organs of speech and of hearing would have been useless; but the introduction of this element gives interest and utility to the tongue and to the ear.*

The atmosphere conveys smells; and, in this way, is a source of pleasure, and a monitor against danger. There is an obvious relation between the atmosphere and the wings of birds. He who formed the wing of the eagle evidently fitted the bird for rising buoyant on the air. Without the air, wings would have been a cumbrous appendage; but, according to the present constitution of things, wings are of great importance to the bird, and are suited to all its habits. Even the ostrich, though it does not fly, is impelled in its rapid career by the action of its wings.

Air is necessary to fire. Whatever theory of combustion we adopt, we must admit the atmosphere is requisite to the process. The air supports vapour, which is exhaled from the earth and from the ocean by the heat of the sun. Evaporation is a great process of nature, which is continually going on, and is essential to the system. The quantity of water raised into the air in this manner, is much greater than, at first sight, we would imagine. Dr. Watson, by inverting a glass vessel on the ground in the time of a considerable drought, found that even then, about 1600 gallons of water were evaporated from an acre in 24 hours. On repeating the experiment, after a thunder-shower, he found that an acre yielded about 1900 gallons in 12 hours.

This process is carried on not only from the ground, but also from the leaves of trees and plants, as well as from the surface of rivers and lakes, and the ocean. A great part of the moisture exhaled during the day descends in dew during the night, and is absorbed by the vegetables which had before given it out. In this way the earth is not so soon desiccated, even for a little way below the surface, as we might be apt to imagine from the quantity of water raised by evaporation. If all the moisture, exhaled during the time of a long drought, left the earth, not to return to it for the space of several weeks or months, all plants which do not strike their roots very deeply into the ground must of necessity be destroyed. But nothing of this kind takes place, excepting with the most tender grass, when on elevated situations, and much exposed to the rays of the sun.

The water that is carried into the air by evaporation, returns again to the earth in dew and fogs, rain, hail, or snow, according to the climate and the season of the year. It does not descend in impetuous spouts, nor yet in large sheets. Had it done so, instead of being the messenger of plenty and of joy, it would have been the author of desolation and mourning, mangling the vegetable kingdom, overthrowing the habitations of man, and destroying himself. Can we contemplate the invisible drops of dew, the drizzling shower, reviving and refreshing the thirsty plants, and the copious rain moistening the earth, and not be filled with grateful admiration of the wisdom and goodness manifested in that constitution of things by which dews and rains descend as from a colander? The phenomena of rain we are unable fully to explain: but we see a beneficial end accomplished; and although we have not yet discovered all the steps of the process, or the precise operation of the different agents employed, we have sufficient reason to believe that the constitution of this meteor was framed by a wise and beneficent First Cause.

The atmosphere also serves to refract the light of the sun, and to reflect it in all directions. To the refraction of the rays of light by the atmosphere, we are indebted for the morning and evening twilight. Without this refraction, thick darkness would prevail in the morning till the sun were above the horizon, and, in the evening, would immediately follow the disappearance of his orb. At the equator the twilight is short, because there the earth moves with great rapidity in its diurnal rotation, and consequently its rotundity soon intervenes. The refraction of light is very serviceable to those who live in polar regions. By means of it their long night is abridged, and they see the returning light sooner than otherwise they could have done. The sun was visible to some Dutch navigators, who wintered in Nova Zembla in 1682, sixteen days sooner than he could have been seen if there had been no atmosphere to refract the rays of light.

If the refractive power of the atmosphere be beneficial to the inhabitants of the earth, its reflection of light is much more so. Without atmospheric reflection we would see no light, but when our eye was turned to the sun. Solid bodies, indeed, that reflected the rays, would glitter: they would glitter, however, in the midst of darkness. But from the reflection of the solar rays, in all directions, by means of the air, the hemisphere is as completely illuminated, as if the sun were commensurate with it, and were fitted up over our globe like a semispherical cap. Here, in the simplicity of the means, we may recognise the wisdom of the Agent. Every æriform fluid would not answer all the purposes of the atmosphere. Some of them are too rare for supporting vapour; most of them are unfit for the purposes of respiration. But the atmosphere is admirably adapted to the globe which it surrounds: it serves many different purposes, and is essential to a vast system of life and enjoyment.

It is a well known fact that atmospheric air is deteriorated, and rendered unfit for the support of life, by combustion, the germination of seeds, the vegetation of plants, and the respiration of animals. Were this deterioration to go on continually increasing, without counteraction or compensation, the atmosphere would daily become more unfit for the purposes of respiration, till, at length, the whole mass of air would become contaminated, and life be extinguished. But it exists at this moment in as pure a state as it ever did. It is as fit as ever for supporting both animal and vegetable life. Hence it is evident that a great restorative process is continually going on, by means of which the purity of the general body of the atmosphere is preserved. This process, which is an exact counterpoise to the causes of contamination, the present state of our knowledge does not enable us fully to explain.

Dr. Priestley observed that, in vegetation, leaves have the property of absorbing carbonic acid gas from the atmosphere; and hence he concluded that vegetation was a great restorer of the purity of the air contaminated by respiration. This doctrine has been controverted; but, after much investigation, it appears to a certain extent at least, to be true. In germination, indeed, seeds absorb oxygen, and give out carbonic acid. A similar process goes on in vegetation when plants are in the shade, or in the dark; but when they are exposed to the action of the solar beam the process is different. Then, by the joint agency of the plant and of light, the carbonic acid is decomposed and oxygen gas developed. In the shade, or in the dark, plants convert oxygen into carbonic acid; and, when confined in a given quantity of air, this conversion goes on till all the oxygen disappears. But under the action of the solar rays, in conjunction with the leaves of the plant, carbonic acid is decomposed, and oxygen gas is formed. This conversion and re-conversion of gases go on simultaneously: in what proportion has not yet been determined.

* The air by the conveyance of sounds furnishes us with the means of measuring distances. In any terrestrial distance, the passage of light may be considered as instantaneous; but sound travels at the rate of about 1142 feet in a second. Hence we may measure the distance of the cloud, from which the lightning and the peal of thunder proceed.

Thus, if plants deteriorate atmospheric air, they likewise contribute to its restoration to purity; but how far this contribution extends, on the great scale of nature, cannot be easily ascertained. By experiment and careful observation we may discover the processes of nature; but from the minute scale on which our experiments are performed, in many cases, it is not easy, from their results, to make any exact calculations respecting the processes in the vast system of the world. In the case under consideration, I know of no experiments which will enable us to make even an approximation to the degree in which vegetation purifies the atmosphere. In all probability, its influence in restoring is at least as great as in contaminating the air; perhaps much greater. We may still say, that, in this respect, there is a continual circulation of benefit between the animal and vegetable kingdoms.*

Water lends its aid in purifying contaminated air. It absorbs carbonic acid when brought into contact with it, and the rapidity of the absorption is much increased by agitation. It seems likewise to give out oxygen gas; and to act in both of these ways, more or less powerfully, according to different circumstances. Now, water and air are brought into a state of contact by the exhalation of vapour, the descent of dew and rain, and the action of winds. The very processes, which are necessary in order to vegetation and life, contain in them the principles by which the purity of the atmosphere is preserved. Although we were wholly unable to discover any part of the process by which contaminated air is restored to purity, still the argument from the fact would remain unanswerable. That a great process of restoration is continually going on, and that the air is preserved in a state of purity, cannot be denied. Our ignorance of the means merely proves the narrowness of our capacity, or the imperfection of our science.

Wind is air in motion, or a current of air, and is occasioned chiefly by the disturbance of the equilibrium of the atmosphere, by the unequal distribution of heat. The winds serve some important purposes in nature, and are great agents in carrying on the economy of that system of which they form a part. Confined and motionless air soon becomes unfavourable to respiration; but the winds agitate the atmosphere and maintain its salubrity, purifying what has been contaminated, and removing noxious emanations. They transfer from place to place the clouds destined to scatter over the face of the earth those rains which moisten and fertilize it. They are the vehicles of many seeds, which, being provided with wings or down, are wafted to all parts in autumn, and keep up a constant circulation of vegetable riches between different soils. They modify the temperature of the air, bringing the heat of the equator towards the poles, and carrying the polar cold towards the torrid zone. They also maintain an intercommunity of temperature between the sea and land. In tropical climates the sea-breeze bears in its bosom a refreshing coolness, and fans the traveller panting under a vertical sun: the wind blowing over the ocean serves to mitigate the cold of high latitudes. Like many other parts of nature, the winds solicit the ingenuity, and aid the industry of man. Without them navigation must have been almost unknown, and the commerce of distant nations altogether impracticable.

CHAPTER IX.

LIGHT.

Light is a most astonishing phenomenon, and between it and the eye there is an obvious relation. Without light the eye had been an useless organ; and without the eye light had been to sentient beings, in some respects, an unprofitable emanation. But, by the genial operation of light, the eye beholds creation in all its magnificence, beauty, and variety. Light did not create the eye, for it was formed in darkness; nor did the eye give existence to light; yet there is such an adaptation of the one to the other, as compels us, by the very constitution of our nature, to believe that it is the result of design. And the designing cause must be wise and good, for the means are happily fitted to the end, and the end is beneficial. The air is the vehicle of speech, and by means of the ear enables us to carry on an intercourse of thought with our fellow men; but how greatly is this intercourse extended, diversified, and improved by light and the eye!

It may here be assumed as a fact, that light is emitted from the luminous body, and moves in straight lines. Its prodigious velocity cannot fail to engage our attention. It travels about twelve millions of miles in a minute. The discovery of this fact is a noble proof of the exalted powers of the human mind; and yet it depends on circumstances so intelligible that every person may understand the matter. The eclipses of Jupiter's moons can be exactly calculated; and Roemer, a Danish astronomer, observed that these eclipses are seen sixteen minutes sooner when the earth is in that part of its orbit which is nearest Jupiter, than when it is farthest from him. This shows that light takes sixteen minutes to travel through a space equal to the diameter of the earth's orbit, and consequently eight minutes to pass from the sun to the earth; a distance which, with Dr. Maskelyne, we may estimate at ninety-five millions of miles. This wonderful fact was afterwards confirmed by Bradley's curious discovery of the aberration of the fixed stars.

Even the initial velocity of a cannon-ball seldom reaches 2000 feet in a second; but in the same time light moves about 200,000 miles, consequently with upwards of 500,000 times the greatest initial velocity of a cannon-ball. Unless the particles of light were inconceivably minute they would dash in pieces everything that came in their way. But such is their extreme exility, that, notwithstanding their amazing velocity, they strike even the delicate pupil of the eye without injuring it. The person who can reflect on this without a strong conviction and a grateful impression of an Intelligent Cause, and without admiration of the wisdom and goodness of that Cause, must have a mind inaccessible to moral evidence, and destitute of the noblest feelings of humanity. The beneficial effects of light are too extensive to be overlooked, and too obvious to be denied. They force themselves on the notice of the careless, and command the assent of the sceptic.

The particles of light seem strongly to repel each other, and are never found cohering together so as to form masses of any sensible magnitude. There are several differently coloured rays in the solar beam, which can be separated by the prism, and the colour of bodies depends on their affinity for particular rays, and their want of affinity for others. Thus to light are we indebted not only for seeing nature around us, but for all that charming variety of colours, all those delicate tints, which diversify and adorn the vegetable kingdom. The upper surface of leaves is of the most pleasing green, and the exquisite tints of flowers are inimitably beautiful. The most skilful painter cannot so mingle and temper his colours as to rival their native hues.

Light is the cause of that agreeable variety which we meet with in the taste and odour of plants, and is the main source of their combustibility. It is not in the vegetable kingdom only that the influence of light is felt: it acts also on animals, and considerably affects their colour. The bellies of fish, being always turned from the light, are white; but those parts of their bodies which are exposed to it exhibit various colours. Tropical birds are more brightly coloured than those of higher latitudes; and the parts of the feathers have more or less variety of colour, as they are more or less exposed to the action of light. The upper part of the feathers of the wings have more brilliancy than those of the breast. A similar observation applies to the hairs of quadrupeds; and light and heat seem to be powerful agents in producing that variety of colour which is observable in the human race.

Whether light and caloric, or the matter of heat, be the same substance under different modifications or combinations, I shall not inquire. Suffice it to say, that they are found together in the solar beam. Heat is the cause of fluidity, and is essential to the existence of our earth in its present form. The great law of attraction pervades the universe, so far as our observation extends; and had it alone acted, all must have been one solid mass. In order to constitute a system such as ours, it was necessary to introduce a principle of repulsion, which, in a proper degree, should counteract the law of attraction. This principle of repulsion we find in heat; by the action of which solids are converted into fluids, and fluids into vapour. Here we may remark the wisdom displayed in so nicely balancing the principles of attraction and repulsion against each other. Had there been any considerable difference in either of these from what now obtains, the world would not have existed in its present form, nor yielded subsistence to its present inhabitants. Had the power of attraction and cohesion been much greater, and the degree of heat the same as at present, we should have been in want of fluidity: had the quantity of heat been much greater, and attraction, as well as the pressure of the atmosphere, the same as at present, all our fluids would have been converted into vapour. But these powers are exactly adjusted to one another and to the rest of the system.

* It has been said, that the oxygen produced by plants arises solely from the decomposition of the carbonic acid, and that this production of oxygen depends altogether on the chemical effect of light on the leaf, and is unconnected with the functions of vegetation. Be this as it may, it is certain that the conversion of gases accompanies the process of vegetation.

Heat is necessary both to vegetable and animal life; and it appears a decided evidence of the wisdom and goodness of the Supreme Being, that the living functions, both of plants and animals, disengage the portion of heat necessary for their well-being: this they seem to accomplish by converting oxygen into carbonic acid gas, in which process a quantity of heat is evolved.

CHAPTER X.
